 For, that which carrieth

 are the Arguments whereon they discourse, because carping curio-

not to euery course and mechanicke conceite, capeable of nothing, but of such occasions as are futeable to his owne condition.

I haue read of the great Riuer * Euripus, which ebbeth and floweth seuen times a day, and with such violence; that it carrieth Ships vpon it with full sayle, directly against the winde. Seuen times in an houre ebbeth and floweth rath Opinion, in the torrent of indiscreet and troublesome apprehension: carrying Criticke calummie, and quint-eyed detraction, mainly against the winde of Wisedome and Iudgement; because their braines are no better ballast, nor their capacity offurther reach or extendure.

And yet, if the saying of Hesiod be true; That nothing can bee more pleasing, then variety, which is the soules cheefest solace: Then (not fearing folly, but speaking to peerelesse Noble nature) giue mee leaue to tell you, that there can hardly bee any especiall subiect imagined, but one Argument or other heere meeteth with it. From Sacred Diuinity (the most solide and supream of all other) through all other Artes and Sciences whatsoeuer, euen to any lowly, and the meanest (worthy) profession; here is some notable marke or Monument thereof (if it be either Ancient or Moderne) stored vp in this Treasure, for future Ages to delight in, and to receiue no meane benefite thereby.

Then (Honourable Lord and Ladie) all these blessings beeing Yours (as also my selfe, in endlesse dutie and seruice) when any subiect of great graue, and serious consideration (as of Nations, Monarchies, Kingdomes, and People, in their Originall, Rising or Declining, by Warres, Dissentions, Combuitions, or otherwise in the like occurrences) shall seeme troublesome or tedious to you: walke on but a little further, & then you may enter into a spacious Forrest, affording all choise of pleasing Game, either for Hawking, Hupping, Fishing, Fowling, or any other Noble exercise beside.

When those Forrest pleasures shall faint you (as all delights dull, by too much continuance) an Orchard standes wide open to welcome you, richly abounding in the fairest Frutages: not to feed the Eie onely, but likewise to refresh the Heart, inuiting you to plucke where, and while you please, and to bestow how, and when you list: because they are all yours, and whosoer else shall taste of them, do enioy such freedome but by your fauor.

There is one especiall recreation more (Gracious Madam) which remaineth foly to your selfe, and such as may enter by your admittance; in a goodly large Garden, abounding with all kind of the fairest Flowers, that open with the cheerfull mornings Sun, and shut againe at his sad departure, all sweet, and all soueraigne. And, because Ladies of elder times (as many haue had the like delight in our more Moderne daies) were singularly skilfull in Physick and Chirurgery: there is not a vacant place in the whole Garden, but it is fildy furnished shed euerie where; the verie common walkes (euen as if they were Bride-like strewed by hand) are couered with the choicest Simples, purest distillatorie Plants, and wholesome Herbes of euerie Vertue: for which, the Garden was purposely founded, and not for fruitlesse idlevanitie.

And were you all alone, without companie, and by your selfe, yet can you not so continue there: For, you may meeete with a faire Beuey of Queenes and Ladies, arduers turnings as you walke, and euerie one will tell you the Historie of her life and fortune (rare examples of Vertue and Honor) as themselues can best, truly & plainly discourse vnto you. Some other also you shall see, sadly sitting vnder Eughe & Cipresse trees, with Garlands of those leaues wreathed about their heads, sighing out their diuers disasters: whom your Noble nature cannot choose but commiserate; as greeuing to see a scratch in a cleare skin, and a bodie beautified by Nature, to be blemished by vnkinde Destiny.

From manie remote Kingdomes and Countries (where naturally they spake those seuerall Languages) are all these variable pleasures come hither, onely to kisse your Noble hands. It was no mean infelicitie for them, to find no fitter a Tutor, that might haue taught them to speake more eloquent English; which (indeede) also was my fault, seeing none else would tie themselves to so hard a Taske. But howsoeuer it may prooue, your rich iudgements, and all-sufficient ability in the Languages, as also my weakenesse; will (I hope) bury all defects in your fauor, & beare out from scandall my willing endeouour, that I may finish the other (yet remaining) selecten Bookes behinde, to perfect so rich and rare a Treasure.

SOME few years past, I intended the whole Worke of Pedro Mexia, with some other Authours on the like Arguments of variety. I then published nine Bookes, with intention to haue made them vpsfifteen, for the first Volume: but being preuented by sicknesse, I finished but the first nine Bookes; and finding the good acceptance of them, I haue aduentured now on ten Bookes more, of the like Ancient and Moderne Times: sauing only some particular Heads but lightly touched, are now (by the same Authors) more at large illustrated. And may this finde equall fauour vnto the former (without any harsh censure, or vnkinde discouragement:) the other eleuen Bookes shall follow with all conuenient speede, to finish vp so faire a Treasury.

Farewell.

THE TREASVRIE of Ancient and Moderne TIMES.

THE FIRST BOOKE.

Of the ancient Country of Gaule, now called France; what Lawes, Customs, Ceremonies, and other manners were used among the people of that Nation in their first Originall; and how (since then) they have continued.

An Introduction to the whole Discourse.

In ancient times, the Country of Gaule was enclosed within the limits of the Rhein, of the Alpes, of the Mediterranean sea, of the Pyrenean Mountains, and of the Ocean sea. But after that the Gaules had passed the Alpes; all the Country which was from the Mountains, so farre as the river * Rubicon, along by the coast of the Apennines, and so vp into the high Sea (which at this day is called the Gulfe of Venice) took the name of Gaule: as Galatia did the like, after that wee had subdued some people of Asia. That Gaule then which is in Europe, being halfe parted by the Alpes, is diuided into two parts; the one on the hither side of the Mountaines, and the other beyond. That which is on the further side, yet concerning vs, was called by the Romanes * Togata: as Romane, in regard of the habit of the Romanes, being commonly called a Gowne, and which they then did usually weare. That on the hither side, was (by themselves) named properly Braccata (by a certain fashion of garment then worne by them, termed Breaches) and partly * Comata, in regard that the haire on their heads was verie bushy. Braccata in the time of Julius Caesar, had his extender from the Alpes, so farre as Rosne or * Rhodanus bending towards the Pyrenean Mountaines, where were comprized the Volca, Armaricanes, Rhutheni or Rhytioni, and Heluetians, as it is to be seen in the seuenth Book of Caesars Commentaries. This country was one while called Prouence, and then againe Narbonne, after the name of Narbona, then the chiefe and capitall Citie of the country. In Comata dwelt the Aquitans, which are they of Guienne, euen from the Pyrenean Mountaines, so farre as the river * Garona: on the hither side whereof are the Celts, inhabiting so farre as the Riuer of Sena and Marna: All the rest of the country extending toward the North, is possessed by the Belgians.

Now the search would bee very great, and hard to be performed by any man, that would (with a certaine history of all the times) set downe the fashions, manners, and customes which the ancient Gaules had held and obserued, vntill the daies of Iulius Caesar. and their nouell qualities from those dayes to ours. But such as can content themselves with that diligence, which generally may be deliuered by the proofes of good and sufficient Authours, worthy of faith and found credit; perhaps shall finde their expectation well fitted, both with honest pleasure and profite in their reading. And with this intention am I determined to make (summarily) a collection out of many writers, that haue carefully employed their paines, concerning the manners and behauiour of the Gaules, according as matters might be remembered, in such diuersity of distant places. And first, we will select out the most Ancient: afterward (if wee can bring our purpose to full effect, and as our endeavor shall nothing be wanting) we will as diligently seeke for the nouell customes.

Caesar hath comprehended a certaine forme and semblance of Gaul in her ancient dayes; especially in the first booke of his Commentaries, of the warre in Gaul: albeit he hath sown many other things throughout his Bookes: which I hauing collected heere and there, and from infinite places in other Authours, so that the whole may serue to encrease and fully illustrate the course of our purpose; we may the more reasonably accomplish that which shall serue to make knowne our full aime and scope. Neuerthelesse, I am not to learne, that the Greekes which haue followed Caesar, were it that they vnderstood not the latine tongue, or were it through carelesnesse and negligence; haue declared in many places, that they scarcely vnderstood the matters contained in his Commentaries. Wherefore we will first of all imitate Caesar, as the most great and singular Author and master of our history: and then pursue others, according as they haue borrowed any thing of him, or as they ferue to make the whole subiect vnderstood.

But in regard that the principall parts of Great Britaine, as also of Germany, haue bene seized by the Gaules, as shal appear in due time and place; and so far as much as there hath bene great resemblance of the Britaines and Germanes with the Gaules, as will bee declared by that which Caesar hath written; I imagined with my selfe, that it would very conveniently suite with our purpose, to compare such fashions as carried any coherence in these Nations. Considering that Caesar thought it fit, to compare the customes of Gaul, with them of Germany. And Strabo, perceiving the Germanes to be called for by the Romanes, as true brethren to the Gaules, by resemblance of their manner of liuing, when he wrote the fashions and customes of the ancient Gaules, he reproued them, and began with the Germanes. But although that Tacitus hath said, That they were named Germanes, by an appellation proper to their Nation, and such as they pleased to stile themselves; yet notwithstanding, howsoever at first they received that name, there may be discerned in the great Germanity, or (for our better vnderstanding) a Fraternity, both in behauiour and customes, answerable one vnto another.

For our better beginning then, we will conclude on certaine kinds of manners, to the end, that each thing may be carried as may be most convenient. Plato sayeth, There are three principal parts in the body of Man, wherein are lodged the three principall powers of the soule; Concupiscence in the Liuer, Anger in the Heart, and Reason in the Head, as in a Citadell. In like manner, there are three severall kinds of vertues that do command & gouerne them: Sobriety or Temperance, to ouerway Concupiscence in the Liuer; Courage, against Anger in the Heart; and Wisdom, in thinking and iudging with Reason. The common consent & agreement of all which, is the faithfull durie of each one, euen as it were with diuers voices, & worthily may be called Iustice. Caesar and Diodorus, Titus Livius, Strabo, and others, who are as interpreters of Caesar, do declare many things of the Gauls: w^{ch} I would haue set down at large in my Discourse, according as they are written by them: I should rehearse one and the same matter too many times. Wherefore I will rather imitate their intention in each place, then bee constrained to alledge their multiplicity of words.

CHAP. I.

Of the Temperance in eating and drinking used among the Gaules: as also of their Marriages and single condition of life.

Enter then on the behalfe of Temperance, wee might speake of their abstinence in eating and drinking, resort to women, their manner of speech, their modesty in Garments and lodging; their sports, delights and assistance, which they afford to one another in such things as they haue. Concerning the eating and drinking of the ancient Gaules, they liued for the most part (according to Diodorus and Strabo) on white meats, and diuers kinds of flesh, & principally on Porke fresh and salted. They v^{sed} to haue standing by their fires, pottes full of boyled flesh, and spits well loaden with roasted flesh; the better part whereof they would giue to men of worth, to doe them honor: as Homer writes, That the Grecian Captains did to Ajax, when he had won the victory against Hector body to body. Caesar granteth the selfe-same manner of life to the Britaines, and to the Germanes. The Britaines (saith he) which dwell furthest vp into the Countrey, the most part of them do not sowe any corne but liue onely vpon milke and flesh. Neuerthelesse, they hold in detestation (by what religious opinion I know not) to taste of an Hare, of an Hen or Chicken, and of a Goose. Hee saith also the very same in his seuenth booke, speaking of the Germanes; That they do not addit them selues to any kinde of labour, and that their very greatest nourishment is vpon white meats, cheefe and flesh. But Tacitus hath written much more amply concerning the manner of life amongst the Germanes. Each mother (saith hee) doth nurse her child with her owne beist, and neuer trusteth it in the hands of their seruants, or other Nurses. Thou canst not know the Master from the Varlet, by any kinde of more delicate feeding. They liue nakedly and slovenly, euen amongst their Heards or droues of Cattle, & lying vpon the ground, vntill such time as age doth set apart such as are Masters, & vertue doeth auouch and make them to bee knowne. Their viands are simply dressed or prepared, being of wilde fruits; sometimes of fresh Venison, or curded milke; without any dainty cooking, or dressing. So much for their manner of eating.

As for their drinke, that amongst the Gaules, and termed Zythum: This (saith Diodorus) was made of barley and water, hauing passed thorow diuers honcombs. Tacitus writeth almost the very same of the Germanes. They make a drinke (saith he) of water, mingled both with barley & wheate, disguised into some resemblance of wine. They which dwell on the Seacoasts, do buy wine. The most part of the Gaules (as Diodorus & Strabo doe both write) v^{sed} to sitte on the ground and to eat their food, sitting on the skinnies of Dogges or of wolues: being serued with earthen vessels, which were strong and massiue, and wrought about with branches of flowers; and they were alwayes attended and serued by their young children. In like manner Tacitus recordeth, That the Germanes so soone as they were awake and risen (which they v^{sed} not to do till it was day) they laued and washed themselves with warme water, because winter continued in their region for the most part of the yeare; and at coming forth of the bathe, they went vnto their food, each one hauing his table and seat alone by himselfe. Thus then was their ancient and rude simplicitie, which caused the Germanes to be so big membered and corpulent, wherat Tacitus seemeth to maruell greatly. And thence likewise ensued the selfe-same greatnesse of bodye which was among the Gaules, vho for their huge corpulency, and regarding onely their owne bignesse of stature, held the smaller constitution of the Romanes in contempt, as may be scene in the 2. booke of the wars in Gaul.

But Plato reprehendeth the Gaules for their intemperance and drunkenness with wine; and Diodorus writeth the very same. They affected wine so excessively, that when the Merchants brought it to them, they dranke it wholly new as it was; and then becoming drunk, by hauing taken ouermuch, they lay downe to sleepe, or behaued themselves like mad men. And this was the reason that many of the Italian

lian Merchants for the gaine which they got both by sea and land; brought wine in great plenty thither, and for a final vend of wine, receyued (in exchange) foure times the value. And the same Authour not onely blameth their drunkenness, but also the quarrells which accompanied this excoesse. They obserued (saith he) as a custome, at their feeding, for the least debate of words, to rise presently from the Table, and defie one another to the combat, hazarding their lives without any discretion. Thus you see how the Greeks haue reproued the ancient Gaules; and Tacitus calleth the Germanes their Brethren in the same vice, accusing them equally to bee drunkards and quarrellers. They vied not (saith he) any such temperance against thirst. For they held it no dishonor, to spend the whole day and night in drinking, so they might bee suffered to drinke their fill, furnishing them with so much as they would haue; you should find them no lesse easie to bee conquered by their vices, then by armes. The quarrells which rose very often among them, as among people subiect to Wine, was no sooner mingled with injuries of the mouth; but (for the most part) did end with blowes by the sword, to the expence of their blood, yea of their liues. Such was the blame which the Germanes receiued by making no more account of so bad a custome; euen as if this vice had bene no vice among them, or did any way shame them.

But the Gaules vsed themselves in better manner: for by a publicke ordinance this vile behaviour (in particular persons) was verie greuously and rigorously punished. Let vs heare then from Cæsar the cause of the magnanimity of the Gaules; which was, by knowing how to keep themselves from this disorderly kinde of life. The most magnanimous of all (saith he in his first Booke, speaking of the Belgians, Celts, and Aquitanes) are the Belgians, because they are furthest off in the countrey, which is carefully husbanded, and strangers doe but sildome traffike with their courages.

In the same booke speaking of the Neruians, as of the most courageous of all the Belgians, he saith; Cæsar making enquiry of them, what might be their naturall disposition and manners, hee found, That Merchants did not traffike with them; & that they would not suffer (by any means) that wine should be brought among them, or any thing that serued for delicacy. For they held (as an infallible opinion) that such things wer the cause of abasing their courage, & that their naturall vertue would thereby be much weakened. Whereby we may perceiue, that the intemperance of some particular men, was condemned by a generall and publicke decree; and that sobriety & temperate carriage was greatly respected and honored in those parts. Strabo sayeth, That by the periuasion of Cennus, a graue and wise man, the Geres rent and pluckt vp all the Vines in their countrey, yet vsed some wine in the time of their childrens nursing. But our Ancestors did much better, because they would neuer permit or suffer, that any Vine should be planted among them, or wine to be brought them from any other place. Wherefore Diodorus had good reason to say, that in his time, there came no vine at all into Gaule Comata.

Cæsar in his fourth Booke, maketh the Suenes, a people of Germany, equall in temperance to the Neruians that were in Gaule. For they would not suffer that any wine should be brought into their countrey, because they were perwaded, that it made men lazic, effeminate, and vnapt to endure any labor. Thus we may obserue then, what was their sobriety in eating and drinking, wherein their greater part of vertue is commended; for abstinence from lewd and wanton women. And albeit that Diodorus, Strabo, * Bardeanes; according as Eusebius reporteth; being all of them Grecian Authors, haue reproued this vice as frequent and common among the Gaules, and which is as innated (if credite may bee giuen to Aristotle) in warlike actions; whereby the fable was fained, of conioyning Venus with God Mars; yet notwithstanding, Cæsar speaketh nothing therof, but giueth great commendation to the Germans for their temperance, contrary to them that haue written otherwife of them.

Such as haue continued in virgin estate the longest while among them, and without the knowledge of any other but their owne body, receiued the very greatest respect spect and praise. For they held it as a most villanous thing to haue knowledge of a woman, before the age of twenty yeeres. In all which time they did not hide themselves, but bathed daily together in the ri- uers. And this is the reason rendered by Herodotus, speaking of the nature of children, wherefore paire commeth much sooner to some then it doth to others: be- cause the vse of Venus maketh the flesh more loose and flaggy, and openeth the skinn, which affordeth the easier passage to the haire; contrarywise, such Children as are gelded, haue neuer any haire at all. Tacitus hath not omitted the selfsame at- tribution of praise to the Germanes. Young men are long time before they haue any knowledge of women: and that is an especial reason why they lose no part of their youthfull strength, and therefore make no hast at all of parting with their virgin condition. Young Laddes, and such (of like stature) as are gelded, do make triall of their agility together, and their children do (commonly) partake of their Parents strength.

Marriages do appertaine to the rule of the lawe vertue; but Cæsar hath not written carefully how the Gauls obserued it. The husband (saith hee) laide downe the valew of so much goodes, as his wife brought with her, and a iust account be- ing taken thereof, the whole stocke was put together. The party that furnished, en- ioyed the others portion, with the reuen- ues of all that had past. The husbands are masters and commaunders of their wiues liues, and also of their Childrens. When any Father of a Family (of note) dyeth, the next of the kindred do assem- ble together, and if any suspicion be conceyued concerning his death: the Wife is committed to tortures, as they doe their slaues, and if the proue to be conuincied, after they haue tormented her with fire, and all other kinds of paines, they put her to death. This law may seeme hard, that giueth the husband such like power ouer the wife and children, as he hath ouer his slaues. For, according as the Philoso- phers haue taught vs: the father of the fa- mily giueth command to his wife & chil- dren, as vnto free persons. Yet this is not all as one kinde of command: for hee gi- ueth command to his wife as to one of the same Commonwealth, & to his children as a King. The Law truly may ap- pear to be hard, and yet it is Roman, euen the like as Romulus made it, Ordaining; That the sonne should bee in his fathers power all his life; and that the father may chastise, beate, put him to any busines in the field, sell, or kill him. The same King also appointed, That a man might pun- ish his wife, if he had drunke any wine. Cæsar speaketh all this in his sixth booke: and in his fifth hee declareth diuers other fashions of behaviour in marriages, speak- ing of the Britaines.

Ten or twelue together (saith he) do hold their wiues in common, and princi- pally brethren with their brethren, and fathers with their daughters. And such as are born of them, are aouched for chil- dren of them that haue espoused their mothers, being yet maids. So much allo he relateth of the English. But Tacitus writing of the Germanes, giueth them most noble commendation in this point. The wife (saith hee) neuer offereth anie dowry to the husband, but the husband to the wife. The parents, cousins, & kindred are present therat, and allow of all presents passing between them. And they are no presents desired for: delicacie or delight of women, nor to repaire a new intended marriage: but they are a gift of Oxen yoked, a horse bridled and furni- shed, & a Buckler or Target, with a sword and Iaulaine. For these presents the hus- band taketh his wife, who likewise (on hir owne behalfe) presenteth him with some weapons of warre. This is the great mar- riage bond, these are accounted sacred mysteries, & these are the coniugal gods that they hold in reuerence.

And to the end that the wife may not thinke her selfe exempted from vertuous desseignes, nor the hazards of warre: from the very beginning of her marriage she is continually aduertised, that she is thus re- ceived and taken to be her husbands companion in all paines and dangers, and that (be it either peace or warre), shee must of necessity runne the same fortune. And these are plainly signified vnto her by the coupled Oxen, the furnished horse, and warlike weapons. She receiueh what she is to bestow on her children after that she hath worthily and holily nursed them vp: & such as are of most forward disposition the Father hath care of, that they may re-

shed by their husbands for adultery

There are very few adulteries committed in so great a Nation; for the punishment thereof is very speedy, and the husband may lawfully do it. After hee hath thauen and stript her naked, the husband bringeth her forth of his house, in the presence of all his and her nearest Kindred, and beatech her with a bastinado thorow all the streetes; for there is no allowance of any pardon after that a wife hath blemished her honor; and neither her beauty, youth, or riches can afterward winne her another husband. Vices ferue not there to be laughed and jested at: & one may well say, That (there) is such a world, as with respecteth the doing or induring of any dissoluteness. Those Commonweales are the best ordered, wherein is such permission, that the Maides onely finde themselves husbands, and marriage consisteth in mutuall accord (for a long while) in good hope, and that the Bride may have her hearts desire. For in this case she taketh her husband as one & the selfsame body, and one life is allowed by them both: because they can have no contrary thoughts, neither they desire any way wandering, but their affections doe so sympathize, as not in either to husband or wife, but to the sanctity of marriage. It is helde as a very great offence, to procure the death of any of their children, or of their kindred: And there good customes do beare more sway, than good Lawes and Ordinances doe elsewhere. Hitherto haue we continued the writing of Tacitus, concerning the Germanes marriages.

Diodes reprehendeth the Gaules for a certaine kinde of disordered behaviour in their speaking, saying, They vse a short kinde of speech, somewhat hard to be understood, and without any deliberation; speaking great store of doubtfull things, yet deliuering many bragging and vaunting words; much to commend themselves and in the contempt of others. They are threewords and bad speakers, and full of overweening. This vauntery of theirs hath likewise beene reprooued by Strabo in lib.

3. And Caesar speaketh thereof in his seauenth Booke, and is also to be proued by diuers examples in his other books. Such is that whereof hee speaketh in his first booke, of Draconus the Heluetian, who highly extolled and vaunted the vertue of the Heluetians, and reproached the discomfort of the Romanes, admonishing Caesar by menaces to beware of any further attempting; for feare, least the place where the Romanes miscarried, by a further losse of their people, after the foiling of their whole Army, should take name thereby, and so remaine as a memorie of their disgrace.

Such also was Arionius, King of the Germanes, who answering litle or nothing to matters which Caesar demaunded of him; spake wonders of his owne valour, and that he neuer buckled with any man, but he was ruined. And Caesar might come to fight whensoever he pleased, but he should learne of the Germanes, that they were a people neuer vanquished, and skillfull enough in actions of armes. Vercingetorix also wanted in his oration, that hee would make a League with all the Gaules, and then all the world durst not make head against them. This is sufficient concerning this matter; I come now to speake of the care which they had of their owne persons.

The manner of speaking amongst the Gaules.

Diodes, speaking of the Gaules, sayth; Albeit, that naturally they haue goodly lockes of hayre, yet doe they helpe the natural colour thereof, by an instrument properly deuised for that purpose. They twine and twist their busbie lockes together, and suffer them to hang dangling downe, euen from the forehead to the necke: so that they resemble Satyres, and young vnthorne boyes. They haue practised by Art, to make their haire thicke thicke and hard, that little difference appeareth betweene theirs and the haire of a horie. Tacitus speaketh (wel-neere) the same of the Sueues, a people of Germany. But the especiall note of that Nation is, that they turne their haire crosse or ouerthwart, and then binde or trusse it vp in a knot. In this manner are the Sueues known among all the other Germanes, and free-men of the Countrey from slaues. Some of the Sueues doe weare their haire long, and bristling backward with a bending downe, and so they go till they bee hoary or white; and then (oftentimes) they binde it together on the crowne of the head. The Lords are no more respectiue of their own persons, and yet without any proud or bad intention: For it is not done in regard that they affect or couet to be affected; but they doe onely fo decke themselves, to appeare the more fierce and terrible vnto their enemies, when occasion calleth them forth to warre.

Diu. in lib. 5
How the Gaules wore their beards,
and some other apparrell.

Diodes proceedeth on in this manner, concerning the behaviour of the Gaules. Some of them (saith he) doe vse to shaueth their beards, but others doe weare them of some length. The Gentlemen doe cutte short the haire on their cheekes, & suffer their beards to grow to such length, as it will couer all their bodie. They weare also a kinde of garment, which is all hairie, to seeme the more dreadfull and terrible, consisting of diuers colours, and teamed by them Braccates. They haue long skirted lackets or Cassockes, rewed or streaked, beeing of the very courtest Cloath, which they vse for winter, and the most simple or slenderest for summer. Diodes speaketh thus of the Braccates, as the reason whereby the Romanes called that part of Gaule Braccata, and by which garment the same Authour affirmeth, That the Gaules were more terrible to beholde.

The reason of Braccata.

Strabo in lib. 4.

Strabo likewise writeth in his fourth booke concerning their haire, their Cassockes, their rude and hairy garments, their long high breeches, & their short open cloaks which hardly couered halfe they Buttockes. All these Authors doe agree together, as touching the haire of the Gaules and Germanes, and to be of a redde colour, according as Titus Linius, and Diodes haue written. Caesar speaking of the of ancient Britany, writeth thus. They do all paint themselves with an hearb, called by them Glafum, which causeth a blewish or azure colour: and this made them very dreadful to looke on, when they went to any fight. Moreover, they wore their lockes of haire very long, shauing off all their other haire except that on the head, and on the vpper lip.

Diodes pursuing his purpose concerning the Gaules, figureth them forth (as it were with golde) in this manner. The whole Countrey of Gaule is without the mettall called Siluer: but nature hath giuen it gold, without any labor or cunning endeavour. For, in regard that the most part of the riuers haue their courses verie troublesome, vncaise in passing, & wheeling or circkling in wide compasse: the waters which descend from the hills and mountains, by dispersing themselves abroad in the valles, do scatter a sand on the fields, which is mingled with golde. Afterwards, kneading or tweaking the clods together, wherein they discern the golde to shine, and permitting them to become hard: they then breake them in peeces, and when they haue washed it in water, and the earth is quite taken away, they hurle the rest into a furnace, and so melt it in that manner. When they haue thus moulen and drawne out the golde pure and cleane, the women and men do adorne themselves therewith: for they weare it in rings on their fingers, and in bracelets about their armes, and in Carcanets on their breasts, & in chaines about their neckes, and about their middles as golden girdles. Polybius also maketh mention in his second booke, of their Chaines and Bracelets. And Strabo in his 4. booke speaketh of their Mines of gold, whereof the cheefest are in the Countrey of Tarabellus; and hee attributeth this Ornament only vnto such as were in honor and dignitie.

But Caesar and Tacitus do speake of another manner of want or pouerty (of this magnificence) amongst the Germanes. They vse (saith Caesar) skinnies in their garments, and short cloakes made of furred skins, hauing the greater part of their body naked. But Tacitus speaketh more amply, concerning the whole manner of the Germanes, writing thus. I doubt whether the gods were fauourable to them or quite contrary; because they denied them the

the mettals of gold and silver. Nowwithstanding, I will not set it downe assuredly, but that there may bee some veine of gold or silver in Germany: yet who (at any time) hath made search for it? They have no such affection thereto, as to apply it to any service. Some vessels of silver have bene found amongst them (which have bene given to their Ambassadors, or to their Princes) and yet to be held in no more esteeme or reckoning, then those that are made of earth. Neuertheles, they that dwell much neerer to vs, in regard that they have trafficked with our people:
do make more esteeme of gold and silver, allowing and commending some peeeces of our monies. They that live further off in the Countrey, doe deale more simply, and (according to the most ancient manner) make their traffike by exchange. They receive the old money, and such as they have had longest knowledge of, as the Serrati and Bigati. They loue
the coin of silver better then that of gold;
not that they beare therto any particular affection, but because the silver money is easiest for them in buying things common, and of smallest price. The viall habit or garment to them all, is a long skir-tled Jacket or Cassocke which they fasten together with a buckle, but (for want thereof) with a great pin. The rest of the body is not covered with any thing, and they sit the most part of the day upon the hearth, somewhat neerer to the fire. Such as are of greatest wealth, doe differ from the other in their garments, which are not so ample or large as those of the Sarma-tes, or of the Parthians: but iustly fitted to the body, and such as maketh apparant shew of every member. They wear the skins of wild beasts, and such as dwell neereft to the riuers, are most curious of their habit: but they of more remote abiding, vs
no great cariosity, as being least careful what they weare, because they live so far from strangers. When they have made choise of their beasts skinnies, they do the like of fishes, taking such as are the greatest, or as the Ocean and most vnknowne Seas doe yeild, and fullest of spors, and so they fowe them together. The Women are no otherwise habited then the men:
but that the women are oftner covered with a garment of linnen, inter-woven with a scarlet colour. They care for no leeues on the height of their armes, but are naked downe from the very shoulders and part of the breast (neerest adioyning) is as nakedly discovered. Thus you see the gayest beaury of the Gaules, & how simple the Germans are in their garments: it remaineth now that we say somewhat of their houses and dwellings.

CHAP. III.

*Of the houses and dwellings of the Gaules;
their Townes and villages, and of what manner they were.*

He habitations of the Gaules
(according as Strabo sayth) are wide and spacious, made of earth and planchets of wood, & covered with strong reeds arched on the top together in form of a vault: for so Cæsar in the fifth booke of the Gaules warres saith, That the Lodgings of Q. Cicero in the fields, were co-uered with straw and reeds, according to the manner of the Gaules. And in his sixth booke he sheweth, that the more part of the Mannor-houses appertaining to the gentlemen Gaules, were in the woods, or on the riuers. Speaking of the house of Ambiorix, which was altogether engirt with woods, As were well-nere all (sayth he)

the houses of the Gaules are, who to burn the heate, do dwell in woods, and neere to riuers.
Cæsar deliuereth plainly, that the Aquitaines, Celts and first Belgians, had their Cities and Townes enclosed both with walles and ditches: but it may be doubted whether the like prouision was vsed among the Gaules further off, and such as were neereft to the North; as the Morini,
b. Aduanques, c. Menapians, and d. Eburonenses.

Cæsar declareth, That the most part of these Belgians, are descended of the Germaines, and saith, that the Germans had not their Townes and Villages made after our manner: as may bee observed by that which Tacitus hath written according to the custome which they had in his time. It is sufficiently known (saith he) that the German people dwell not in any

Townes, neither that they could endure to haue their houses neere vnto one another. They dwell distant or apart, scatter-ingly; where either riuers, fieldes, or woods do best content them. Their Villages are not after our fashion: for their houses do not touch or ioyn together each other. Euery one leaueth a great wide distance or compasse about his dwelling;
either to auoid the disastrous fortunes of fire, or else because they know not how to build better. They vse neither Morter nor Tiles: but the matter which doeth them service, is very rude, and is not prepared either for beauty or pleasure. They plaster some places much more respectiuely, with a kinde of earth so cleane & shining, as it seemeth to contend with painting, & portraictures of colours. They were wont to make causes vnder the ground, and co-uered them with thicke cloads of dung, to withdraw themselves thither in the winter time, and therein also to hide their Corne; because in such places, the colde weather had not so great power, & when the enemy came, he could make pillage of nothing, but what hee found readily discovered. As for that which was thus hidden or buried, Theeues not knowing thereof, would below the lesse paines & search, in further enquiry after it. Cæsar
speaketh (almost) as much of the Britains.
They termed it a Towne (saith he) when they had enclosed some tuffe wood with ditches and pales; whereinto they were wont to retire themselves, to shunne the courses of their enemies. And whereas Cæsar speaketh sometimes of certaine Townes of the Suenes: in mine opinion,
he is so to be vnderstood.

Returne we now to the townes of the Belgians, which are vp higher in the cos-try, and heere my question is: Whether they had any such Townes as the Britains or no? We will first of all speake of the Morini, who (according as Cæsar writeth) beganne to make war, but in a quite contrary manner then the other Gaules. For they hauing heard, that the very greatest Nations which had hazarded battel, were quite defeated and conquered: withdrew themselves & their goods into the strongest places, which were great and long forrests, encompassed with fenny or mar-thy grounds. Cæsar being come vnto the entrance of some such forrest, and hauing concluded there to fortifie his campe: as the Romans were seriously employed about their busines, the enemy (of whom they had no doubt at ally sallied forth vp-on them vnprovided, at most places of the wood, and charged the Romans very sharply. Hereupon, they betooke them to their Armes, and repulsed them backe into the wood, and hauing slaine a great number of them, pursued them thorough many vineasie places, yet with very little losse of their people. The next day following, Cæsar determined to fell down the Forrest, and suspecting least some harme might be done by the Flankers to Soldiers vnarmed: he caused all the trees which were hewne downe, to bee made as ram-piers against the enemy, and to serue as defences on either side.

Hauing made a great spacious country (in few dayes) by incredible diligence, after that the Romans had made themselves Maisters of the cattle & baggage which was in the rearward; they withdrew themselves into the thickest of the Forrest. Cæsar speaketh this of the wood of the Morini, which serued them as a Towne or Village. And the year after, in regard of the drought which had dried vp all the Marishes (as is to be seene in his fourth booke) they hauing no more refuges to flye vnto as they had the yere before, were (almost all of them) subdued by Labienus. In these two warres, hee ma-keth no mention of any other Townes, then of woods and marishes.

The like is affirmed of the Menapians,
in those Countries where the Romaine Legions were brought, vnder the conduct of Fabius and Cotta, as it is set downe also in his fourth booke. They made spoyles in the fields, destroyed the Corne, set the houses on fire; and all this happened, because the Menapians had hid themselves in the thickest Forrests. Afterward Cæsar himselfe came to them with fise legions.
But they (as Cæsar saith) not hauing gathered any forces together, trusting only in the security of the place, withdrew themselves into the woods and marishes, and carried thither their goods also. Cæsar
hauing diuided his powers with M. Fabius, who was his Lieutenant, and M. Crassus Treasorer of his wars, and hauing also sodainly provided bridges for passage, gaue them assault three severall

ways, and burning their houses and villages, made himselfe Master of a great number of men and cattle. The Menapians seeing themselves in this distresse, were constrained to send Ambassadors, humbly to entreat peace. In this place also there is no name of any village, or pregnant appearance that there were any, but such as wee have already spoken of.

By due obseruation of this discourse, perhaps the villages of the Nervians will appear to be even the like. The Nervians (this speaketh Caesar in his second booke) from all antiquity, not having any power of horsemen (for even to this day they do not add; & their mindes thereto, but all the strength which they have, consisteth onely in footemen) to the end they may impeach and withstand the horsemen of their neighbours, if they make any inroad upon them, to rob and spoile them, cutting downe yong trees that had not forth strong branches, they twined them together, and interweaving briars and thorns among them, they wrought them so artificially, that these hedges or fences served them as a wall; wherein not onely a man could not enter, but also he was vnable to see or discern any thing.

In the same warre of the Nervians, the women, & such as (in regard of their age) were not serviceable for bearing armes, had neuer any Village or Town for their safety, which was engirt with wals; but in such a place where there was no coming or entrance for an Army, because of the marshy grounds, which were the onely hinderance.

Now, in this first warre agaynst the Nervians, wee may plainly perceiue that they had not any Towne enclosed with wals; and we may well credit it by that which is in the first booke. For Caesar having assembled foure Legions with all possible diligence, entred (vnawares) into the Country of the Nervians, and before they could either draw their strength together, or tell how to save themselves; after hee had surprized a great number of men, and herds of Cattle, and dispersed the booty to his Soldiers; he layde waste their fields, and compelled them to yeeld and deliuer him hostages. This passage likewise of the Nervians, yeeldeth great coniecture, that they had no other towns or villages in those times, but like them of the Britaines.

It may appeare also, that the Aduaticates (by that which Caesar writeth in his second booke) haue had the like townes. Having forsaken (saith he) all their townes and Castles, they brought all their goods into a village, which was wonderfully strong by naturall situation. For, having (on all sides about it) huge rocks & down-falles of exceeding height, it had but one onely comming to it, which was hanging or descending downward, yet in a sweete and gentle manner, being in breadth no more then two hundred foote. This way or passage they had fortified with a double wall, of very great height, & the same was strengthened in many places with mighty huge stones, and sharpe-pointed beames or pyles. Heere Caesar describeth nothing but a wall onely, and on one side of the Towne. And the like may be easily proued in the Nation of the Eburones: who are also called Germaines by Caesar in his second booke. These men, vnder the conduct of King Ambiorix, had overcome Sabinus and Cotta, with fifteene Companies, neere to Vatunus, as it is set downe in the fifth booke. Caesar who had neuer received a greater iniurie, determined to be reuenged for this losse, and vtterly to abolish and ruinate the nation of the Eburones, as we may reade in the 6. booke. Therefore he sent Basilius on before with the whole band of horse, and leauing a legion for guard of the baggage, he diuided the other nine into three Regiments, to ouerrunne and make spoile of the whole Country. He caused Labienus to march with three Legions along by the Ocean, toward that part which ioyneth vnto the Menapians. Hee sent Trebonius with the same number of Legions, to facke that Country which was neerest to the Aduaticates. Himselfe, accompanied with the three other Legions, stayed to go toward the river Sabis, and the vtmost parts of the Forrest of Ardene.

The Eburones not having any certaine Army, neither garrison, or any Towne wherein they might defend themselves by Armes, and the whole popularity being scattered euery where abroad, required themselves to such places as were obscure valleyes, or wilde and sauage, or vwhere the moorish Fennes made a troublefome access to them; they presented them with some imaginary hope, that thus they might defend and save themselves. Caesar in this fiery heate of reuenge, perceiving the great danger which might ensue, by hauing thus separated his Legionaries, called all the neere-neighbouring Citties (in hope of booty) to come and make pillage of the Eburones, to the end, that the race and name of them might bee vtterly confounded. And because he could not (as yet) appease his thirsting soule by such spoile as he had made, which indeed was very great, he put himselfe once more on his way, to giue further vexation to his enemies, assembling infinite troopes of people from all the Townes & neere adioyning parts, and so sent them outward by sundry wayes. They burned all the villages, and euery house that they could finde standing. The selfesame desire of vengeance (as is to be seene in his eighth booke) enflamed him the third time, and the like waste he made: neuertheless, he speaketh not of any rampier, or of any ditch belonging vnto Towne or Village. Whereby may iustly bee obserued, that the Belgians as they were descended of the Germanes, so in like manner they had the same order of dwelling.

The Bellouaci, or Bellouasians in like sort, albeit that they were the very principal of the Belgians, as wel in regard of their vertue and authority, as for the great number of men amongst them: yet it appeareth, that they were no strangers to this custome: for in the first warre, he speaketh not but of one Towne or Village, named * Bracchifrancium; in the other warres, hee maketh no mention of any one. This may seeme to be spoken sufficiently enough, concerning the habitations of the Belgians.

CHAP. IIII.

Of the Humanity, Liberty, Hospitality, & Courtisie of the Gaules to strangers, and care for benefiting each other equally.

I finde nothing written in Caesar of the playes, sports, & pastimes of the youth among the Gaules. As for the Germanes, Tacitus writeth thus. They had but one onely kind of spectacle in euery assembly yong boies that conceived delight in this sport, would run or leape forth violently (and stark naked) before swords & laurel lines directed against them. This exercise grew to be an art, and Art made it verie gracefull in them: yet what they did, was not for any lucre, gaine, or wages; but the onely recompence of this their audacious gallantry, was, to bee pleasing in their eyes that beheld them. They would play (being in very stayed and settled iudgement) at such desperate games of hazard and dangerous aduerture, as would make a man blith to stand and looke on, and they performed their intentions in such earnest manner, as if they were at strife for some matter of great moment: yea, such was their affection to the gaine or losse, as after they had nothing els to contend for: they would stricke about the very last hazard, laying downe their own liberty and persons in pawne. Whosoever lost himselfe, would yeelde to the others seruitude, with his owne kinde consent: And albeit hee were neuer so young and strong, yet (in regard of his losse) he would suffer himselfe to be bound and sold. For such was their wilfull obduracy, that they would lay down faith vpon the very least occasion.

But whosoever would take note of the great humanity, liberality, and courtiesy, as well in the Gaules as in the Germanes, let him read what followeth. They would inuite strangers (this speaketh Diodorus of the Gaules) to feast with them. And after nature was sufficed, they would enquire what people they were, and what occasion drew them thither. But Caesar and Tacitus giue this commendation vnto the Germanes, by writing much more amply. They make it a matter of great Conscience (saith Caesar) to offer any outrage to strangers, who, be it for what cause soeuer they come amongst them, yet they will defend them from all iniuries, and thinke them to be sacred people, each one allowing them part of his house, & whatsoever he had to liue on. Tacitus writeth in this manner. There is not any Nation more addicted to make good cheer together, and feast strangers. They doe make great confidence in denying house-room to any commer; for each man will Feast him

As concerning the rites of hospitality, they make no difference between him that is knowne, and another that is vnknown. At his departure, if he desireth any thing, it is their order and custom to grant it : as they will doe the like when it falleth to their turne. They take great delight in giuing gifts : but will receiue no recompence for whatsoever they giue, or think themselves indebted or beholding for anything that they receiue. This is a testimony of their worthy hospitality, & I am of the minde, that so great an honour deserueth not to be forgotten, as Germany iustly deserueth in regard of this Vertue.

Phaleas the Chalceonian, did first publish in the Commonwealth (as Aristotle affirmeth) that goods might bee equally diuided, to the end, that the two principal plagues to mankind (which are riches and pouerty) might be banished from the City. And this is that which Plato (most of all other) wished for the grounded estate of a happy Commonwealth. But the Germaines neuer fixed their imaginations on such a most fortunate Commonwealth, by disputes and discourses onely, but accomplished and brought it to effect by their owne good customs and honest examples. For some of them (as Cæsar auoucheth in his sixth booke, speaking of the Germaines) had not any certain measure of land, or any particular limitation : but the Princes and Magistrates assigned euery year (both to kindreds and parentages, who were acknowledged and placed together) so much ground or land, and such a site or situation, as vnto them seemed best and conuenient ; & the year following, they were constrained to seek elsewhere. In his fourth booke, hee sayth as much of the Sarues, another people of Germany. They had no land which they held in particular, or diuided among the : neither were they permitted to tarry longer then a year in a place, to Til or make it husbandable. This is the equality of goods, which then was among the Germaines.

And they rendered great store of reasons for this equality, as the same Author witnesseth in his sixth booke, viz. Fearing least being retained by an accustomed continuance in one quarter, they should forsake the profession of warre, & follow the other more beneficial kind of life. Fearing, least they should withdraw their minds from the enlarging and extendure of their bounds or limits : and growing to be too potent in strength, they should ouerawe and expell the weaker from their goods. Fearing also, least they should be ouer curious in building, to defend themselves against cold and heat, and so proue to be starke Cowards. Fearing beside, lest a wicked covetous desire should arise among them, of scraping and gathering goods together : wheron (customarily) insueth threatnings, dissensions, & blood. Also, to the end that the popular sort might bee contained within a reasonable contentment of mind, when the meaneest perceived his goods to be equal with the most powerfull. This is (in effect) the words of Cæsar, touching the qualitie of goods vsed then among the Germaines : and when the Greekes come to compare with him, in commending this manner of behaviour either in the Cretanes or Lacedæmonians ; all that they could auouch or say, was, to terme this worthy and extraordinary vertue, to be no more then meer barbarousnesse.

Seruitude or bondage was in vse aswell among the Germaines and Gaules, as in other Nations. Many men (so speaketh Cæsar in his sixth booke, discoursing on the Gaules (finding them selves to be charged either with debts, or taxations, or injuries of the mightier sort) did yeild themselves into seruitude or slavery of Gentlemen, who had the selfsame right over them, as Masters had over their slaves. It should seeme, that this Masterie or command was cruell, as well as that whereof Titus Livius recounteth in his 2. booke, to be vsed in Rome, after that the Kings were expelled thence, when the commotion of the bondmen was on foote. For they were then controlled and handled by their Masters, as the bodies of debtors were by their creditors, who were parted (as Quintillian writeth in the sixth chapter

How the Gaules vsed to educate and bring up their children. Of their courage, manhood, and valour in Armes and martial exercises.

Here then were the maners and temperance of the ancient Gaules, which serued very sufficiently to maintain their disposition & strength of body, and (doubtlesse) was the cause of their admirable stature : whereat Cæsar was much amazed, when he beheld the Gaules which were slaine in the warres of Affrica: you haue also heard some part of their liberality, in the administration of their goods, for the releefe of others necessities. But there remaineth much more to say, if wee would enter into discourse, concerning all the parts of their maihood and valiancy: were it in considering the exercise of their youth, or their earnest & violent desire in following armes, and the Nations which haue beene conquered by them, and the Colonies established thoroughout the world, onely in the name of the Gaules. The Gaules (thus saith Cæsar in his sixth booke) helde this as a difference from others, in their manner of behauour, to wit; That they would neuer permit their children to come openly before them, vntill they were of able yeares to beare Armes. And they held him to be a villaine, whose sonne (being vnder limited yeares) should be found in publike before his fathers face. Cæsar speaketh this neuertheless hee giueth not sufficiently to be vnderstood, at what time or season they were to beare Armes, neither in what exercise their infancy was employed, vntill this date of expectation, therefore we must make search into other Authors.

Tacitus, speaking of the Germaines, would haue vs to know, at what time they came vnto the seruice of the Commonwealth. They obserued as a custom (saith he) that no one should undertake the profession of Armes, vntill the Commonwealth had approued and allowed his suffiof his third booke) or diuided betweene the creditors, according to the law of the twelve Tables. And that Law (as himselfe saith) which naturally was not to be allowed, and yet (notwithstanding) permitted as in right, was reprehended by publike custome, and oftentimes (to remedy the same in meere pitty) the Commonwealth granted Letters of respire, abolishing extorting interests, and making a new obligation for the principall.

But the Gaules vsed much greater humanity and liberality then the Romanes did; because the Masters kept in honourable place, and about their persons, such as thus stood obliged to them, and they vsed their seruice also in their warres. Wherefore it appeareth, that that which Didorus wrote, differed not from this purpose, where he saith; They employed as guards and defenders of their bodies, such as (among freemen) were poore and needy, and they serued them as Elquiers and Armor-bearers in the warre. Tacitus reporteth almost the very same custome as was vsed by the Gaules, when he speaketh of the slaves among the Germaines. They do not vse their slaves (saith hee) as we do ours, appointing them certain offices in our houses: for euery one serueth himselfe, and governeth his household affairs. The Master chargeth his slave with certaine measures of Corn, or with some Cattle, or with some kinde of clothe: euen as we do our Farmers or Husbandmen, and the seruant obeyeth him not but in such businesse. If he would haue any matter done in his house, his wife and Children performeth it. It sildome or neuer hapneth, that a master doth beat his slave or bindeth him, or enforceth and constraineth him to any businesse. They had a custome to kill them, yet not by any manner of rigorous or seuerer chastisement; but in choller, as an enemy, and done in the case of some reuenge. Freemen had no more advantages then seruantes. Seldom or rarely were they advanced in the house, and neuer vnto the managing of Commonwealth affaires: except among such Nations, as were in obedience to a king, and there they mounted higher then Freemen, or then Gentlemen. Among other Nations, libertines, being not received into the like dignities as the free, made distinction of their liberty.

iciency. Then, in the martiall Constitute, either some one of the Princes, or his Father, or els his nearest Kinsman, armed the young man with a shield and a Iaulin. This was the Toga or Gown which they tooke, and this was the first degree of honour, wherunto their young men mounted. Before, and till this dignity was done to them, they were but as a member of the house onely: but afterward, they appertained to the Commonwealth. Aristotle, who wrote long time before Caesar, declarerth vnto vs this manner of education of children (for it seemeth in the 8. Booke of his Politicks) that hee learned this instruction of vs. It is necessary (saith he) to accustom and vie the very youngest children to endure cold weather: for it profiteth marvellously, as well, for the disposition of the body, as for manly cariage in war. And this was the reason, why some barbarous people (as the Celts) obserued it as a custome, to plunge their young Infants (so soone as they were borne) in the coldest water of the riuer, or els to cloath them in light garments. For, to whatsoever thing youth ought to apply it self, this is the best course, to accustom them thereto (by little and little) from their youngest houre, and when they are tender, because of the heat which is naturally in them, & therefore the first thing to be done, is to be carefull in this one point.

Aristotle in this place calleth the Celts barbarous, and yet hee accounteth not their customes barbarous; in regard that hee appointeth the Greeks to fashion themselves after their manner. I know that Galen sharply reproveth this behaviour, when in the first booke of his Government of health, and instructing how to order health, he saith. I am not of the minde, that Children should onely be nurmed among the Germanes. Also, that which he writes of, is neither for the Germanes, or for any other such favage and barbarous men; no more then for Beares, wilde Boares, Lions, or such other beasts. I knowe (I say) that Galen reprehendeth this custome severely; but I know likewise, that the young nice delicates of the Greeks, whom Galen striueth to please, in prescribing them an order for their health: haue bene quite deuoured by these Lyons (as he termeth them) and that the Gaules and Germanes, if they be compared with the Greeks, may in good right be called Lyons.

And truly, Lacedemon, which was the most noble of all the Grecian Cities, was principally renowned for being studious in hardning it selfe to traualle, after the true manner of the Celts. For the youths of Sparta, did daily imbolden themselves against all manner of paines and exercises: neuer entering into the especial assembly, before the age of twenty yeares, as Plutarch recordeth in the life of Lycorgus. Wherefore, not onely the power of this vertue, which was in the Gaules and Germanes, but (ouer and beside) the authority of Aristotle, as also of Lacedemon (if any man be regardfull thereof) may well serue to answer the reasons of Galen. We may also inferre (to this purpose) that which Strabo hath written, when he saith, The Gaules held this as proper and peculiar to them, to refuse no taking of paines, as fearing to become fat and swoln belied by ease: therefore they punished and condemned vnto some pecuniary fine, such young men as grew grosse through sloath and excess. Whereunto that ordinance of the Romans was conformable; that deprived any fat or corpulent Knight, of the Horse granted him by publike allowance.

Now it is further to be considered, that this exercise was not onely proper or peculiar vnto the Gaules: but it was in like common vie with the Germanes their brethren, as Galen himselfe hath elsewhere declared, Let vs listen then to Caesar, who heerein giueth them sufficient commendation. From their infancy (this hee writeth in his sixth booke) they added them selves to paines taking, and employed (almost) their whole life time, either in hunting, or feats of warre. They had diuers kinds of wilde beasts, in the Forrest called Hereynia: as wilde Bulles, Alces, but especially Buffies, which they tooke with great labour in their dens or ditches, and there slew them. The young men hardned themselves to this trauell, and euermore exercised this manner of hunting: & they which had slaine most of them, bringing their hornes to publike view, as a testimony of their diligence, received both reward and great praise. This yeeldeth sufficient demonstration, how the young men prepared their spirits, to endure all paine and labour, and fell not off for any danger: as hauing learned, though not of great and skillfull Doctors, which were best able to giue them instructions & yet (at least) of their owne selves, and so put it in effectual execution.

Let vs now obserue what they were in actions of warre, and as the Poet sayeth; The braue workmanship of Mars, because the Gaules were perpetually in war. For, before Caesar came thither (as hee hath written in his sixth booke) it hapned euery yeare, that either they assailed others, or else were glad to defend themselves; and it was easily knowne, that by a custome among the Gaules, age was no excuse to any man, as appeareth by diuers passages in the eighth booke. Vertius, a chiefe Commander of the hemii, albeit he could very hardly keepe himselfe on horsebacke, because he was so farre gone in yeares: yet notwithstanding, according to the manner of the Gaules, hee would pleade no excuse by his age, in vndergoing such charges as were imposed on him; and he was very vnwilling, that any fight should be performed without him. Likewise, in the warre of the Parisi, the whole charge (as is to be seene in the seventh Booke) was giuen vnto Camulogenus, an especial man of warre. Aulerici, who was well-neere wholly spent with age: and yet for all that, the great experience which he had in martiall affaires, aduanced him to the highest degree of Honour. Answerable to this, Strabo saith, The Gaules were rather men of warre, then any way addicted vnto Tillage or husbandry.

Aristotle writeth, that the Celts helde the vertue of warlike actions in most singular respect and commendation. And it was well noted, as Caesar affirmeth, that the cause of valour (both in the Belgians and Helvetians) grew through their continuall exercise of armes, for he saith: The most valiant people of all the Gaules, were the Belgians.

Now, as Temperance was the first and formoll in ranke, as being the Mother, or the Nurse (at least) of true valiancy: so the second cause which Caesar rendreth, was; That they were neighbours to the Germanes, which dwelt on the further side of the Rhine, with whom they were continually at warre. This (I say) was another cause of their valor, that continually they exercised armes, and by the same reason, the Heluetians surpassed (in this vertue) all the other Celts: As it might daily be discerned, in regard, that ordinarily they fought with the Germanes, eyther in repulsing them from their frontiers, or making war on them in their owne country. In this place also might be alledged, their often and frequent skirmishes, to deliuer true faithfulness of their valour. Moreouer, the Gaules for want of warre, to the end that they might still be in exercise of armes: gaue themselves to thefts and robberies, as Diodorus saith, purloining the goods of others, without any prouision of their owne. What were the Germanes? saith he. What participation had they in this vertue? All their life, as hath bene already declared, was no way employed, but in deeds of armes. And as he hath further written in his sixth Booke, the very greatest honour that any City could haue, was, to haue a great Desert & spacious Country round about it. They esteemed it to bee proper and natural to vertue, to compell their expulged neighbours, to forsake their Lands and Territories, so that few or none durst dwell nere vnto them. And by this means, they imagined themselves to be in the greatest security, in being deliuered from all dread of courtes, which suddenly might be made into their Country.

Tacitus speaketh of the same exercise of armes. You could not so readily put into their heads, any order for husbandry in their grounds, or carefulnes for gathering their fruites, and corne, as to go assaile the enemy, and to returne back with wounds and maimes. Moreouer, it appeared to them, that it was meere sloth and carelesse, to winne that by swate and labour, which a man might purchase with the price of his blood. Caesar saith likewise of the Germanes, the same that Diodorus doth of the Gaules, that they were addicted to rapine and thefts. Robberies (thus speaketh Caesar in his sixth booke) did not make men any iot the worse esteemed: so that they were done out of those limits, which appertained to each City. And it is said that they vsed these courses: onely to exercise their youthes, and for the auoyding of ydleness. And when some one of the Lords would deliuer his minde in an open assembly, that he would be their guide, and that such as would follow him, should shew instantly themselves. Such as gaue consent to his opinion, and (allowing him for their Leader) presently arose, and promised him their vttermoſt assistance; the people present would both commend them and their enterprize. As for such among them, as neither followed, nor gaue allowance to the attempt: they were reputed as traitours, and neuer afterward durst any man repose any credite in them.

Tacitus addeth yet moreouer, that the Germanes made war among strange people. If the City (saith he) wherein they were borne, grew slothfull and ydle, thorough long peace and repose; the moſt part of the yongest Gentlemen went (vp on their owne motion and good will) to finde out such Nations as had any warre. For rest and ease was no way pleasing to this people; and the dangers which they essayed and made prooffe of, made them also the more famous: and they could not maintaine any great matter of worth, but by power and warre, for thus they compassed meanes to be bountifull and liberrall, onely by warre, thefts and pillages.

Thus we may perceiue, how the auncient Gaules made continual exercise of armes, and well deserued those commendations, wherewith the first and chiefeſt of all the Romaine Poets shewed himselfe willing to honour Italy.

Oh, would it had pleased God, that Caesar, discoursing on the fashions and customes of the Gaules, had bene as willing in describing much more amply, what vie they made of Armes; what reasons they followed in their preparation for warre; what diligence they vsed, being in the field; what their strength and valor was in fights & combats: it would haue caused an extraordinary pleasure, to remember continually, the ancient custome of our auncestours, in their warlike actions. But Caesar (principally) sheweth nothing of all this: neuerthelesse, we will pursue each matter, insofar as is possibly wee may, and diligently collect somewhat out of diuers passages of his, (as wee can follow any traces, though greatly obscured) in such things as are agreeable to our purpose, not forgetting (in meane while) the iudgement of other Authors.

published an assembly in armes against the Romans; as is to be seen in the fifth booke of the warres in Gaul. The Gaules began their warre in this manner, & followed one common Law among them. All their younger men vsed to meete together in armes: but he that came latest, in the presence of the whole assembly (after hee had bene tormented with all the tortures could be deuised) hee was afterward put to death. The selfe same custom is declared in the seventh booke, when Vergin, being elected Generall for the warre of the Gaules, was besieged in * Aulx. For he tooke counsell, to discharge all the troupes of horse which he had with him, and at parting, he gaue the charge, to returne each man to the City, whereof he was a member, and there to assemble or muster for the warre, all such as were of age to carry armes. Neuerthelesse, the Gaules hauing published the assembly of their Princes, did not thinke it meete to draw all the together, that were of age to beare armes, according as Vergin, getorix had ordained; but rather appointed, that each City should be furnished with a certaine number of men; it could not otherwise chuse but breed confusion by being vnable to command them, or knowing one from another, or any possible meanes of prouision for them. By this manner of ordering men for their warres, we may well perceiue, that the Gaules were studious in military affaires, considering, that all such as were aboute fourteene yeares of age, did carry armes.

The Gaules armed themselves quite contrary to the Romans, as is to be observed in the seventh booke, where hee speaketh of the * Hedui, that came to the seruice of Caesar, who very greatly astonished the Romans, by vsing their armes after the Gaulish manner. And yet I cannot perceiue (throughout Caesar's discourses) what those kinde of armes were: therefore we will collect that which Polybius, Diodorus, Strabo, and Titus Livius haue noted to vs. The sword which they vsed, was long, and the man wore it (hanging in a chaine of brasse) on his right side: and it serued not onely to smite or flasse withall, but also to thrust or foine, so saith Diodorus; notwithstanding, Polybius and Titus Livius doe deny their thrusting or foyning with the point.

Their Target or Shielde was large, and answerable vnto each mans stature or constitution: and, according to their seuerall delight or pleasure, so was it enriched with Imagery of brazen Beasts, mounted vp into bosses. Their Laurel had a head of yron or Steele, containing a cubite in length, and two fingers breadth. Caesar in his third booke saith, that they likewise carried a staffe, which he termeth Geses, & another, called by him Meris, which was a certaine kind of small laulin. Their heads were couered with a Sallade or head-piece of brasse, a little exalted or raised vp, whereon was figured Images of Birds, Beasts, and antique shapies. Their vsual Corcelet was of yron.

Many of the Gaules were wont to fight naked, so farre as the naut: as Titus Livius saith, in the battaile at Canabai, and Polybius speaketh as much of the same fight in this manner. It was a very dreadful sight, to obserue the behavior of naked men, who marched on stoutly, shewing an excellent beauty, and vndauntable strength. In like manner, Titus Livius saith, that in * Galligracia, the Gaules fought naked, and that was the reason, why they were overcome by the Romans, who smote them as farre off with their Piles, which were a kinde of small laulins, and darted at them very strongly. The Gaules likewise vsed Bowes and Slings, according as Strabo saith; for he writeth, that they hadde a kinde of Staffe, which being throwne by the hand onely, without any string or other holde, would smite further off then an Arrow, and with this they did (most commonly) shoote at Birds. It is also very certaine (as the same Author affirmeth) that they hadde a Tree in Gaul, somewhat resembling the Figge-Tree, which carried a fruite, that had some likeness to the chapter of a Corinthian pilier. This Tree being cutte, did yeeld a deadly iuyce or liquor, wherewith they vsed to imppoyson the heads of their Arrows. That it was so, and that the Gaules were great Archers, Caesar prooueth verie preagantly in his seventh booke, where hee speaketh of Vergin, getorix. Hee commaunded (saith he) that all the Archers (which were a very great number throughout Gaul) should be leuyed, and sent vnto him, as it will appeare much more fully hereafter in better place.

This was the Armor and Munition of the Gaules, whereunto that of the Germanes, which Tacitus describeth, was not altogether agreeable. They seldom defended themselves with swords or long staves: for they carried lauelines, or (to use their owne proper word) Framies, the blades whereof were straite and short, but yet so keene, and so apt for their seruice, that they could vse them with or against a staffe, according as they had occasion to fight, either before they came neere to one another, or when they were at handy grips. The Horsfemen contented himselfe with his shield and laueline: but foot soldiers had many darts each man, which they hurled or darted infinitely, being naked, or lightly clothed with a simple Cassiocke or Mandillion. They had no brauery on their accoutrements: onely, they would decke their shields with some curious choise colours. Very few of them did weare any shirts of Maile, or scaled coats: some one or two might haue (perhaps) a Caske or Morion. These are the Armes which the ancient Gaule are credibly said to weare.

It remaineth now to speake, how they employed their men of warre, as well on foote as horsebacke. The horsfemen were in most estimation among the Gaules, and had the principall managing of all affairs for warre, as Cæsar hath saide in his sixte Booke. And in the League which all the Gaules made against Cæsar, one while hee speaketh of the number of eight thousand horse, then againe of fiftene thousand, which was that part of the army, whereby the Gaules made themselves strongest, as plainly appeareth in the seauenth Booke. Neuertheless, no assurance can bee collected hereby, concerning all the cities in their seuerall forces. The people of Trenet, or the Treniri, were the very strongest of all the Gaules in horsfemen, as is to be seene in the fift booke. The Sannones, according as wee read in the third booke, had likewise very great store of horsfemen: but the Nervians (in the verie same place) are said to haue the most foot soldiers. Norwithstanding, if you regard them generally, you shall finde, that the Caually had the cheefest honour of all the warres among the Gaules. And these were the horsfemen, where with Cæsar vvvas most assisted in his ciuill wars. For he himselfe testifieth in the first booke of his Ciuill Warre, that when Affranus came with great forces to assaile the Cæsarians who were but a few in number: sodainly the horsfemen of the Gaules were diligent in making head against them; and (so long as they could) they maintained fight, albeit they consisted of so few, and endured against a great multitude of the enemy. But so soone as the Ensignes of the Legions began to approach; with verie little losse of their men they retired vnto the neighbouring Mountaines. The time of the fights continuance serued sufficiently for the Cæsarians safety: for, in that while, they had leisure to gaine themselves the highest parts of the hills, & there sheltered themselves securely.

Likewise, in the warre of Africa, when the enemy (with powerfull forces) came to deale vvith the host of Cæsar, and to attache them in the reer suddenly the Legionaries stayed them, and the horsfemen (although they were but few in number) made very stout resistance, yea, and vvith vvunconquerable hardiment, against that great troope of the enemy. And a matter almost incredible happened, That lesse then thirty horse of the Gaules, repulged two thousand horse of the Moores, and put them into rout. Such was the strenght of the Gaulish horse. Hence ensued that exclamation of Cicero in his 5. Philippick.

Opinim was concieued (saith he) that some appointed, that there should be giue to Mark Anthony, the gouernment of that latter part of Gaule, which Plancus holdeth at this instant: Is there any other wisdom in so doing, but to lend our owne weapons to an enemy, to make a ciuill warre vpon vs? For first of all, the nerves or sinewes of warre, which is countlesse summes of money, and whereof hee standeth now in neede; and next, the power of horse, which valoweth as much; what can be desire more then both these? Behold, in what account and estimation, the horsfemen of the Gaules were.

Sometimes it was thought conuenient, to entermingle amongst the horse some of the foote soldiers, which vvore worst armed, and the Archers. And this was (as appeareth in the seauenth booke) when Vereingetorix went vvith the Horse, and certaine foote (least charged vvith Armes)

Armes) to prepare an ambuscado, where he imagined that the Romaines intended to come and forrage. At another time, (in the same booke) speaking of himselfe, when they were neere to Gergonia, Cæsar saith: It was not fully breake of day, when in the skirmishes, the footemen being mingled among the horse, we were forced to approue how hardy and vertuous our owne men were. Sometimes, the Footemen, being lightly armed, accompanied vvith the Archers, fought amongst the Horsfemen, as was obserued in the encounter neere to Alexia. The Gaules (among some few of their horse) flanked their Archers and lightest armed footes; to the end that they should succour the horsfemen, and sustaine the violent assault of the Romaine Caualry.

Ancient Gaule had * Effedaries, who were warriors that rode in Waggon, called Effedæes; and Diodorus giues vs assurance hereof in these words. Palsing thorow the Countrey in time of warre, they vsed Carres or Waggon, which two Horses drew by a fit prepared furniture; the Waggoner, or he that had the charge thereof, being the only guide. If they met vvith the enemy in warre, first of all, and while they were vpon the waggon, they would let fly their darts at him. Afterward, alighting from the waggon, and being on foote, then they fought together vvith their swords. These two manners of fighting, are much more at large described by Cæsar, when hee speaketh of the Germanes and the Brittaines. Of the Germanes in the first booke, where hee reckoneth vp the forces which Arminius had. They were (saith hee) sixe thousand Horsfemen, and as many foot, of the very strongest and best disposed, which each man had made choise of particularly, as for his owne succour and safety. If they were to set on to the warre, they mingled one among another, and the Horsfemen also retired vvhen they did. If any great occasion happened, the foote soldiours fought vvith the horsfemen. And if any one being wounded, hapned to fall from his horse, the other gaue present succour. If they were to march on further, or to retreat vpon expedition; exercise had instructed them in such celerity, that onely by salting hold on their horses Maines, they would mount vp, and run as swiftly as they did. In another passage of the 4. Booke, speaking of the Suenes, hee saith. In those skirmishes which they made on horsebacke, they would oftentimes dismount and fight on foote: hauing caught and inured their horses in such manner, that they neuer stirred from the place where they left them, returning to their horses againe, when occasion required. According to their custome, they esteemed nothing more base and idle, then to ride on Saddles. And this was the reason, that although they were but few in number, yet they durst boldly assaile any troopes whatsoever, if they were Horsfemen, and rode on saddles.

This is that which Cæsar hath written; whereby we may gather, that herein the Gaules were contrary to the Germanes order: considering, that the Germanes placed their strenght in their men on foot; which Tacitus relateth more apparently. Whosoever (saith he) wil consider them in general, shall finde, that their cheefest power consisteth in their footemen: and therefore (in fighting) they ranke them among the troopes of horse. For the footmen which they choose among all their youth, to put to the point of any danger; are men of wonderfull swiftnesse, apt and fit to fight among the horse. They are an hundred, chosen out of euery Towne or Village, and thereon were teamed Centeniers, or Centurions: for that vvch serued (before) but to signifye the number, was now giuen as an especiall name, and was honourable to them. Thus serued the Horsfemen of the Germanes, and were mingled in this manner among the foote soldiers.

Now, as concerning the behaviour of the Brittaines, Cæsar in his fourth booke, describeth it in this manner. They haue a manner of fighting on Chariots or waggon, which is thus. First, they skirmish on all sides, and hurle their Darts, and oftentimes it happeneth, that by the terror of their horses trampling, & by the noise of their Waggon wheels, they trouble the ranks extraordinarily. But after that they are mingled amongst the troopes of horsfemen, they defend from their waggon, and fight on foote. During which while, the Waggoners withdraw themselves somewhat out of the fight, and arrange their waggon in such sort, that if their

The adrestie and direction of their hories, the order observed among their footmen for fight, and their aptnesse thereto, by dayly vñe and exercise was such: that when they lifted, they could sodainly stay their hories, euen in the midst of his swiftest course, although it were in descending downe a high hill. There could they readily mannage and turne them, running mainly by the bridle among the horse; & thence againe returne lightly vnto their Chariots. This manner then of fighting, whereof the Eshedaries made vñe, was somewhat also mingled among the horse and foote.

Moreouer (as is to be seene in the seauenth booke) a great number of VVaggons attended on the Gaules, especially such as were vnarmed. Next, of the Archers of the Rutheni, and the horsemen of Gaule, which had followed Caesar; there came into Spaine, with a great number of waggons, all filled with baggage, according to the custome among the Gaules. Beside, there were of men and women, about six thousand, with their seruants and children: and because they took delight, in hauing beasts for portage and cariage, they were glad to pay deerly for them, as Caesar hath recorded in his seauenth booke. Hereby wee vnderstand, that not onely the men, but their children also, yea, the whole Families in Gaule, went to the war when occasion required. Tacitus writeth also, That the women followed the Germanes, and accompanied them to their warres. But this is sufficient, concerning such leuies and preparations for warre, as was vsed among the Gaules.

Now it would be knowne, with vvhat ease they could endure the scarfard of victuals, by the temperature of their nourture, hauing formerly auoided the delicacy of wine: and Caesar giueth vs to vnderstand (in many places) how they wer provided of victuals. The Heluetians departing from their houses, caried meale (that was formerly ground with them) to serue for 3. months. And Vercingetorix to take away from the Romans all means of recouering foode, perswaded the Gaules to burne the Towns and Villages on all parts where the Romans might make any inua-sion. Whereupon more then 20. Townes (belonging to the Bituriges) were burnt in one day: and the like they did vnto the Cities in the neighboring countries. But, at the instant intreaty of the Bituriges, who required, that Avaricum (which was the very goodliest City in all Gaul) might not be burned: it was granted by Vercingetorix, who first had debated for the contrary, yet after yielded, as well in regard of their earnest motion, as also in meere pity and commiseration. But the pity afforded to this one Towne, caused most cruel ruine of all the other cities and Townes in Gaule. For Caesar's armie, that had bin very mightily tormented with famine, and had endured diuers daies with out power of recouering any thing to make bread of: after the surprizing of Avaricum, was now not onely stored with plenty of food, but being refreshed as it wer with hope of like following successe, it made them to deuoure vp all Gaule.

At another time, Vercingetorix (by virtue of the same counsell and aduice) constrained Caesar to forsake Gergonia, and hauing taken all the victuals which the Romans had then in Neuiodunum, brought him into such distresse, that had it not bin for shame, tediousnes of the way and absence of the 4. Legions, Caesar was setting forward to go into Prouence. Vercingetorix, being elected capitaine General thoroughout Gaul, vsed (at a third time) the selfsame aduice; when in a publike assembly of the Gaules he said, that he would not tempt his fortune, & giue his enemy batel, because he was strongly defended with horsemen, wherby he could easily hinder the Romans from food and foraging. And it behoued euery man (of his own good will) to destroy his Corne, and burne his houses, considering, that by this little losse, which each man might well endure in his own particular, he should perseiue, that their empire and liberty, would (for euer) be the surer maintained. And vndoubtedly, Caesar being moued by these occasions, purposed to withdraw himselfe into Prouence, thorow the country of the Seguanii, when Vercingetorix (too inconsiderately) condemned the good counsell giuen him, & would not tempt fortune, by hazarding the batel. & turned all his intentions fil to the worst: wherby may be observed, what care the ancient Gaules had for provision of food.

Now if we desire to know, what order was vsed among them in the field, either for marching, lodging their armies, or obseruation of military discipline; it seemeth that they were not therein any more curious. The Heluetians essaying to passe a riuer, somed times diuers boates together; others would leape into such places, wher the Rhone was most easie for passage, oftentimes in the day, and more often in the night, but Caesar euermore gaue them the repulse. The Gaules not hauing (as yet) learned the manner of making bridges, could not (in the space of twenty dayes) passe the third part of their army, by such boates as they had fastened together: and this was their want of knowledge, in the arte of making Bridges. If we look vpon the seating of their armies, and their fortifications in the field, they were as slenderly skilfull therein. They would make choise of a valley, that had no other Rampier or Ditch, but Heauen and Earth to succour and defend it. For the custome among the Gaules, was (as we may reade in the eight booke) to refuse and forsake high places, and to order their Campe neere vnto Riuer. So it appeareth in the first booke, that the Heluetians encamped at the foote of some hill, euen as the Germans did the like: but the Romanes euermore elected the highest places. The seating then of the Gaules Campe was in this manner, without any kinde of fortification. The Campe of the Belgians (as is to be seene in the second booke) according as might be iudged by their fires and smoke, consisted of more then eight miles in largenesse. And when they declared most care & warinesse, they would onely plant their Chariots and Waggons foremost, which serued them as their cheefest Rampier. In like manner, the Germans would, engirt their whole army, with their Waggons and Chariots. At length the Gaules began to imitate the Romanes, in such matters as they perceiued to be best behouing for the, or whatsoever they did for the best advantage.

The Neruians (as wee reade in the fifth booke) enclosed that place, where Cicero bestowed his winter abiding, with a rampier of cleuen foote in height, and a ditch of fifteene foote deepe. They had learned this, by their practise of warre against the Romanes, and by the helpe of such prisoners as they had taken. But wanting such tooles and instruments, as were necessarily required in this businesse: they were constrained to cut the greene turths or fods with their Swords, and to carry both them & the earth, in the long skirts of their Iackets. Afterward, they began to raise Towers on the tops of their rampiers, and to make mounted roofes and Tarrales, according as their prisoners had instructed them: in so much, that Caesar (at length) wondered, to see what Towers, Tarrales, and Fortifications they enterprised and performed. These passages of Caesar, do sufficiently declare, that the Gaules were not wanting, eyther in naturall disposition, or in care, to performe what was necessary, but only came short of orderly discipline.

In the seauenth yeare of the Gauls warre, after great store of losses had happened; Vercingetorix comforting the Gaules, declared vnto them, that it was reasonable & expedient (for common safety of each one) to begin to fortifie their campe: to the end that they might the more easily endure the sudden assaults of their enemies. For in those times (saith Caesar) was it, that the Gaules began first of all to fortifie their Campe. And therefore Caesar did especially marke and nominate it in that place. And the first fortification which they vsed, was at Gergonia, when they made a wal about their camp, which was fixe foote high, of great thick stones. Afterward, neere to Alesia, where they made a ditch and a wall, containing fixe foote in height. The Latine word Maceria, which signifieth a wall of stones, heaped together without mortar or lime, & whereof Caesar maketh vñe in the second place: declareth what manner of walles they had, which were rudely constructed, and without any cunning. The Gaules then (aunciently) had so little knowledge or discipline.

But what valour or manhood did they vse in fight? Was there any such matter of worth in them? Vndoubtedly they repoled a very great assurance in their owne strength. The Gaules, as was noted in the warres of Africa, were naked or vncovered, and vsing no kinde of surprizing: had a custome to fight onely by valiancy, and not by any sleight or cunning. And

That they had learned of their Fathers and Auncestors, to fight more for manhood then arte, but he made himselfe strong, onely by surprizes. And for prooffe of this military vertue, there are very singular examples in many places of Cæsar. In the battaile of the Helueticans, albeit that from the seventh houre (as is to be seen in the first booke) they had fought till darke night; yet no man could euer see the enemy to turne his backe. The Belgians in like manner (as it is written in the first booke) neuer being daunted or terrified with the slaughter of so many of their owne fellowes, cruelly flane before their faces: in resolute assurance, essayed boldly to march ouer their dead bodies. The Nervians likewise (as appeareth in the same place) eue in the latest hope of their safety, declared an extraordinary signe of their vertue. For, albeit such was the very cheefest amongst them, lay butchered on the earth before them: yet they kept neere still to them, and fought standing vpon their bodies. Yea, and that in such manner, as they which remained alive, making hilles of dead mens coarffes, threw their Darts against the Romanes, as from the top of a Butte, and cast also their lesser Iaulins at them, to long as they were able to reach them. This agreeeth with that which he speaketh of the Gaules, who were in Cæsar's seruice, when

* Munda in Spain, was round about engirt with the bodies of enemies, that had bene slaine, and lay there in their armes. In stead of turffes of earth (saith Horius) they piled and layed dead bodies one vpon another, and for the seruice of a Palliadeo, they couered them with their Shields and Iaulins, and their swords, with the heads of men, were all placed & turned towards the Towne of their enemy: To the ende, that they should apparently behold the true Ensignes of their valiancy, only to affright them, while thus they were circled in, as in a rampier. Thus the Gaules hauing made a round wall of their enemies bodies, and mounted thereon; they began to assaile the Towne with violent deliuey of their Arrowes and Darts.

They had learned this manner of making a rampier of dead mens bodies, from a custome vsed in their owne Country, and hereence (in mine opinion) grew the coniecture made of the Gaules, whereof Aristotle writeth in his Ethicks to Nicomachus: That they feared not anything in the world, neither scorplings, burnings or any torments whatsoever. And to this effect, was that which Strabo writeth of the Gaules, concerning their answer to Alexander, who demanded of them, what it was that they feared most? Nothing (saide they) if the Heauens tumble not downe vpon vs. I perceiue also, that they were euen as neglect and careless, in chusing the aduantage of place for fight, as they were in the seating of their Campe, which may evidently be discerned in all the Commentaries of the Gaules warres. When the Helueticans and Nervians assailed Cæsar, it was in a place very disadvantageous: but if they lighted on any other, that might declare them to be any way better aduised; it was by some former patterne of the Romanes, and obseruation of their discipline. And the first time that they entred into any good order, was, when the army vvich they had vsaylled out of diuers Countries, and the Souldiours then vvere generally distributed, according to the Countries whereof they vvere, and so placed (separately) the forces of each City in his due rancke or degree. So in the battaile of the Nervians, the Atrebatians vvere ordered on the left side, the Nervians on the right, & the Veromanduans in the midst of the battaile. Lik vvise in the seventh booke, vvhere hee maketh mention of the forces of Vercingetorix. The Gaules after they had broken the bridges, kept themselves firmly on a little Hill, confiding in the situation of the place, and being generally diuided, according vnto the Cities vvhereof they vvere, and placing Guards at euery Foord & Thicket of the Marsh; they impeached them to their no meane disadvantage. In the same place againe, Vercingetorix hauing planted his Campe on a Hill neere to the Towne, lodged separately also the forces of each City; yet leauing some vvide and spacious roome about all their lodgings, and being possessed of all the smaller hilles that neighboured the greater, vvhen any aduantage might be had for looking downvvard; he made made a shew verie dreadful to behold. And euery day, euen from the point or breake of day, he caused the chiefe Commanders of such Cities (as he had chosen to be of his counsell) to come before him, whether it were to conferre about some matters to be done, or execute any thing that depended on their charge: so that no one day might escape him, but some essay or other was made of his courage, & of the vertue that liued in his followers; making out many fallies of horse, mingled with the best and choysiest of his Archers.

In the first booke likewise, the people called Tigurines, which were vnder the city of the Helueticans, all the other three companies hauing passed the Riuer Arenaria; were surprized and enuioured aside by themselves. And they of the Borough Verbigena, because they fled away with the other; being afterward brought before Cæsar, they were receiued as open enemies. The Germanes obserued the same order, to diuide themselves generally by nations: as Tacitus deliuereth more plainly, where he saith. And that which principally did encourage them, was; that not hazard, or an assembly made at aduerture, or a troope, or a squadron; but the families and alliances laboured together. One example hereof in the Germanes, is noted by the that followed Ariovistus, who in the end (as we reade in the first booke) were compelled to fend their forces out of the field: and made a generall ordination (by equal interualls) of the Marcomani, Triboci, Pangiones, Nomentani, Sequians and Sueci. Wherefore I conclude, by the words of this passage, that in regard the Army of the Gaules consisted of many Cities; the Souldiers (generally) did diuide themselves, according to the number of the Cities.

The Gaules vsed the phalanx in theye battailes, as the Romanes did their Legions. The Phalanx, subtilly explicated by Aelianus, both in parts and parcels, to be of an equal number, eight times diuided into equal parts; the summary whereof, I thus comprehend. The Phalanx, armed with weighty armours, consisted of foure thousand, ninety sixe men, each ranke whereof, contained in length sixteene Phalangaries, and was termed Decuria: in which bands, the formost man was named Decurion, and the last Vergiductor, that is to say, hee which conducteth the Rereguard or hinderpart. These formost men were also called Præfites of the seconds, by reason of their marching before, and so the third men of the fourth. Contrariwise, the second men were termed Subfites to the former: as being vnder them, like as the fourth vnder the third. Thus the Decuria was composed of Præfites & Subfites, the one following the other. The second Decuria, was called Condenaria, that is to say, conioyned to the Decuria, in such manner, that they all answered both in place and number: Decurion to Decurion, Præfites to Præfites, Subfites to Subfites, and they which accoafed, or went along by, were termed Adfites. The ordinary space or distance of the Phalangaries, was foure cubites, but vvhen they closed, two, & when they went in crowd, one onely. This was the manner of the Phalanx, obserued by the ancient Gaules.

The battaile of the Helueticans (as is to be seen in the first booke) kept it selfe strongly lockt against Cæsar's horsemen, and when the horsemen were repulsd, the Phalanx, which was prepared vnder the first battailion, aduanced it selfe, and set forward. But the Romanes (by the power of their Iaulins) brake the Phalanx of the Helueticans, by reason that they vvere too strongly lockt together: And then, to defend themselves against their Iaulins, they began to disioyn their vniting, & to combine their Targets and Shields, the one with the other, which were in the forme and shape of the shelles of Tortuiffes, to receiue and resist the Iaulins darter at them. In the same booke also, the Germanes hauing suddenly (according to their custome) prepared a Phalanx; vvithstood the strength of all theye Swords. And I perceiue, that this Phalanx was ordered in such manner, not to serue as a defence for their heads; but rather as a Rampier for their breasts. But on the Helueticans day, the Boji, or Boians, and the Tugi, or Tulingians, who came thither for their succour; enclosed the battaile round about with Chariots and baggage, and guarded the rereward. And as the Helueticans (who had the worst, & of whom the greater number were forevvounded) retired, and vvithdrew themselves into the neereft neighbouring Moun-

CHAP. VII.

Of the shows, cries, & strange noises devised and used by the Gauls, to comfort and encourage themselves, and to affright or dismay their enemies. Also of their signes of contentment, peace, mercy, their Barre, Songs, and Richmes.

A viall matter observed in Military discipline, & how it was among the Gauls.

Mountain: they assayed the Romanes at vnawares on the Flanks, and engirt the round about. Which the Helucians beholding, they returned againe, began to recharge them, and fought valiantly with them.

Thus wee haue heere set downe some forme of that fashion, which the Gauls obserued in preparing their battaile, and that which Hirtius hath spoken thereof, is not much differing from the purpose. That the Gauls, being in battaile, had a custom to sit downe vpon Faggots of Vine branches and small twigs, which they placed in the ground. Now, albeit he reporteth, that Cæsar hath declared the same in the first booke of his Commentaries, yet notwithstanding, I finde no such matter. But forasmuch, as the Gauls (in their battails) are said to sit downe on Faggots: it was a kinde of discipline obserued among the, like to that of the Romane * Triarij, who being ranked in the third battalion, which was the reeward, vied to kneele down on their knees, which was termed by the Latines, Subfidere, whence ensued the word Subside as they named it. This cometh somewhat short of the order obserued among the Gauls: but many matters more might be related, concerning the encouragement they gaue to one another for war-service, which principally employed their minde, and boldly animated them on to vertue.

found of Trumpets: but with a Song, a Dance, loud yelling, clattering of their armour, and brandishing their darts, to make a noise so terrible, as nothing could appeare to be more horrible. The Gauls (saith Diadorus) had loud, big, and rude voyces, & their Trumpets (according to custom) were barbarous, & made a rude harsh sound. But Polybius (in his second booke) sayeth moreover. The brauadoes & noises of the Celts, were dreadfull to the Romanes: for they had an infinite number of Trumpets and Hobois, with the found whereof, the whole Army cried out aloud, making so great a clashing and noise; that not only the Clations & army echoed the found, but all the places likewise that did round engirt them. And indeed, the noise which customarily was made by the Gauls, hath oftentimes bene noted by Titus Livius: but yet hatefully and iniuriously, as (for the most part) he was wont to speake of the Gauls. The Gauls (saith he, in his first booke) by singing fauagely, and crying out confusedly; filled the ayre with an horrible found. And in the same place: Immediately there were heard songs and noises disagreeing, as when the Gauls walked (by troops) about their wallies. And afterward in the foure and thirtieth Booke, he saith. The Gauls went marching forward, howling or yelling strange ly, and singing according to their confused fashion, shaking their Targets ouer their heads, and brandishing their Darts in their hands. Then againe in the foure and fortieth Booke, speaking of the Gauls which were in Asia, he saith. Beyond all the rest, their singings, when they began the battaile, and their howling, yelling, and dances, couering themselves with their Shields, after the manner of theyr Country, with the horrible clattering of their armour: all these things were done on deliberate purpose, onely to procure affrightment and terror.

Cæsar toucheth this tumultuous behaviour more lightly, in his first booke, after the ouerthrow of Sabinus & Cotta, where the Gauls hauing the victory, hee speaketh thus of them. Then, according to their wonted custome; they cryed the victory together, and howled loudly. And at another time, in the seauenth Booke, speaking of the Gauls nere vnto Alexia. The Gauls (saith hee) perswading themselves selues to be the stronger part, and perceiving the Romanes, that they were pressed with great numbers on all sides: they that were within the Fort, and they that came in, their assistance, with a loude cry and yelling, assured the courage of their people. Moreover, that which gaue greatest terror to the Romanes, was, the loud cry that they made at their backs, in the time of their fighting. It was likewise a custome among the Gauls, to require parties or conference, by making a loud cry, as by a Trumpet: according as Cæsar in his first Booke, speaking of the Eburons, saith. Then, after their vsual manner, they made a loud cry together; to the end, that some one of the Romanes might come forth, to admit them parties or conference.

It may appeare now as conuenient, to speake somewhat of those signes which the Gauls vied, to signifie, when theyr hearts were appeased and quieted; when they desired peace; and when they were willing to yeelde themselves. The signe which they vied to make, when theyr hearts were contented and quieted; was, to shew their right shoulders naked. Cæsar, speaking of the Hedunans, in his seauenth Booke, saith thus. Whensoever their right shoulders were seene to be naked: it was their accustomed signe, thereby to declare, that they were contented. The signe of desisting peace, was, to extend or stretch out their hands: as hee speaketh in the second Booke, discoursing of the Bellouasians. The women and children (being on the wallies) according to their wonted behaviour; would stretch forth their hands, thereby desisting peace of the Romanes. Which he farther relateth in the seauenth Booke, speaking of the women of Gergouia: who bearing their breasts, and stretching out their hands vpon the wallies, required mercy of the Romanes. In the same place also, hee declareth what signe they vied, when they were willing to submit themselves. The Hedunans holding vp their hands; gaue notice thereby, that they would yeelde themselves. And holding downe their armes, they requested thereby, that their liues might be saued.

But perhaps these things may seeme to be of slender account: therefore I will conclude the noyes made by the Gauls, and search into the behaviour of the Germanes, whether they were of like condition, or no. It should seeme, that it was the Barre of the Germanes, whereof Tacitus maketh such mention. They had certain pleasant Songs and Richmes, at the found whereof; that which they termed Barre, enflamed their courages; and by the Song, they prefaged the ende and fortune of the future battaile. For they were cheered or dismayed, according as the Army made the noyes; and this accord in singing, seemed not to consist so much in the voyce, as in vertue. They did principally respect the rudeness of found, and confusednesse of the noise; by holding their Targets before their mouthes, to the ende that the voyce (being made thereby the greater and fuller) might rebound the louder and stronger. Such then was the noyse of the Gauls, chiefly when they came to the shocke or brunt, and when they would enflame their Soldiers courages: for the women Gauls (alwaies) had some part in this encouragement. You will hardly credit, that mens hearts would be more enflamed, by the exhortations and reares of their dearest wiues; the they could be by the found of Trumpets and Cornets. The prooffe hereof, is to be seene in the 7. Book, when at Gorgouia, the mothers of the families began to pray with earnest affection, and to shew their haire disheueled, after the Gaulish manner, and to make presents of their young infants. Such was the exhortation at the siege of * Massyia, after that all the Ships on the Sea were readily prepared at the instant entreaties & reares of the old men, of the mothers of the families and their daughters, who desired that to succour the City in extreme necessity: they had no lesse heart and resolution, to mount into those Ships, then they had before in fighting the battaile. Then might easily be discerned, both from the Camp of * C. Trebonius, and all the places of highest prospect in the City; how all the youth that remained within it, and all the oldest men, with their wiues and young children, stood as publike guardes, and (vpon the wallies) helde vp their hands to heaven, or ran to the Temples of the immortal Gods, where prostrating themselves before their Images, they entreated victory of the Gods.

This hath some resemblance with that which

which is written of the Germanes, in the first booke: And the women, holding up their hands to the Souldiers, which were going to the warre, with teares entreated them, that they would not suffer them to fall into the seruitude of the Romanes. Therefore, when the Germanes were ready to fight, such things as were in their deereſt eſtimation (as Titius reporteth) they would haue in ſome place neere vnto them: where the out cries of their wiues, and lamentings of their children, might eaſieſt be heard; theſe ſerued them as moſt ſacred witneſſes, and theſe were their cheefeſt commendations. They would bring the wounded perſons to their mothers and wiues, and they feared not to number and ſucke their hurts; carrying food to them, and any thing that might harten them againe to the fight. Some ſay, that diuers battels, which began ſuddenly to quaiſe and breake off: were as ſuddenly re-enforced and purſued by the women, euen through the conſtancy of their praiers, beating their hands on their naked breſts, & ſetting before their eyes, the danger of their neere-enſuing captiuitie, which they feared the more impatiently, in regard of their Wiues and Children. Wherefore the wiues of martiall minded men, did declare themſelves alſo no leſſe valiant and reſolute.

But Caesar, in attributing very great courage to the Gaules, doth yet (I know not how) reproch them, with a quite contrary negligence or cowardice. For, like as the hearts of the Gaules (ſaith he in his third Booke) are prompt and deliberate, for the attempting of warre: euen ſo is their courage dull, and weak in reſiſtance, to ſupport any miſchances. In briefe (as we may reade in the eighth Booke) a man cannot well iudge, whether the Gaules are more inſolent, when their affayres do go neuer ſo little ſucceſſfully with them; then they are eaſie to be affrighted, when neuer ſo little harme befalls them. This is that alſo, which Titus Livius reprehendeth with ſuch inſolence, as euery where hee ceaſeth not to taxe them with ſomewhat fauouring of the ſame nature. As in the fiſt Booke concerning the gowned Gaules. The Gauliſh nation are accuſtomed to colde and raine; but they cannot any way endure eyther duſt or heate. In the tenth Booke. The bodies of the Gaules, which cannot abide tranſaſſe or heat, do yet melt themſelves with ſweating. They enter fight like more then men; but their ſiſſue is leſſe then women. In the 37. Booke. Their big bones that can ſuffer no labor, will toyle with weighty Armour on their backs. In the 40. Booke. Heaue and tranſaſſe are ynkoſome to the Gaules quaggy bodies; becauſe they are not able to endure thiſt. In the 48. Booke. ſpeaking of the Gaules of Aſia. If their fiſt ſallault be endured, which they ruſh into with boyl-ling courage, and blindfold fury; their lazie members will ſhake themſelves into ſweate, and the weapons will fall out of their hands. The Sun, duſt, and drought, without imployment of any weapon againſt them, doth dol their foggy bodies, and abate their ſtreameſt courage; if they horrage and fury be once over-paſſed.

Titius giueth the ſelfe ſame dull diſpoſition to the Germanes. Their great bodies (ſaith he) that haue no other ſtrength, then (at the fiſt on-ſet) to ſlew theſelves forward: are not accuſtomed to ſupport (with any patience) either paines, biſſines, thiſt, heate, colde or hunger. How doth this hold together? According to the iudgement which Caesar hath giuen of the Gaules? Are they both moſt valiant, and yet foggy fellows alſo? Vndoubtedly, al the Gaules are reported to bee (euen naturally) martiall and valorous; and being exerciſed in military diſcipline; they are the more hardened againſt any trouble; but wanting exerciſe, they grow the more foggy & ydle. Cuſtome and vie do teach men to ſupport any toyle, and to hold good defence againſt all danger; for the trouble of warlike diſcipline, admitteth neither ſinerie or ſoftneſſe. If we meete with ſome old Souldier, who, becauſe he is expert in warre, is ſcareleſſe of blowes: If likewiſe a new friſh Souldier be brought in, that hath his hart as ſtout and reſolute, & as yet vnexperienced; yet his beſt courage will appeare to be but womanly ſo writeth Cicero in his ſecond Tuſculanes.

Therdenneſſe and ſoftneſſe is reprehended in the Gauliſh Souldiers; as namely by Vercingetorix, and Crotignates, one of the Aruerni, in the ſeuenth Booke. For there he ſaith, that the Gaules deſired to fight, in regard of their ſoft and tender diſpoſition, becauſe they cannot long endure any toyle. The ſame man at the council council which was holden among them, that were beſieged in Alexia, and ſtood in great diſtreſſe, through want of victualles: againſt ſuch as were of the minde, to hazard all at once ſally, he ſaid. This is indeed meece cowardice, weakneſſe, and no ſigne of courage, or any ſort of vertue, to declare your ſelves vnable, to endure dearth by ſcarſy ſalliers a while. Prooſe may be produced, of more men that gladly offered themſelves to death, then could patiently ſuſtaine greefe or annoyance. It is not then to be doubted, but prompt & ſtout courage, eſpecially in warlike enterpriſes, was hereditary (both by nature and race) to the Gaules nation, and that this ſoft or tender complexion, grew through lacke of exerciſe, in military diſcipline. For, if a Gaule had beene once well inſtructed, by a Maſter, ſkillfull in the arte of warre: where was any Souldier to be found, that could more ably endure all labour? If thou doe inferre any doubt in this caſe, prooſe thereof was made by Caesar himſelfe: For Caesar leuied ſixe Legions of the Gaules, becauſe he could riſe no more then foure of his owne Common-wealth. Caesars horſe-men were knowne to be Gaules; and thereupon, after he came to the head of all his enterpriſes: hee naturalized all thoſe Legions, which not onely were Gaules by Nation, but they retained (beſide) the name of Alauds. Wherefore, this ſoftneſſe in the new or young experienced Souldiers, was as common to the Romanes as Gaules; and was no otherwiſe proper, eyther to the Gaule or Germane Nation.

But Titus Livius, with I know not how many Greekes, is too iniurious and inſupportable againſt the name of a Gaul, and forgets withall, the kindeſſe which hee ought to his Country, and to the law of hiftory. For, although hee much better affected, to make the Venetes or Venetians, to defend from the traitor Antenor, then from the Nobility of the venetian Gaules, as Strabo hath done, and the Romanes approve the ſame, placing the Venetes or Venetians in Gallia Togata; yet thereby hee maketh himſelfe to be a Gaule. And the law of hiftory doth command, that in the relating of a hiftory, he ſhould ſtand cleare from ſuſpition of being touched with fauour or hatred. But whereas he repro- ceth the gowned Gaules and Affians, with the ydle matter of cold, becauſe they dwell in the hottreſt Countries, and ſuch as were neerer to the Sunne, then the Pataniens or Pataniens, among whom Titus Livius was borne; doth he not mocke himſelfe as fooliſhly as can be deuſed? As for the Gauliſh Souldier which Caesar had, and who was the very braueſt man of all other whatſoeuer: this man beliaeth him manifeſtly. And it appeareth very probably, that Caesar had to deale with thoſe men onely in that Gaule: but in the other partes of the world, hee fought againſt women, in regard of thoſe men hee found in this Nation.

Of the difference betweene the Souldiers of Caesar and of Pompey, being the valiant Gaules, in comparing them with the Romanes: As alſo of the Spaniards and the Gaules, and what cunning they learned of the Romanes.

OW, to ſpeake of Caesars Souldier, againſt the Souldier of Pompey, that is to ſay, the valiant Gaul, what was hee againſt the Romanine? In the third booke of the ciuill warres, Caesar ſaith: The Army of Pompey was not accuſtomed to paines taking. Why then Titus Livius, by the purity of his eloquence, which Quintilian compared to the whitenneſſe of milke, hath drawne the Spaniards and Gaules forth the corners of the world, onely to make himſelfe liſtened vnto, according as Saint Hierome writeth. Notwithſtanding, in this delicacy or ſoftneſſe of not enduring paine, heate, thiſt, nor duſt, which hee reprehendeth in the Souldiers of Gaule; himſelfe ſheweth the ſoftneſſe and affection of his owne ſpirit, which cannot any way abide equity, the grauity of hiftory, ſoundneſſe of iudgement, and truth. For, to be ſoft, or hardened againſt toyle, is not any thing that proceedeth eyther from Nation, or race, but by breeding and diſcipline.

Caesar then did but right, in giving to the men of Gaule a great courage, & truly warlike: and yet neuertheless, he discovereth in this great minde or spirit, a certaine want of discipline, or much rather hereproeth a kinde of simpleness, and an ill audited assurance of their strength, which was the fault that was most noted in their warres, according as Strabo writeth in his fourth Booke.

The Gaules very easily assembled together in great number, because they were simple of spirit, still followed iustice, right and truth, being moued and affected by the losses of their neighbours. Whereupon it happened, that the more easily they were chased out of their Country: because in assembling all their forces, or rather their whole families and friends, they were throwne out by them that proued the stronger. The Romans did much more easily subdue them, then they could do the Spaniards: for the wars in Spain were begun long time before theirs, and yet notwithstanding, they were brought to end after theirs. And betwene both these times, they conquered all the Gaules, that were betwene the Rhine and the Pyrenean Mountains: for in coming to the field so many together, they were ouerthrowne by multitudes together. But the Romans managed their battles more sparingly, and, euen as if they had a desire to some affected kinde of monies: so did they preferre them from one time to another, and from Country to Country, making their warre still cautiously, like unto thees.

And that which Strabo hath written, may sufficiently be perceived by the examples of Caesar. The whole City of the Helvetians, there being all the people of twelve Townes, and of forty Villages: did fight all at one instant, and in one instant also were all ouerthrowne. Such was the league of fifteene people of the Belgians. Such was the reuolting of the Armoicians in the warre of the Venetes, or Venetiens. Such was the conspiracy of the Aquitains against Craffus. In briefe, did not all Gaule put it selfe in Armes, and was it not wholly conquered in one warre, nere vnto Alexia? The Gaules in the eight yeare of their warre, both well felt and knew this fault, as Hirtius saith, and that in regard of some great numbers, which still were affembled in one place; it exceeded possibility to resist the Romans. But if diuers Cities (at one selfe same time) had made warre in diuers places: the Romane Army could neither haue had sufficient succour, leysure or forces, to vndertake all at once.

Neuertheless, the Gaules were not allways of so simple and open spirit: but at some-times they declared more cunning, and holpe themselues by some surprizes. Caesar, (as Suetonius saith) neuer suffered any one occasion of warre to be lost, were it neuer so vniindifferent; setting as soone on the allied and leagued, as on enemies: and yet notwithstanding, all the warres which he made, hee still pacified with good & sufficient colours of reason. The Eburone-Gaules payed Caesar with his owne vnfaithfull dealing. For these Gaules aduertising the Romane with the conspiracy, which all the Gaules had agreed on together: made him beleue, that if hee would come, and leaue the field, they would giue him free passage. Through this deceit, a Legion, and five Cohorts or Companies (with Cotta and Sabinus, which ledde them) were all vanquished. And albeit, that the Romane was then alike in number and strength to the Gaules (as Caesar confesseth) yet was he foyled by the Gaules subtilty, who had learned this craft of Caesar, and therewith repayed him.

Hirtius recounteth the like ambuscades of the Belouasians, or Belouanians, who hauing vnderstood the lodging of the Romane horsemen: tooke a number of light and nimble spirited footemen, and en-ambushed them in a place thickly couered with wood. On the morrow, they sent certaine horses thither, which might allure the Romane on, into the compasse of the ambushment, and when they were once in it, they presently charged them. And the fortune of this mis-happe fell on the men of Rheims, who were appointed as Guards that that day. For they hauing feene (too suddenly) the enemies horse-men, and knowing them-selues to exceede them greatly in number, making no account of so fewe as they seemed to bee: they rushed forth, and ouer-hotly pursued them, euen vntill they were (on all sides) environed by the Foote-men to their no little astonishment, which caused them to retire much sooner, then skirmishes of horsemen were wont to do; hauing lost Verisicus, Prince of the City, and cheefe Commander of the horsemen. This shewed no simpleness in the Gaules, but meere quaint cunning, learned of the Romans.

In the very same place, Hirtius declarerh the like cunning stratagem; as that which Hannibal vied, to deceyne Fabius. The Belouasians (saith he) perceiuing that the Romans were ready to pursue them, and that they could not (without danger) passe the night, or sojourn longer where they were: they deliuered (by Oath) from hand to hand, the Faggots and small bushes whereon they used to sit, and whereof they had great store in the field, all which they placed before their Army: and at the ending of day-light (vpon a fire suddenly giuen) they set them all on fire. So the flame, which followed it selfe in great length, immediately hindered, that the enemy could not discover their Forces: and which being doone, the Gaules very speedily withdrewd themselves. Caesar, albeit he could not perceine that the enemy was gone, in regard of the fire (made before them: yet notwithstanding suspecting that they had done this deuice, so the end that they might flye, caused his Legions to march on, and sent out troopes of horsemen to pursue them. And yet, being mistrustful of some surprizall, & doubting lest the enemy might still lurke there, with intent to allure the Romans to some disadvantage, hee marched on the more aduiscely. The horsemen, fearing to enter the smoke, and if any one (by ouermuch forwardnes) did enter, he could not see any thing before or behind him: grew all suspicious of some secret ambush, & so gaue leysure to the Belouasians to retire thence. Thus the enemy, by means of a flight (full of feare & craft) hauing marched about ten miles of the country, without sustaining the least losse, seated their campe in a very strong place.

Oftentimes thenceforward, & by many ambushes both of horse & foot, they did great damages to the Romans, in their wandering abroad, stealing and foraging: whereby it should appeare, that these attempts fauoured rather of a Punick spirit then of a Gaulish. And yet neuertheless, when all came to al (as we vsed to say): they were surprized by the hands of their matters, & by the selfe same deceits & subtil-ties which they had learned of Caesar. And to the end it might bee noted, that the Gaules had no more cunning or craft then what they learned of the Romans: the Heluetians (as Orsius writeth in his first booke) surprized the Consul Caesius, with all his army, by an ambuscado. But I haue concluded with my selfe, not to omit one manner of ambushing, which was the most maruellous of all those that euer I read of, or heard reported; whereby the Prætor Posthumus was ouerthrowne of the Boian Gaules, as Titus Livius reporteth in his 33. booke.

While matters went on in these doubt and uncertainties, tidings came of another losse, according as fortune (in that yeare) still re-charged one vpon another. And these were the Newes, that Lucius Posthumus, designed Consul, was ouercome in Gaule, both he and his Armie. There was a verie great Forrest, which the Gaules called Liua, thorough which Forrest, he was to passe his Army. The Gaules, on both sides of the passage, had cut and hewne the Trees of the Forrest in such sort; that (yet notwithstanding) they parted not from the trunk or bodie, but must endure hard thrusting and enforcement, before they could possibly get the to fall.

Posthumus had two Romane Legions, and had leuyed for many people, allied vnto the Romans, that hee brought into the enemies Country, well nere the number of five and twenty thousand men of Warre. The Gaules, who were ambushed in the Forrest, when the Armie was entered within the VVood; threw downe the aforesaid hewne vnder-growing branches, which were apted for the present purpose; that falling still thickly one vpon another, without any possible means of restraining them, they ouer-turned (pell-mell) both Men and Horses, in such manner, that (very hardly, and with much paines taking) tenne men of them escaped. For the greater part were slaine, by the falling of the huge branches and armes of Trees on them; and the Armed Gauls, that held possession of all the VVood, put the rest vnto death, vvhoe were not a little affrighted at this so strange misadventure. Verie few (of so great a number) were taken; who in going to the bridge of the riuer,

CHAP. IX.

In what manner the Gaules fortified their Cities and Townes; and what Engines they employed for their owne defence.

After what manner the Gaules fortified their Townes and Cities.

VT this is enough already spoken, concerning the manner of behaviour among the Gaules, as well in ranged battails, as in ambuscadoes:

it remaineth now to speak, how they fortified their Cities and Townes, and contrarywise, how they were besieged. How was it then that the Gaules strengthened and fortified their Townes, and what Engines had they whereby to defend themselves? There neede no wonderment bee made, at the fortification of the Morini, Nervians, Menapians, Aduaticans, and Eburones, because they had no Townes at all. And thence ensued it, that the Aduaticans marvelled so strangely, to beholde the warlike Engines of the Romans; whereof it is thus written in the second Booke. Being fortified with a rampier of twelue foote high, which had fiftene thousand Towers and strong Bastils nere to each other; the Romans kept themselves within that Fort. Afterward, when the trailes and platformes were readie prepared, mounted aloft, and a Tower to be raised some long distance off: at the beginning of these vnwonted workes, the Gaules beganne to laugh on their walles, and lowdly to mocke at them, maruelling what they did undertake so farre off, and with so huge an Engine, or how it should bee possible, that the hands and strength of men (especially of so meane stature) could promise any hope to themselves, of comming nere to their walles, with a Tower of so great a composition. But when they (soone after) perceyued, that this mighty frame mooued from place to place, and approached nere vnto they walles: being astonied at a matter of such nouelty, and fight vnaccustomed; they sent their Ambassadors vnto Caesar, to entreate peace; who answered them, That they must thinke, that the Romans neuer made any warre, without the speciall fauour of the Goddess: seeing they could aduance (and in foorth a while) an Engine of such height, to fight both farre off, and nere at hand; and therefore they should submit themselves, and all their goods to his mercy. Thus spake Caesar. It would require so much speech (saith Cicero in his second Tusculanes) concerning the new fouldier, & the old: that if wee make comparison of one that hath not bene exercised with him which is tried and skilfull; he will appeare no otherwise, then meere as a woman. All which notwithstanding, the very selfsame Gaule, being instructed in the Discipline of Caesar, seemed as a God to another Gaule, that neuer had knowledge in that Art.

But let vs leaue these Belgians which dwelt so farre off, and come vnto such as were more ciuillized, as the Suessones, and the Belouacans. The Suessones (saith Caesar in his second booke) when as the Treilles were prepared against Nouiodunum, one of their cheefe Townes, and that the platforme was mounted together vnto the Treilles: as men amazed at so great an enterprise, and such strange workes, which the Gaules had neuer seene or heard of, yet so speedily performed by the Romans; they sent their Ambassadors toward Caesar, to entreate that they might yeeld themselves. The Belouacans also, hauing not (as yet) seen such Engines, vnder which Townes were battered, but onely hearing report made of them, surrendered the Towne of Bratupantium. Wherefore, if the Gaules (as Caesar affirmeth) had neuer either seene or heard speech of such instruments, vntill that verie time: why then should we make any maruelling, That the Gaules, who had not yet learned such cunning, were conquered by other Gaules, that had knowledge in them? Now, whether this place in Caesar, which treateth of the Belgians, was purposely written, or (at the least) may seeme not to bee written according vnto truth, there be the question remaineth. For, the Gaules made their their walles with strong beames of wood, which were not planted vp on one endes; but couched downe, & ioined together, with spaces of earth betweene each two beames, whereof Caesar speaketh thus in his seventh booke. All the walles (saith he) of the Gaules, were (well nere) made after this manner. They lay beames of wood strait out along on the ground, and followed after fill in the same order, making equall distance betweene them, about the space of two foote in breadth. These beames or platts, as some terme them, were reuced and bound within, with strong forced earth; and the equall distances (whereof we haue spoken) were filled vp with great stones, which fronted the wall forward. After that this rowe was all along thus ranged and ordered; another like frame was laid thereon, after the same manner; yet so, that the beames betweene both, did guard and keepe the maine Timber from touching each other. And being distanced allo by the selfe-same space; they were knit and shut fast together, by great stones cast in betweene them. And so, consequently, all the whole worke shaped it selfe in this manner, euen till the Wall was perfected to a reasonable height.

Now, concerning this kinde of building,ouer and beside, that it was no way mislapp, by the order kept in the leueling, and fitting both the beames & stones aptly to each other: euen so it was greatly commodious, in seruing for the defence of their Townes. For the stones were apt and proper, to impeach the force of fire, and the beames and other matter, brake and resisted the blowes of battery. Because, they being bound together inwardly, and knit to the Timber beames running all along, containing (for the most part) in thickness, the measure of forty foote; could (by no means) be forced to sinke, or be otherwise dismembred. Hereby then it may appeare, that the Gaules knew some-what for the fortification of their Cities and Townes; yea, and how to defend themselves also, by such means as were vsed in the warres.

In the third yeare of the warre in Gaul, the Sintone Aquitaines were besieged by Crassus and his men, both with Treilles and Towers: but they resisted him valiantly, one while, by making faillies out vp-on them, another while, by vndermining, till they came to the great planted platforme, which formerly had bene provided, by means of the treilles. To which vndermining (saith Caesar) the Aquitains were well inured: because they had Mines of Copper and Brasse in many places. So much Caesar wrote, approving, that the Aquitains knew well enough how to defend a Towne or City; because they had Copper Mines, which made them therein very skilfull. It is saide also, that the Celtes (for the same cause) knew well how to defend themselves at the siege of Anaricum: because they had very deep Mines of Iron in their Country. For Anaricum being couragiously assailed by the Romans, the Gaules found out all sorts of inuentions (as Caesar saith in his seventh Booke) whereby to giue impeachment to the most singular enterprises of the Romane Soldiers: as hauing (by naturall inclination) a very ingenious and subtle spirit, apt to follow and counterfeite all things, and whatsoever they sawe done by others.

First, for the Romane Falx, they could overthrow it by a snare or grinne, and when it was remounted, they would againe hurle it downe with their Engines. They covered all their walles with towers made of skinned, and equalled the height of those towers made by the Romans, with masts made in their owne turrets. In making their faillies abroad; either they would throw fires into the platforme; or suddenly surprize the amazed Romans; or by vndermining, overthrow the maine fortification. Whereunto (indeede) they were the more apt and ready; because they had great yron Mines in their Country, and knew (beside) all kinde of deluding into the ground. By leauing their Mines open, they impeached and tardyed the Romane preparations: mingling fire with pitch and other matter, made apt to burne wherefoeuer it fell, and tumbling downe great stones also, to keepe them from approaching nere to their walles. By these cited places it appeareth evidently, that the Gaules had attained vnto some indifferent knowledge, how and which way to defend a City: but to speak truly, it was more through their continual exercise in their Mines, then by any cunning they had learned in the art Military.

The Gaules were more full of courage than discipline.

And this is that whereof Vercingetorix complained, comforting the Gaules at the taking of Avaricum. That the Romans had not wonne the victory, either by vertue or battaile: but by a kinde of science and cunning, which they had in the battning downe of Townes, wherein the Gaules had no knowledge. By which words, that place of Cesar which concerned all the Gaules in general, seemeth to be true: That the Gaules had never seene, or heard any report, of Plat-formes, Trelles, nor Towers. But bee it so, that the ancient Gaules never knew any such Art, as the Romans did; yet there was no want of courage in them. For, it is a matter very marvellous, which Cesar himselfe speaketh of them in his seaventh Booke, in remembering their constancy, for guard and defence of their Cities and Townes.

The Gaules, in the warres of the * Cimbrians and * Teutones, being wholly constrained to retire themselves into such places as were strongest, and being there also oppressed with great famine & lacke of victuals: they did yet maintaine their lives by feeding on the bodies of such, as both appeared, and were not able indeed to do any further service in the warre, & would (by no means) yeeld to their enemies.

Critognatus, who was a man of great ranke among the Aruernians, held a verie strong opinion in counsell, that it was good to put the same in practise for the defence of Alexia; and although hee had made no vse thereof before, yet hee earnestly maintained the fitnessse and necessity thereof, onely for liberty, and that it was worthy to bee left (as a memorable custome to posterity. This opinion helde such account amongst the other Gaules, that they were of the mind, to assay all other means whatsoever, then to doe according as Critognatus had aduised. And yet notwithstanding, if there wer such vrgent necessity, and ayde tardied too late in coming; that it was most behouefull to credit his iudgement, rather then to yeeld, or listen to peace-making, vpon enforced or violent composition. Such was the courage of the ancient Gaules.

Now this kinde of defence, which they vsed for safeguarding their townes, though it proceeded from no meane Vertue in them, yet it did not relish of any great discipline. In what manner also they assailed Townes, was without any craft or subtle device. For they neuer help themselves, either by Platformes, Rampiers, Trelles, or Towers, as it is described in the second booke. The Gaules and the Belgians, had both one manner of assailing Cities, to wit Cesar. For after they had ringed (after the order of crowding together) a great number of men about the Town; they would hurle heaps of stones vp on the wall, vntill they had left it naked of men. Then, winding and turning, according as occasion serued, they approached to the gates, and vndermined the walles. Thus then their whole manner of making war in places fortified with rampiers and ditches, doth giue vs to vnderstand, that the heart and courage of the Gaules was very great; and yet very little or no discipline at all vied amongst them. Let this then suffice, to acquaint ye with the order of their land seruice.

CHAP. X.

Of the seruice on the Sea, or other waters, vsed by the Gaules: And what Ships and Vessels they had among them. Also, into what farre remote countries they extended their name.

Concerning that vvch they performed on the Sea, as it is described in the warres against the Brittaines and * Pe- netes, it appeareth to taste of vertue, although it was simple, and without any great cunning. Cesar describeth it in all parts, with the matter and manner of such ships or vessels, as the Gaules then vsed, speaking thus. Their Ships were made and armed in this manner. The keeles of them were much larger then those of the Romanes Ships: to the end, that they might the more easily sustaine the cbbing and flowing of the Sea. Their Prowers were highly rayfed, and their Poupes also: because they were the more apt to hinder the power of great Waues and Tempests. All their Shippes were made of Oake, to indure all iniury and violence that could happen. The binkes were made of timber beames, about a foote in thickenesse: and they

they were toyed or fastened together with iron mauls of great bignesse. Their Anchors (in stead of Cables) were made fast with chaines of iron: and for want of other sailes, they made vse of skimmes and hides, which were soft and pliable with currying and parring: And either through the want of tempe, or knowledge how to vse it (which is the more likely) they imagined, that if they used other sailes, they could not resist so manie tempests of the Ocean, and such impetuous winds as daily arise, neither so commodiously convey such great burthens, as they carried in their vessels.

In another passage of the fourth booke he sheweth, that the Gallies, whereof hee himselfe made Rruice, both against the Brittaines and the Venetes, had not bene vied on the Ocean, vntill that instant time. For, the Romanes being somewhat hardly pressed by the Britains, on the shore of the Ocean; Cesar commanded, that the gallies (which these poor barbarous people were not wont to see, & which could be managed most readily in any buisines) should be set apart distant from the other ships, and that they should be moued by the strength of Oares: to the end, that they might be ranged against the flanke of the enemy, which was discovered; and whence they might repulse and recoil the enemy by the dint of their weapons, and Engines of warre, vvch auailed the Romanes very greatly. For the ignorant people, being amazed at the fashion of those vessels, and the moouing of their Oares, as also the manner of their vnaccustomed Engines, stayed their proceedings, and (soone after) retired.

Thus farre we haue heard the ancient fashions and behaviour which the Gaules vied in actions of warre, and vvch haue bene collected out of many places declaring them to be much greater in naturall strength, then in the course of Martiall discipline. Whereby we may perceiue (in regard that their vvares were managed by vertue, & not by any flights, cunning, or trumperys) they were the maisters of all or most nations. For they pursued their purpose, euen as Geographers were wont to doe, to make all the Earth habitable, euen from the Suns setting, so farre as his rising. Brittain, Spaine, Italy, Germany, Illyria, Pannonia, Greece, Macedonia, yea, Asia it selfe, can declare the Empire of the Gaules. For Brittain, which was along the sea coast (as Cesar faith in his first booke) had bene conquered by them that passed from Belgia, going thither for pillage, and to make warre; and they named themselves according to all the Cities titles from whence they issued, and hauing made warre there, they inhabited, and began to plough and husband the grounds. VVhat shall we say of * Celiberia? Doth it not deliuer sufficient testimony, that Spaine was subdued by them? For, to what purpose else should Lucane lay?

But it may be, that Italy came not vnder the gouernment of the Gaules: Yea, that it did soundly, and at the same time when Tarquinius Priscus reigned. The Ituriges, Arernians, Sennones, Heduanes, Ambarrius, Carnutes, and Auleres, vnder conduct of the Sollumians, Boians, & * Ingones, preuailed so farre, that that Italy, which reacheth along fro the Alps, coasting still to the Apennines, and so farre on as the riuer Rubicon, became Gaule. And finally, after that they had ouerthrowne the Romanes seere to Alba, they tooke Rome and burned it; and hauing agreed for a thousand pounds of gold, they folde the Capitoll (which they kept besiedged) to the rest of the Romanes which were enclosed therein. And hath not furious Germany borne the yoke of Gaule? In elder times (faith Cesar in his sixte Booke) the Gaules excelled the Germanes in vertue. For the Polce and Tell of ages, vnder the conduct of Sigauelus, possessed themselves of the most fertile places in Germanie, euen those which were nearest to the Forrest Herernia, as Titus Linius also relateth.

Tacitus maintaineth, that the Colonies of the Heluetians & Boians were brought into the same place. But those Gaules, the conquerors of Germany, being made bold and hardy, by such simplicity in diet as the Germanes vsed, extended themselves much further, and the renoune of they name, went (with great honor) thorough Illyria, Pannonia, Greece, Macedonia, Thrace, and Asia, according as Iulius (following Tragus) declareth more at large. And the name name of the Gaules was so much feared, that Kings (not constrained, but on their own meer motion and good will) bought their peace of them, with great summes of money.

Being conducted by Belgus, they slew Ptolemy, King of Macedon. Led by Brennus, as making small account of the spoils of men; they sacked the Temple of Apollo, which was in Delphos. Afterward, a new Asmie of the fame Gaules, which were dwelling in Germanie, having formerly driven in rowte the Gotes and Triballes, and inforced Antigonius, King of Macedon, to forsake the Field: thence they passed on into Asia, where they made such a dreadfull terrour (as Titus Livius, the great blamer of the Gaules name, saith in his eight and forty booke) amongst all the Nations, which were on this side the Mountaine Taurus, that not only they among whom they came, but such with whom they neuer were (both neere and farre off) did ranke themselves altogether vnder their obedience and subjection.

Not long after, because they consisted of three Nations, to witte, Tolistoboges, Trocmes, and Tectosages, they divided Asia into three parts, to the end, that each Nation might hold his share tributary to himselfe. The coast of the Hellepont was assigned to the Trocmes. The Tolistoboges had the Æolides and Ionis for their part. The Tectosages had the Countrey which was in the middle of Asia, and raised all their souldiers pay, at the charge of that whole Asia, which was on this side Taurus, making their abode neere to the river Halys. And their name was so much feared (in regard of their great number) that they became (afterward) a people of no meane parentage: inasmuch, that the Kingdoms of Syria refused not to pay them Wages. Thus hath Titus Livius, written, concerning the entrance of the Gaules into Greece and Asia. Whereby, I have observed, that, in regard (as I have formerly sayde) their warres were managed by vertue, and no craft or guile: the due commendation of the Gaules valiancie, was iustly comprized within those limites and Countreys, as the Sunne observed his course, from his rising, to his fall.

But in following time, thorow lacke of Military Discipline, or else (much rather) by reason of discorde, which greiv among themselves, the Cenomanians, hauing difference with the Togates, the Masfilians with the Braccates, and Medians with the Comates: they help the Romans, to bring their owne Countrey into thraldome; betraying all Gaule, to subiect it to the Romane Empire. And that which is much more, to the end, that in this case we may more admire the Gaules Vertue, they being well instructed in the Art Military, and all together having encountered Cæsar, who was a most excellent Maister in actions of warre; within the space of foure yeares, ouerthrew the whole Romane Empire, which had led it selfe by so many warres, and multiplicity of ages. For herein Cæsar had the consent of the Gaules, onely against whom, (as Propertius prophesied) not all the inhabitable world knew how to make resistance: yet, the only consent (I say) of the Gaules, and Gaule onely, stood against all the other Provinces of so great and mightie an Empire. Why then, thou Man of Gaule, thou deseruest his best honour for this Vertue; for encreasing the dignitie and glorie of thy Countrey, and not the tyrannie of a stranger: Thou (euen of thy selfe) hast subdued Italy, Spaine, Greece, Egypt, Asia, Affrica, yea, and Spaine againe: in briefe, thou hast conquered the whole Empire of the Romane people.

But this may seeme sufficient (if not too much) to be spoken concerning their man-hood and valour: Now it is fitt time to speake of their prudence and wisdom.

cient Gaules. The Druides, or Druides, made profession in each of those Disciplines. First of all, Cæsar saith, they would haue men to beleue, that their soules could not dye; but after death they passed from one body to another. And they were of opinion, that this beleefe served greatly for an encouragement to vertue; when men held the feare of death in contempt. Moreover, they discovered verie many things which they taught to youth: concerning the Starrs, and their motion; of the greatness of the world, & the earth; of the Nature of things; of the might and power of the immortal Gods. Cæsar writeth, of the Learning of the Gaules; but in few words, and sleighly; therefore we must enquire after more ample relation. That the Gaules had a capable understanding of all disciplines, Cæsar hath affirmed in his euenth booke, by that which we haue already alledged. They are a kinde of people of very great understanding, and who are most apt to follow and remember all things which can be taught them. And Diodes writeth thus. Although their speech be somewhat obscure and doubtful, yet are they not any such men, as do estrange themselves from Learning. Also Strabo agreeth there-with, saying, The Gaules are easily guided to learn such things as may do them service, because they addit themselves to Arts and Disciplines.

From the beginning of the world, which Father Noah re-established; all sortes of Disciplines were taught to such spirits, as appeared to be desirous of them. For, according to Berosus, if that which now 2. dayes is generally read, be true: Dk, who was the first Author of the Gaules Nation, is said to be most famous for knowledge, and thereon was called Semmothes, or Samoths, and (after his name) such as made profession of Learning and knowledge, were termed Semmotheans, or Samothsians. But this place of Cæsar seemeth to confirme the history of Berosus. The Gaules (saith he) do report themselves to be descended of their father Dis; and say beside, that the Druides gave them that instruction. For this cause, they marked all the courses of times by number, not of dayes, but of nights; and that they kept such a custome, by obseruation of their birth daies, and so from the beginning of months and yeares; that still the day followed the night. Now, concerning this point, that day alwayes ensued after night: the Germans held the same course, & made not their account by number of dayes; as we do (saith Strabo) but of nights, giving an apt terme therefore, and vied their allocations among themselves accordingly; as holding, that night was still the guide to day. It may bee, that this was a thing in vye to other people also, to take the beginning of the houres; from the instant of midnight.

But let vs come againe to Father Dis, and the Semmotheans, or Samothsians, whereof Berosus speaketh; with whom the opinion of Utrahle consenteth: for he writeth in his Magitian (according to Zenocrus reported) that Philosophy receiued originall from the Semmotheans of the Gaules. The same Berosus writeth, that Sarron the third King of Gaule, to restrain the wilde fiercenesse of the first men; established publicke Schooles of learning; but hereafter we shall speake more at large of the Sarronides. The fourth King was Druid, of whom came the Druides; & who were full of all things, as Cæsar affirmeth. The fifth King was Bardus, of whom we celebrate the honour, in speaking of Bards, Poets, and Orators. Thus then we perceiue the ancient professions of the Gaules disciplines, which maketh it selfe venerable, euen in the image of antiquity. Marcellinus in his fifth Booke, doth very neere agree heerewith, writing the Originall of the Gaules, where he saith, Those that haue anciently written, doubting the first originall of the Gaules, deduce their knowledge halfe full of trouble. But since then, Timagenes the Greeke, both out of diligence and ciuers Languages, collected such things as were unknown for the space of long time; to whom giving credit (all doubt & scruple taken away) we will deliuer the same notes distinctly and cleerely.

Some are of opinion, that the Aborigines were the first that had bene scene in these Countreys; and that they did name themselves Celts, after the name of a king whom they deerey affected; and Gallates (for the Greekes do call the Gaules so) after the name of his Mother. Others do affirme, that the Dorians, which followed ancient Hercules, inhabited the borders about the Ocean. The Druides recount (for a truth) that there was a certain part of

of a people, which were Natives of the Countrey: but were chased and expelled from their dwellings by another people, in regard of their continuall warres, and thorow the inundations of the Sea, they landed on the hither Islands, and in the Countrey on this side the Rhene. Some also holde, that after the destruction of Troy, a small number of people which fled from the Greeks, wandering all about: came at last into this country, which till then was empty. But the inhabitants of this land (more then any thing els can) do assure this, which wee have also seene engraven in their Monuments: that Hercules, the son of Amphitruus, made all possible speede to rinate the cruell Tyrants Gerion and Tauriscus, one of which overawed Spain, and the other Gallia. After he had conquered them both, he had private knowledge of some women of noble race; by whom, he had many Children, that styled (by their owne name) all those places where they commanded.

It is likewise further maintained, that the Phoenices which lived in Asia, flying from the cruelty of Harpagus, Lieutenant to King Cyrus, betooke themselves to sea, and came into Italy; one part whereof, founded the Towne of Velia, and the other Massilia in Phoenices. Within some while after, when their forces were increased, they fortified a great number of Cities and Townes. But we must breake off this variety, which gladly would keep company with pleasing satiety. Afterwards, when these places were (by little and little) civilized, and reclaimed from rudeness by men: the study of learning (which is most commendable) began to appear in some splendour, by the Bards, Embages, and Druides.

Marcellinus reporteth this of Hercules, agreeing therein with Berosus. For Berosus saith, that Galates (by consent of her parents) was begotten with child by Hercules, at his returne out of Spain; and that of her was borne Galata, of whom the Gauls received their name Galates. Therefore, the antiquity of the Gaules Discipline and Learning, maketh it self known by these testimonies.

But in what Discipline and Learning (perhaps) thou wilt aske me? I answer, in Grammar, Rhetoricke, Logicke, Mathematicke, Physick, Theology. Grammar instructed to reade, and frame Letters; and this Art was such from those times, when as the tongues were in their entire condition: and that the neighbouring strangers had not (as yet) corrupted them. For so Plato in his Philebus grounded the Greeke Grammar. Here (me thinks) I understand in this place, that which many good and learned spirits have questioned, to wit, what were the Letters of the Ancient Gaules? Cæsar, in his sixth booke confirmeth, that they were Greeke Letters. They thought (saith he) that it was ill done, to set down their disciplines in writing: whereas, that almost in all their other affairs, as well common as particular, they used the Greeke Letters. In this place, Cæsar speaketh not obscurely, but disertly and plainly; that the Gaules made use of the Greeke Letters, that is to say, these Characters α, β, γ, &c. He deliverech som proof hereof in the first Booke, that in the camp of the Heluetians, there were found little Table bookes, written with Greeke Letters. Most true it is, Cæsar calleth those Greeke Letters, which the Gaules then used: but I call them Gaul Letters, & will maintaine, that they never came out of Greece into Gaul; but on the contrary, that they went out of Gaul into Greece.

As concerning the man, who is sayde to be the first inuenter of Letters, verie great question had beene made thereof: and Plinie hath debated the matter by diversity of opinions. So that the inuention of Letters, is not proper or peculiar vnto any one Nation, according as hee thinketh, but (from all antiquity) they had bin vied. Cadmus (if the booke be true which is allowed to one named Xenophon) as is affirmed by som, was the first that brought Letters (to the number of sixteen) from Phoenicia into Greece, the which were verie like to the Characters of the Galates and Maons. Hereby may be coniectured, that Letters came from the Galates vnto the Greekes. Now, finding not only a verie likely coniecture, but a certaine proof also, by the report and account of Times; maintaining, that the discipline of the Semnotheans, or Samotheans, Sarronides, Druides, and Bardes, did flourish in Gaul for so many yeeres before Cadmus went into Greece: there neede no doubt to be made, but that the Gaules characters were in use in Gaul, for so many yeeres before

Whether the Gaules spoke Greeke or no.

And this is that, which Varro (in his fourteenth booke of the Latine tongue) maketh openly knowne. For Crates a Greeke, had formerly made a Grammarian question in Greece, demanding what was the reason why Alphas might not be called Alphatos? The other grammarian Greekes answered: These wordes are none of ours, but are wholly barbarian. In this place then the Greekes do plainly confesse, that these Letters were none of theirs. And, consenting hereunto, Aristotle confesseth to his Magitian (according as I have already sayde) That Philosophy received original from the Semnotheans, or Samotheans of the Celts. And last of all, that Gaul had bin the Mistress of all Greece.

I know very well, that Strabo speaketh of the Gaules, that they affected the Greekes: inasmuch, that whatsoever bargaines or conuention was made amongst them, they wrote thereof into Greeke, & that they adding themselves to the study of eloquence, & of Philosophy, as the Greekes did, kept in pay or wages, professors of the liberrall Artes, as also they did the like by Physicians. But Strabo wrote this of the Massilians, and of their neighbours, at such time as Tiberius held the Empire, and when the great Lords of Rome (as himselfe writeth) caused their children to bee sent no more to Athens, then they did to Marfilius, there to follow their studious exercise. It must needs then be very certaine, that we learned the Gaules doctrine of Dio, Samothes, Sarron, Druides, Bardus, and those other ancient masters, when Greece did not so much as one ly thinke on Letters.

Some may conceit, that we speak of Paradoxes, against all reason: but I cannot comprehend, why such men as have heard so many Authors speake, that carry credite and authority (among all) in other things, should reproach theyr praises of their owne Countrey, by a peruerse opinion of iudgement. But it may bee, that al these things do serue vs to no purpose, in regard that (concerning this matter) wee may be pressed with nouell Arguments: because the Gaules (as somewhat sayd) did speake Greeke, therefore did they make use also of Greeke Letters. But let me much rather tel them, that in & from the time of Cæsar, the Gaules did not so vnderstand the Greeke tongue, that they could speak it in any mean measure. Herein I haue Cæsar for my warrant; for thus he writeth in his fifth Booke. Wee persuaded so farre (saith hee) with one of the Gaules horsemen, only by powerfull promises: that he undertooke to carry a Letter to Cicero, which he had written in Greeke Characters, to the end, that if it happened into the enemies hand, they might not know our secrets. Cæsar speaking this, I conclude thereby, that the enemies of Cæsar and the Gaules, vnderstood not a letter written in Greeke, nor the language thereof.

And hee that will looke a little neerer, cannot probably proue to himselfe (though some others hold it for most certain) that the popular Gaules vnderstood any thing in that language: but that the chiefe and principall Heads of each Commonweale knew the Greeke tongue, as now adayes they do the Latine. I say moreover, that whatsoever maketh heerefull obsecration, will finde, that this cannot any way bee proued for truth. Because it is most certaine, that in so great an army of enemies, there must needs be some men of marke, of Townes good store. Nay, that which is more, I haue learned of Cæsar himselfe, that the worthy Druides, who were the masters and Doctors of the Gaules youth, did not know the Greeke tongue. For Dimitrius, one of the Hedunians, according to the testimony of Cicero, was the most learned man amongst the Gaule Druides. The great affection in this Dimitrius, towards the Romane people, the extraordinary good will which they bare vnto him, the singular fealty, iustice, temperance (as appeareth in the first booke) in this man, was very well knowne vnto Cæsar. To Cæsar I say, who vnderstood the Greeke tongue sufficiently, and had a desire to communicate secretly (for feare lest any thing should be discovered) with Dimitrius, concerning his brother Dumetrix, who was suspected that hee would betray Cæsar to his enemies.

Well then, if Dimitrius had vnderstood the Greeke tongue, as well as Cæsar did: could not the one haue holpen the other with priuate instructions, in whatsoever they would haue had imparted? But (concerning to serue his turne by ordinary interpreters (as it appeareth in the xviij. fame first Booke) Cæsar spake with Dimitrius, by the means of Valerius, Prince of a Countrey in Gaule. Then there is no appearance, that Dimitrius (although hee was one of the principall Driders) did vnderstand the Greeke tongue, or that it was any way knowne to the Gaules.

Here I may be demanded, what was the speech of the Ancient Gaules, seeing it was not Greeke? I may, and must answer, that it was Gaulish; but to render a certaine reply, where the Language of the Gaules hath bene preferred, it requireth the Diuination of a Pythian Apollon. Because it is sufficiently knowne, that the Gaules haue had time long enough, whereby to vnclearne and loofe their owne Native tongue. For not onely Lawes, but the Romane Legions established in Gaule, constrained the Gaules to speake the Romane tongue. And, according as Plato sayth: Ordinarily all other Citizens do follow the manners of them that command them. Therefore, the Romane Lawier, and the Romane Warriour, did quite abolish and extinguish the Gaules Language.

Moreover, the Emperours of Rome, appointed wages vnto such men, as made publique profession of teaching the Latine tongue. So that, to this very day, the bookes written in this corrupted tongue, some whereof wee haue yet to shew, are vulgarly called Romaine, and not Gaulish.

Some in debating this matter, are of opinion, that the Language of the Swisses, that hold (at this day) the dwelling of the Heluetians are they that speake the ancient Gaulish tongue. But we know well enough, that these Swisses were not the true Gaules of the Country, neither are: considering, that the ancient Heluetians (thus vpper by Cæsar within their owne mountaines) were afterward expelled thence (according to Entropius) by the Quades; and finally, the Quades themselves, thrust out by the Allemaignes. At length the Pites*, a people amongst the Saxons, possessed themselves of the Heluetians Countrey; whereupon the Suitois (that is to say) Swisses, were called, according to the opinion of Beatus Rhennus, by a Name somewhat nere vnto the Vitols.

Others are of the minde, that the Language which the Germanes now adays speake, is that of the ancient Gaules, and take S. Hierom for their Authour, who giueth assurance, that in his time the Gaules or Galatians of Asia, spake the same language which the Tremirians (dwelling on the Rhine) now doe. But Cæsar seemeth to auouch the contrary, writing in his first Booke, that Ariouistus King of the Germanes, by long vse (as some haue conceived by this place) of fourteen yeeres, did speake the Gaulish tongue. And in the time of Saint Hierome, there were other Tremirians in Gaule, that were subiects to the Romane Empire: and now in our time also, there are other that speake the same speech, as the other Germanes doe.

There remaineth yet another opinion amongst learned men, who do iudge, that the language of the ancient Gaules, is that which was vsed in Gaule Armorica, that is Britaine at this day. But they do not hold the French History to be true, that makes the Britaines to come out of the Isle of Britaine, into Gaule Armorica: considering, that Cæsar (as I haue already saide) maketh great Britaine it selfe to be a Colonie of the Gaules, and that Strabo maketh mention of a Towne or Citie, called Britaine, which is in America; and Pliny (though verie confusedly) numbereth the Britaines in Gaule; and Cornelius Tacitus in the life of Agricola writeth, That the nextest shores of the Ile were impeached by the Gaules, & that their language was but little different. Finally, the learned men of this Isle, imagined (for this reason) that the Welshmen of England, had some conuiniene in speech with our Britaines. Therefore this is the only opinion, which (as yet) I know, to holde any good reason, or deferring to be approved. And this is the Grammar of the Gaules, both in writing and speech.

But what was that of the Britaines, and that of the Germanes? The Discipline of the Gaules (saith Cæsar) was first invented in great Britaine, as hath bene esteemed: and from thence transported into Gaule. And at this day, such as would know it most diligently, they go thither (oftentimes) to learne it. This passage sheweth sufficiently, that the discipline betweene the Britaines and Gaules, was al one. If we vnderstand also, that Cæsar maketh great Britaine as descended of the Gaules, & that they of the Britaines were most human which were Gauls, it it is verily to be credited, that Discipline parted from Gaule, to come thither. This place may suffice generally, for al the doctrine of the Britaines.

The discipline of the Britains and Gaules al one.

Of the Germanes, Cornelius Tacitus, ubi supra.

Æneus Sylvius concerning the Germanes, and their former barbarities.

Concerning the Germanes, there is scarcely any one word. The men and Women (saith Tacitus) were equally ignorant in the secrets of Letters. The Germanes then wholly, had not any Letters or Disciplines. Æneus Sylvius giueth assurance, that in the time of Adrian, civility and Letters came into Germany. The Germanes themselves do hold, that it is not yet eight hundred yeeres, since their language began to be written; and that (with Christian Religion) the Muls came into Germany, where both in publique Schooles, and by learned professors, they haue prospered, that the nation (which all Nations else had formerly in detestation for savage barbarousnes) hath since then, in all civility, in all gentleness and humanity of all disciplines, conferred with the most learned and best lettered Nations whatsoever, and for the priority in this commendation.

But what were the studies of the Rhetorick Gaules? Assuredly, they were very highly and honourably esteemed: yet more for a tested speech, consisting of measure, then in prose. The Gaules had (saith Diodorus in his first Booke) Poets of melodie, which they called Bards. These men, with a Musickall instrument, as with the Lyre or Harpe, sang some mens praises, and others imperfections. He further sheweth in the same place, that Poets were in such reuerend respect amongst them, that when Armies were in ranged battaile, hauing their Swordes and Bowes ready drawne, and approaching to finite one another: not onely friends, but meere enemies (if these men once did steppe betweene them) were faine to make an end of all fighting. In like manner, amongst the most savage Barbarians, anger was compelled to yeelde to wisdom, and Mars gladly reuerenced the Muses. Likewise, Strabo in his fourth Booke, speaketh of the *Bard*s, as being Poets, and singers of praises. The Poet Lucane also, in the first of his Pharsalia, speaketh thus in commendation of the Gaulish Poets.

You Poets, Bards, that of those valiant souls, Dying in warres, do Carroll their renowne, Know how to eternize to perpetual worlds Their endless praise: Many sweet songs you sing.

Moreover, Marcellinus in his first Booke, speaking of the Gaules, hath these words: The Bards sing to the Harp, which they touched very pleasingly: declaring the famous actes of illustrious men, their Songs being composed in heroycall verses. The Romaines followed this example of the *Bard*s, and they (according as Cato hath written in his Booke of Originals) had a custome to sing at banquets, the vertues of famous and renowned men, euermore conforming their voices with such as did play on Instruments.

Hereby therefore, we may well perceyue, how highly Poetrie was honoured and authorized by the Ancient Gaules. This argument putteth mee in minde of Greece, and other Homer and Hesiodus, shew vaunting of them, that they were in as great honour and estimation amongst the Greekes. This then was their Rhetorick, and (as Pomponius Mela sayeth) This was the eloquence which the ancient Gaules had.

But what was that of the Germanes? Although they were ignorant (as hath bene formerly declared) in the mysteries and secrets of Letters; yet notwithstanding, as Tacitus auoucheth, they celebrated in ancient Canticles and Songes, the memory of their Gods and Kings. And this was the only maner of their Annals, & of the Antiquity which they had: for I finde nothing more, concerning the Discipline of the ancient Germanes.

Now, what was the Logick of the ancient Gaules? I finde in Cæsar one only question, concerning the meanes & manner which ought to be followed in the instruction of youth. All the noble and liberal Arts, were to be learned in written bookes, the masters of those Arts, interpreting that to their scholars, & the scholars practising to vnderstand them. Any times some great difficulty would arise, about the entertaining of mens authority; whose Bookes were propounded to youth: because those men, although they were more excellent then other men, yet notwithstanding being no more but men, they would sometimes dreame, and quite forget themselves. Whereby ensued, that their writings passing as vniuersall, they proued many times vncaſe to be explained. Contrarywise, without any writing, but by the voice onely, an infinite number of Arts and Sciences (belonging to Mechanical men (as Laborers, Malons, Marriners, and such like) were soone apprehended: and there arose no repugnance or doubt of their words, neyther any difficulty of their intention when as they were vnderſtoode. There was no other maxime of these Arts, but what vse and profit had approoued. Then those Doctors and professors were not wont to write of any discipline: but all that they deliuered to youth, they taught onely by word of mouth. Yet notwithstanding, being guided by other reasons, they made Conscience (as Julius Caesar sayeth in the first Booke) to set downe their disciplines in writing.

Well then, if we vrgue a question (in this case) to Caſar, thus will he shape vs an answer. It appeareth to me, that for two reasons, they established this decree amongst them. First, because they would not haue their disciplines imparted vnto popularitie. Next, least such as learned them, trusting to writing onely, would make the lesse account of retaining them in their memory. For many times it happened, that the more part, by vsing continuall recourse to books, became slothfull in Learning truly, or kept retention of any thing shewn vnto them. And these two reasons were likewise alledged by the Druides, for not committing their Disciplines to writings; & these causes haue beene approoued by the very cheefest Philosophers of Greece. For, in ancient time, this was the aduice of Pythagoras; and (after him) of Socrates, both which left not one Letter in writing. The opinion of Socrates, to this purpose, is amply declared by Plato to Phadrus, in this Conference which Socrates had with Phadrus.

CHAP. XII.

A Dialogue or Communication between Socrates and Phadrus, concerning what great difference there is between the excellent Art of Memory, and matters registered downe by writing.

Socrates. It remaineth now to speake of the finesse or vnfinesse of writing. VVhere the doing thereof be well or ill, is not that the question?

Phadrus. Yes, that is our argument. Socrates. Knowest thou, that in dooing or ordaining it, as concerning present speech, thou mayest thereby be acceptable to the Gods?

Phadrus. Not I, but thou doest.

Socrates. I haue heard of our Elders, that they knew the truth, and if wee our selues could finde it, might we not henceforward, to bee verie carefull of mens opinions?

Phadrus. This is to laugh at thine owne demand; but tel vs that, which thou sayest thou hast heard.

Socrates. I haue heeretofore heard, that neere vnto * Nauacratia which is in Egypt, there was sometimes one of the ancient Gods, who was named Theuthates, and to him, the Bird teamed Bis or Ibis, was sacred. Moreover, that hee was the first inuenter of numbers, and of Icar, as also of Dice and Letters, and of Astronomy and Geometry. At that time, Thaumas was king of all Egypt, making his abiding in a great City of the higher Countrey, which the Greeks called the Egyptian Thebes, and that Ammon or Hannan was then their God. Theuthates being come to this King, he shewed and declared to him, that hee must instruct the Egyptians in disciplines. VVhereon the King demanded of him, concerning the profite that would ensue thereby to any one; and according as Theuthates should seeme to speake ill or well, so would hee blame, or else giue commendation. It is sayde, that betweene Thaumas and Theuthates

these many things were debated, which would require too long time to discourse, but when they came to dispute about Letters. Sir (said Theuthates) this discipline will make the Egyptians very wise, and prompt of memory: for this is the only Medicine found out for memory and knowledge. Whereto the other replied; O most ingenious and subtle Theuthates, the one is most apt to performe the workes of Art, and the other knowes best how to iudge, what harme or benefite their vse may bring. But thou, the Father of letters, being carried by thine own affection, mainetaimest the contrary of their effect. For letters cauleth forgetfulness in the mindes of such as learne them, because they make no reckoning of studying by memory; for they trusting to the marks of exterior writing, doe forsake inward recordation, which is the very foule of memory. Thou hast not then found out a medicine for memory, but for forgetfulness, and thou canst not teach thy Schollers the truth of knowledge and vnderstanding, but of Opinion. For, they hauing comprehended great store of things, and without a Matter, they will perswade themselves to know enough; and yet notwithstanding (commonly) they are exceeding ignorant in the greater part, prouoing to bee offensive and troublesome in mens company and frequentation, as being more full of opinion of knowledge, then of true knowledge indeede.

Phadrus. Thou canst easily (O Socrates) imagine the humor of the Egyptians, or of any such nation, as seemeth good to thy selfe.

Socrates. My friend, it is held by some, that in ancient times, Oakes did speake those prophesies which were in the Temple of Iupiter * Dodanans. For, through the rudenesse and ignorance of old men in those times, who had not then attained to the knowledge which now your younger dayes haue done: it was sufficient for them, to heare an Oake, or a Stone speake, so long as they spake truth. It may bee thou conceiuest, that some peculiar interest should be placed in iudgement, how, or of what country he was, that hath spoken any thing of this nature, without consideration, whether it were so, or no.

Phadrus. Truly, thou hast very iustly reproued me: but for the order of disciplines, I am of the same minde as Thaumas was.

Socrates. Then whosoever thinketh, that Arte can so well sette downe it selfe, or comprehend by writing, as if there could bee something certaine, or assured by writing; that man should ill learne, and bee ignorant in the Oracle of Ammon; making more esteeme of reasons sette downe in writing; then of knowing and retaying that which is written.

Phadrus. Thou sayest very well.

Socrates. O Phadrus, writing hath a great matter in it, and (in very truly) carrieth some resemblance with painted creatures, for such works seeme as if they had life: but if thou demand any question of them, they hold their peace with great modesty. Thou imaginest also, that a discourse set downe in writing, should speake of it selfe. But, if hauing a desire to learne, thou come and demand something of it, concerning that which it should say; it continueth silent, yet signifying one and the same thing. For, after that a discourse is set downe in writing, it carrieth it selfe alike equally to all men: both for the learned which vnderstand it, and for such as vnderstand it not; and no one can say, to whom it is most convenient, and to whom not. And if it happen to be iniuriously dealt withall, it will alwayes stand in need of his fathers help: because it is not able to reuenge any wrongs receiued, nor yet to right it selfe.

Phadrus. Hitherto thou hast spoken most truly.

Socrates. Doe wee not then perceiue, how another discourse maketh it selfe, which is Brother to this we talke of, and much more it excelleth both in power & dignity?

Phadrus. What is thy meaning? And what is that which (thou sayest) maketh it selfe?

Socrates. It is that, which (with knowledge) writeth it selfe in the spirit of him that apprehendeth: for it can act reuenge vpon it selfe, knoweth it selfe, and when and how to speake, or to bee silent.

Phadrus. Thou speakest the liuely and foule-like discourse of him that knowes & vndervnderstandeth; and (by good right) that which is written, may tearme it selfe (in some respect) to be his image.

Socrates. Tell mee then, in good fadnesse, if a wife husbandman take delight to beholde his feedes, whereof he is carefull, and desireth to gather fruite; will he sowe them at Spring time, in the Gardens of Adonis, where hee shall see them budde forth at eight dayes following; or, when hee goeth about such businesse, shall he scatter them iustlingly, as after the manner of a holy day sport? Vn hee hee hath taken paines to sowe his feede, according as hee ought to do, and answerable to the Art of Husbandry: he supposeth it sufficient for him, if in the space of eight moneths after the seed time is past, they doe thrive, and come to their maturity.

Phadrus. The wife Husbandman, (O Socrates) will doe as thou hast sayde; but the idle and negligent foole hath no such care.

Socrates. Shall we then say, that a man who hath knowledge and experience in that which is iust, honest, and good, will be lesse carefull of his feede seasons, then an Husbandman?

Phadrus. No.

Socrates. He will not then write down the feedes of his penne with Inke, sowing them there amongst his Discourses, as if he did a matter of great importance: because hee cannot then helpe them with his wordes, neither can hee demonstrate the truth so exquisitely as it should bee.

Phadrus. Nor can they make any proof of themselves.

Socrates. No truely: but he shall sowe and write (as it is in reason) in meeke sportfull manner, and vhole Gardens of Letters. But, when he maketh memories, as certaine Treasures, to the end that they may not fall into Oblivion, as well for himselfe, as also for the first that will followe the same example: hee taketh delight in beholding their tender byrthes; and, while others doe addithe themselves vnto other Recreations, as to Feasts, sports, and the like pleasures, leauing all these heede full matters behinde them; hee shall passe on all his leysures, taking great delight in his owne discoursing.

Phadrus. O Socrates, thou speakest of a most true passion indeede, in steade of that which is of small valew, and woorth nothing: when a man delighteth in ferious Discourse, he shall ruminare on Iustice, and all those other especiall matters by three remembred.

This was the opinion of Socrates, which was much more sweete and humane, then that of our Druides. Socrates alwayes preferred knowledge, consisting in memorie and liuing wordes, before that of the dead Letter: neuertheless, hee allowed writing to bee but as a help to forgetfulness. I could wish that this Opinion had bene as pleasing vnto the Druides; for then, wee should haue had no neede of straungers goodes, as to borrow any thing of the Greekes, but continued satisfied with our owne countries abundance. Neyther by means of the Latines and Greeke, should we haue learned disciplines by paine and studye, after the nature of other straunge Languages: but with great pleasure and contentment of minde, wee should haue sucked them as milk from our nurses breasts. All the youth of a man, albeit study were sharpe there-to, should not so hardly haue spent it selfe in learning Greeke and Latine Letters; yet seeming but as an entrance into the common roade way of liberal studies, wher we rather should haue runne out our full course to the end. A long and laborious time of studye was required in apprehending the Greeke and Latine tongues, to vnderstand Homer, Demosthenes, Virgil, Cicero and others: whereas contrary-wise, without trauaile, and with exceeding delight, we might haue sung the Hymnes & Poems of our Bards, hauing (naturally) the true vnderstanding both of their wordes and sense.

The loue which they bare vnto their country, and to vertue it selfe, was ouerabounding in feuerity. For, our Druides sought all meanes, vvhether to make Gaules surpass all other Nations, not only in actions of Armes, but in the honor of Disciples, and in conuening to banish idleness from the Gaules minde; they disinherited their posterity, of their most rich and vnuauleable patrimony of ancient disciplines. In the doing vvhich, they buried in perpetuall oblivion, the Gaules rare Arts and Doctrines, which they had

But in vaine do we now make our complaints: neuertheless, sorrow remaineth still with vs, to with (how vainely soeuer) that it had bene so. And vndoubtedly (in this case) they might iustly accuse the vilenesse of the Romane ambition, which vtterly ruined the Schooles of the Druides. Wee may therefore say with the Poet.

CHAP. XIII.

A further addition to the Artes and Sciences, taught among the Gaules, by their Druides, Bards, and learned men, according to the iustification of diuers good Authors: and what religious Ceremonious orders they obserued.

BV T lets come to the Mathematical Artes, whereof Cesar speaketh, when he saith. They made very many disputes of the Starrs, and of their motion; & of the greatness of the world, and of the earth, and concerning the nature of things. Questionlesse, these were their ancient disciplines, left from the father to the sonne, by Dis, Sarron, and Druides which they themselves preferred carefully, hauing received them (from hand to hand) of their graue Ancestors. For Iosephus, in the first booke of the Iewes Antiquities, testifieth, concerning the ancient Fathers before the flood, that they had obserued those Mathematicall considerations. And because they would hinder the losse of so noble inuentions, or perishing by the inundations of the waters: they engraue them vpon two Collobmes or Pillars, the one whereof was of moulded earth, and the other of stone. And this was thus done, that if that of earth should chance to be defaced by the flood: yet the other of stone might remaine intire, and yeeld men means to apprehend what was engraue thereon. The same Author witnesseth, that the same Pillar of stone was to bee scene in Syria, in the time of Vespasian. Eusebius likewise reporteth, how the Egyptians learned them of Abraham; and that the Greekes afterward, did set downe those Artes in writing, & then published them. But our Druides (as I haue formerly saide) gaue them to posterity, according as they had received them from the hands of their fathers; disputing many matters, touching the Starrs, and their continuall motions.

Mela also writeth, that the Druides made profession, concerning the motion of Heauen, and of the Starrs. Astrology was such a thing, as it could not any way be taught or learned, except (before hand) a man had studied Arithmetick & Geometry. For the calculation of the motions, they stood in neede of the accounts of Arithmetick; and the distances and interualls of the Starrs, must needs passe themselves by the figures of Geometry. Therefore the Druides, making profession of enstructing Astrology; taught (first of all) Arithmetick and Geometry, which are Arts that make Astrology to be vnderstood.

Berosus sheweth, that there was some musick in the Hymnes and Poems of the Bards. Among the Celts (saith he) a Bard was much renowned, for the inuention of Songs and Musique. The Druides disputed many things, concerning the greatnes of the world and the earth: This was the greatnesse and forme of the world and earth, which Mela saith, the Druides taught: This was their Cosmography & Geography, and the Druides disputed diuers things of that nature. As, what was the length of the world, from the Sunnes setting in the West, to his rising in the East: what was his largenesse, from the Equator or Equinoctial circle, to both the one and other Pole: how great were the distances of the five Zones, from the Pole, so farre as the smallest circle thereof, even to the Tropick, and then from the Tropick, so farre as the Equator, which is in the midst: what were the Zones of the earth, which are assigned and subiect to the Celestiall Zones: which of the were inhabited, and desert, by reason of cold or heate, and which were temperate: And how Europe, Asia, and Africa were diuided, and separate one from another.

professours (among the Gaules) of these to seuerall doctrines; are called by Strabo, Poets, or Prophets, who, ouer and beside other things, concerning Physicke, principally taught this Oracle, proper to the Country: That the world must sometime ctours are called (by Marcellinus) Eubages. The Eubages (saith hee) seeking into

Here we may not omit, to remember two most excellent Philosophers among them that were commended, yea, and consecrated to immortality, by the words of Cicero. The one was Diuitius, (of who we haue spoken already) Prince of the Hedmans: the other was Deiotarus, King of the Gaules in Asia. Speake then noble Cicero, and remember vs of our famous Druides. In Gaule there were of the Druides among whom, I my selfe knew Diui- tacius the Hedman as the man that receiued me into his house, and made account of mee.
This man made his want, that hee knew the reason of Nature, which the Greekes named * Physiologie; and could speake of things to come partly by Augurie, and partly by con- jectures. This Diuitacius (as it is very likely) was the Holte to Cicero, by reason of the Druides knowledge which was in him.
But what doth he say of * Deiotarus? How is it that this Orator commendeth him?
But wherein (saith he) shall I make mention of king Deiotarus, that most famous & right worthy personage our Holte, that neuer did any thing, but with preface? For, when hee was returned from a voyage, which hee had formerly purposed and refused to make: the Chamber wherein hee should haue lodged (if he had continued his journey) fell downe the might ensuing. And therefore, as I haue oftentimes heard from himselfe, hee made many pauses and returns from that one voyage;
albeit he proceeded in many other beside. Ci- cero speaking further of the same man, saith.
I see performed one very notable addi-on, when he came backe from the kingdome of the Tetrarches, whereof he was dispossessed by Caesar and condemned to pay a great summe of money. He saide, hee did not repent himselfe for not crediting such Auguries, as happened to him when hee went towards Pompey, having maintained with his forces, the authority of the Senate, and liberty of the Ro-mane people, with the dignity of the Empire.

And that the Birds (to whose augurie hee gaue faith) had well counselled and aduised him: yet notwithstanding, hee made much more precious and deere esteeme of his honour, then hee did of all his goods and possessions. These are the words of learned Ci- cero, to whom both Gaule and Galatia are for euer beholding: because, by so worthy a testimony, he preferred the memory of 2. such famous Philosophers of theirs.

But what shall I most preferre in this place, if not our signes and teares, as true witnesses of our misery? Heere tofore, Gaule commanded ouer the Italians and Grecians, and, inlisted of the goods of Fortu- n, which are but of small worth, and giue to men as stipendary wages: the Gau- les the goods of the minde in recompence, which were (indeede) much more precious. Greece and Italy vaunted very proudly, because they had Mathematici- ans and Philosophers: but that glory was (formerly) ours; those prailes, distilled from our Fountaines: which did meerely dry vp themselves, because they would not rampier and defend their owne power, by writing. For Gaule might haue had Gaulish Euclides, Ptolomies, Platoes, Aristo- tles, and others beside, farre more excellent men then all they were. But let vs ceasse our bootlesse complaints, & come now to the Theology or Diuinity of the Gaules.

The Druides (about all things else) would haue men to beleue, that their soules could not die: but that (after death)
they departed out of one body, & entered into another. The reason of this their opinion was that it was the only encouragement to vertue, because feare of death was thereby held in high contempt. I set downe this their perelation of immortality, as the principall foundation of the Gaules Religion and Theologie, which the Greekes and Latines did enuiously celebrate. The Gauls (saith Diodorus) after their repastes and feeding, had a cus-tome, to desce one another unto the Combate,

bate, without making any reckoning of their lives, for the opinion of Pythagoras preuiled with them: That the soules of men were immortal, and that after the death of the body, within a certaine while, they came againe into other bodies. And for this cause, some would cast written Letters into heapes of wood, prepared as bon-fires to burne mens bodies in, as if the dead were there to reade them. Strabo affirmeth as much. They were perswaded (saith he) that mens soules were not subiect to corruption or mortality.

Pomponius Mela writeth thus. There was one thing which the Druides helde and maintained, to excite men (thereby) with the better will to warre: That mens soules were eternall, and that the dead lined another life.
Whereupon, when they burned dead bodies, or buried them, the whole account of their former liues negotiations was interred with the,
especially if any thing had bene borrowed, it was to be redemanded of them. Some were found, that voluntarily and with their owne good will, would throw themselves into flaming fires, and burned such things as neereft and deereft appertained to them, even as if they were to liue with them. Mela reporteth thus of them, wherein we may note the same reason of this perswasion, which

Mens soules are exempt from death,
And leauing their first lodgings;
Liue alwaies in new dwellings,
Where they haue fresh entertainment.

This (I say) was the iudgement of Pythagoras, from whence ensued, that the Gauls
(by report of the Greekes and Latines) were made Pythagorians, and so meerely borrowed this opinion of immortality. But to shew of what great ambition this error is, the silliest iudgement may easilie apprehend: in that, for a long time before Pytha- goras was borne, this opinion of the Druides liued among the Gauls. Wherefore, I may very well assure that which hath formerly bene proposed: that Greece was not Schoole-mistresse to Gaule, but rather her scholler. Neuerthelesse, the Gauls did not allow of that * Metempsychosis, that is to say, the changing of soules, which Pytha- goras maintained, as passing out of humane bodies, into other of brute beasts: For they did not beleue, that of men they became beasts, but that they were made men again, in other bodies. The Poet Lucane affirmeth the same.

Pomponius Mela in lib. 4. c. 27. 3.

Mela (saith) to know what the Gods would haue them to do. They adored the Gods, Mercury, Apollo, Minerva, Jupiter and Mars, holding almost the very same opinion, which other nations did, to wit: That Mercury was the inuenter of Artes, and a guide to men on their wayes and voyages: That he could helpe much in the gayning of monie, and in the affaires of Merchandize, being such as the Poet feigneth him.

Mercury reputed to bee the God of Messages, and the inuenter of Artes, as also a guide to trauelliers in their iournies.

*He spake the word, and the God Messenger, Immediately was ready to be gone.
He fastened to his feete his light winged plumes,
Which at his beeles do beare him through the windes, Mouning and falling with their nimble flight:
One while on Land, and then upon the waues.
He tooke his Rod, and with that powerfull Rod,
He summoned up aloft pale meager Ghosts,
From the sad shades, or else doth send them thither.
And there withall he doth controule our sports.
Waking or sleeping, he commandeth all:
And some into eternall sleepe to fall.*

Marcellin in lib. 5. cap. 7.

For this Rod of his, was taken to be the power of Artes, the guide to trauelliers on the way, and the rich gaine of Merchants. Iulius Caesar made his prayers to Mercurie, (and as Marcellinus saith) he was reputed to bee the most sudden sense in this worlde, that moueth our thoughts, according to the doctrine of those Diuines. This was the power which the Druides gaue to Mercurie. As for that of Apollo, he was said to cure & helpe diseases and sicknesse; as the God testifieth of himselfe in Ouid.

Minerva the Goddess of all ingenious deuises.

The might of Minerva, they held to be thus: That shee gaue the determination of all workes and cunning deuises. Whereupon the Poets feigned, that she was bred and borne in the braine of her father Jupiter. They were perswaded also, that Jupiter had command ouer all the other Gods, and that Mars gouerned in warres: to whom oftentimes they made vowes (when they had determined to giue the enemy battaile) of all such things as they should take in fight. And if they went the day, they would sacrifice all such Beasts as were taken, and bring away all therest as booty. Diodorus relating almost the very same, saith farther; that they sacrificed their prisoners and captiues to the Gods. But you will say, that this example was too cruell. I confesse as much, but must answer ye withall: that it was borrowed from the ancient Romanes, who would put to death in their prisons, the very brauest & most valiant Captaines of their enemies. And many times for a publike spectacle, and before the common people, they were giuen as a prey to wilde Beasts, to be de-uoured by them in cruell manner. Some of the Gauls did burne in their sacrifices, such Beasts as were taken for booty, and (with them) did put the enemy to death, or else torment him with other paines.

The Celts had an admirable and particular obseruation in their Temples, to cast or spred abroad a great deale of their gold and siluer. Now albeit this was a nation very greedy and couetous: yet notwithstanding, there was neuer found any man, among the rudest inhabitants of the country, that durst so much as touch one peece thereof, such was their respect and reuerence to Religion. Neuerthelesse, such offerings may (perhaps) seeme more proper and conuenient for Mars: being called (in ancient times) by the Greeke Poets, The plague of men, or the Murderer. And yet such ceremonies also were common, and vied in the sacrifices of other Gods. The whole nation of the Gaules, (as Caesar affirmeth) were greatly addicted to Religion, and by this occasion, such as were vexed with any greuous diseases, or they that were in warre, or in any other other perill of life: did sacrifice men as their oblations & offerings, or else made vowes of such sacrifices. For they held a seuerer opinion, that if for the life of one man, the life of another was not iustly rendered: it was impossible to appease the anger, or satisfie the will of the immortal Gods. And such manner of sacrifices were publicly instituted, as truly declaring admirable Religion, and meruailous perswasion of the Gods might and power; whereof the Greeke Authors made not a iote lesse account and estimation.

CHAP. XIII.

Of the Diuination used by the Sarronides, who were a kinde of Philosophers among the ancient Gaules, their manner of oblations and sacrifices: As also of their spells, charmes, and incantations.

Diodor in lib. 5.

Philosophers and Diuines called Sarronides.

A strange obseruation of the Sarronides.

The manner of their sacrifices in the presence of Philosophers.

Diodorus further sayeth, that some other Philosophers & Diuines, were held in great honour & reuerence among them, whom they termed Sarronides, that vied diuination: and because they fore-tolde things that were to come, as well by auguries, as sacrifices; they were highly esteemed of them, but especially of the common people, who performed great reuerence to them. And when they held any counsell, concerning matters of import and consequence: they obserued a very admirable custome, and almost incredible. For they would cut the throte of a man, and when he fell downe; eyther by the manner of his fall, or separation of his members, or fluxion of his blood (by along and ancient obseruation) they attained to the knowledge of future things. Their custome also was, neuer to make any sacrifice, without the presence of some Philosophers: as holding opinion, that sacrifices ought to be performed by such men, as participated in the diuine nature, and came neere to the Gods. For by the prayers of such men, they were perswaded, that good fortune and successe should be desired of the Gods, and their counsell also to be especially vied, both in the times of peace and warre. Heere to may be referred, that which Caesar saith, in the fifth Booke of his warres in Gaule. Whosoeuer came latest to the assembly made in Armes, being first afflicted with diuers torments, was afterward put to death before the whole multitude. Moreover, Strabo saith, that they would fasten a man vnto a Crosse in their Temple, and there shoote him to death with Arrowes.

The same Author, agreeing with Possidonius and Artemidorus saith, there were certaine Bacchanalles, which dwelt in an Island, neighbouring to the River of Loyre, and of certaine Auguries done by them, according as two white Crows moued their right wings, which neuerthelesse is reputed to be fabulous. Therefore that which Artemidorus saith, I hold more agreeable to reason, that in an Island neere to Brittain, such and the like sacrifices were performed, as the Samothracians obserued in the honour of Ceres and Proserpina. Caesar pursuing the selfe-same occasion, saith, that there were others, who had Idols of immeasurable height, the members of whose bodies were framed of Twigs and Osters, which being filled with liuing men, & set on fire; these they dyed most miserably. Beside, they imagined, that the punishments of such as were apprehended for robberies and thefts, or any such like offences; were most pleasing to the immortal Gods, & these they made most vief of in those Idols. Neuerthelesse, for want of such offenders, they made no difficulty, in putting honest and innocent persons to the same affliction, whensoever neede and occasion required.

Strabo writeth the same of their Statues, saying, They builded a Colopius of wood, many parts whereof, were entrelaced with Straw: and therein they burned all kinds of beasts, and men also among them. But Diodorus saith, that in making their sacrifices to their Gods, they vied an impiety answerable to their bestiall nature. For, after they had kept (for the space of five whole yeares) such as were attained and continued of notorious crimes: they would spit them on stakes, from the fundament to the mouth, and so sacrifice them vnto their Gods. Then piling them vpon high piles of wood, and putting fire to them; this was the manner of their imolation.

molation. Pomponius Mela speaketh thus of the Gaules. They are a proud Nation, superstitious and cruell sometimes: for they verily beleue, that men are the best and most acceptable sacrifices to the Gods.

Neuertheless, we shall not thinke strangely, that the Statues of the Gaules Gods were of such excelsiue height: if we but remember only what Pliny saith, in 34. Booke, and euenth chapter. We beheld (saith hee) huge massive Statues of new inuention, which they called Colosses, or were no lower then Towers, but of equall height. In the same place hee speaketh of a number, among which he nameth Apollo Capitolinus, being of thirty cubites in height: Jupiter Tarentinus, which was forty cubites high: The Rhodian Sunne, fuenty; the thumbe wherof, few men were able to embrace. Apollo of Tuscanie, which was in the Lybrary of the Temple of Augustus, contained fifty foote in height, from the feet vpward. That of Nero, was an hundred foote high. But ouer and beside, Zenodorus saith, that in his time there was one made in the space of ten yeares, surpassing all other Statues in height & big- nesse: being the Statue of Mercurius, of incestimable value; and made in Antioch, a Common-weale belonging vnto the Gaules, and it contained foure hundred foote in height. Those Statues then of the Gaules Gods, were of wonderfull and extraordinary greatnesse, according as Casfar saith, which they filled full with liuing men, and so made offerings and sacrifices of them.

But you will object vnto me, that this manner of religion was cruell and abominable: whereto I must answer, that such cruelty was common vnto all other Nations, or rather proper and peculiar to the daemons, & familiar spirits of each country. Titus Livius writeth, that such sacrifices were made at Rome, after the ouertthrow at Cannas. He saith moreover, that in the interim while, certaine extraordinary & vnaccustomed sacrifices were performed, by consultation had with diuers fatall Bookes, wherein a Gaule-man and a Gaule woman, a Grecian man and Grecian woman, in the market appointed for Oxen at Rome, were laide along vpon the ground alide, in a place round engirt with stones, which had neuer before bene fulfilled with humane offerings or sacrifices, and there they were sacrificed after the Romane ceremoniall manner. This is the affirmation of Titus Livius, and therefore I shall neede to make no further mention cyther of the Arabians, Thracians, Scythians, Egyptians, or Grecians: considering, that Dionysius Halycarnassensis sheweth in the first Booke of Romane Antiquities, that Iupiter and Apollo, (because the tenth borne of euery male childe was not sacrificed to them) sent great and greuous calamities throughout all Italy. Diodorus in the twentieth Booke of his history, declareth, that (in his time) there was at Carthage, a Statue of Saturne, and such like sacrifices. And it was thought (saith hee) that Saturne was offended with the people, because that in (former times) they were wont to sacrifice to him, the most worthy and best borne of their children. Furthermore, that by the successe of times, instead of their owne children, they bought and entertained others, secretly nourishing the, and afterward sacrificed them vnto their Gods. This being closely and diligently discouered, & an infinite number of these supposd found out, which in that manner had bene sacrificed, they were easily perswaded to beleue, that for this occasion onely, the Gods being displeased, sent enemies to take and sacke their Cities, because they had not continued those honours, which from antiquity had bin done to the Gods. Wherefore, the better to appease them againe, they sacrificed publicly 200. young men, such as were the choycest & best borne among all their Nobility, and found out three hundred more, which (with their owne good liking, because they perceiued themselves to be suspected) gaue their liues freely to be sacrificed.

They had a Statue of Saturne, made of Brass, which was of wonderfull greatnesse, the hands wherof were extended in round circling manner on the ground, and children, being followed with eager pursuite, were enforced to enter into the roundure, and then fell into a very deepe pit, full of fire. If any man be desirous to haue more ample and certaine testimony hereof: Eusebius, in the fourth Booke & seventh Chapter of his Ecclesiasticall history, recounteth many examples of this Religion, obserued then in diuers Nations. Affirming further, that in the time of Adrian, and when the Evangelicall doctrine began to appeare in some bright splendour: those abominable cruelties were commonly abolished, albeit they remained still among the Celts. Neuertheless, Mela writeth, that they tooke ending in his time. Moreover he saith, some markes of this brutish cruelty, formerly abolished, yet notwithstanding, when they brought their offerings to their Altars, which were consecrated and dedicated to be sacrificed, they would make an essay or prooff of them, and with much deliberation. These then were the sinister & wile sacrifices of the Gaules, wherof Lucanus speaketh thus.

You Druides, after you forsooke your Arms, You fell to savage and barbarous customes Of wicked sacrifices. Only to you was given, To know the Gods, and holinesse of Heauen, Or not to know them.

This shall suffice, for the manner of sacrifices obserued among the Gaules. What shall we now say, concerning the ceremonies of the Britaines and Germanes? Already we haue related, what was the manner of behaviour, as also the disciplines of the Britaines. The Germanes (Casfar were farre differing from these customes and orders: For they had not their Druides to command in diuine matters, and to take care of their sacrifices. They held opinion of such as they beheld, and by whose aide they conceiued themselves to be succored manifestly; that they were worthy to be ranked in number among the Gods: As the Sunne, Vulcan, and the Moone, of others they neuer heard a ny speech. These are the words of Casfar. But Tacitus, ouer and beside these, speaking of the Germanes Gods, nameth Tuiston, or Tenton, a God borne of the earth, and of his Sonne * Mannus, who were the originall and beginners of their Nation. Then of the Sonnes of Mannus, by whose names, the neerest neighbours to the Ocean, called themselves Ingenoues; and they that dwelt neerer to the middle region, Hermiones; and the other Ilernoues. Among other Gods, they worshipped Mercury, in the honour of whom, it was permitted them (on certaine dayes) to offer humane sacrifices. They also appeased Heracles and Mars, by the sacrifices of beasts, which likewise was permitted vnto them. A part or certaine number of the Sveues, performed their sacrifices, to * Iffr; and yet, the cause and originall of such sacrificing, is not certainly knowne.

Casfar, in his first Booke, attributeth charmes, spels, & incantations to the Germanes, which were performed by women. For when Casfar questioned with a prisoner, wherfore Arminius would not bid him bataille: he found it to be a custome among the Germanes, that the mothers in their seuerall families, did declare by spels and vaticinations, whether it were profitable to offer bataille, or not, and they would say that it was not possible for the Germanes to be Conquerors, if they gaue the bataille before the new Moone. Tacitus speaketh much more of these diuinations, & among the rest, relateth the pre-fages and incantations which they most obserued. The very simplest, and most vulgar manner of their diuining (saith hee) was, by taking a branch cut off from a fruit tree, which they would cut into diuers peeces, with certaine very knowledgable markes made upon them, and afterward throw or scaype the (casually, and without any regard at all) vpon some white garment. If the matter were to be consulted publicly, then it was done by the Priest of the City. But if it were in private, or particularly, the father of the family, husing made his prayers to the Gods, and eleuating his eyes vnto heauen, taketh the peeces of the branch by three and three, and when he hath lifted them aloft, he maketh his interpretation, according as he findeth the marks that were formerly engrauen. If he finde the case to be prohibited, he maketh no other consultation (concerning that matter) that day: but if he finde it to be permitted, then he seeketh further for the truth thereof, by other kindes of predictions, which giueh perfect knowledge in that place, both by questioned voices, and also by the sight of Birds.

Moreover, it was proper and particular to this Nation, to make experience of pre-fages and aduertisements by herbes, which publicly had bene bred in their Woods and Forrests, and were all wholly white, without any spotte vpon them, and had neuer bene labored or employed, or vfed in any seruice of man: The Prielt, or the King, or else the Prince of the Citie, ascending then vnto the sacred Chariot, and

And there was not any other preface, whereto the people (but especially the very principall persons in the City, yea, and the Priests themselves) did give more credite, then to this: as perswading themselves that they were the Ministers of the Gods, and came neereft in counsell to the. They had another obseruation of prefaging, whereby they could foretell the issue of their warres, how cruell or dangerous fouer they were, and how they should succeed. They would take a prisoner of that Nation, with who they intended to make warre, and he should combat with one of the brauest and most gallant spirits of all their owne people, & with those weapons belonging to the Country. Afterward, the victory of the one or other, turned to the preiudice and disadvantage of the vanquished, and of his Nation.

CHAP. XV.

What Ceremonies were obserued among the Gaules at the times of their Burials, or Funerals, &c.

HE manner and Ceremonies of their Funerals, are set downe in Caesar. Their Funerals (saith he) are (after the Gaulish brauery) magnificent and sumptuous, with throwing all those things (what fouer) into the fire, which they imagined that the dead person (during his life time) most esteemed and affected, especially his Reast. And some short while before this memory, such seruants and domestick attendants, as were induged to be dearely loued of their Masters (to make the Funerall Ceremony the more intire and compleate) were burned together with the other things. Caesar hauing affirmed this, methinkes Pausanias as deseruet to be laughed at, when hee saith in the tenth Booke of the warres of Brennus: That the Gaules contemned, and held the buriall of their dead in disdaine, because, that by the opinion of such cruelty, they might affright their enemies, not hauing any more pity on the dead, then on other living persons. In this point Caesar refuteth Pausanias and Titus Livius also, where he specketh of the Gaules besiedging Rome, his words, in the fift Booke of his third Decade, are these. They heaped and piled men one vpon another, and so burned them indifferently together: because they would not bury them each after other, whereby they ennobled the place magnificently in imitation, and answerable to the name of the Gaules: sepulchers.

As for that which Caesar saith, That all that which was pleasing to the dead person, was cast into the fire with him: At Rome, into the fire made for Iulius Caesar himself, the Trumpeters threw their torne garments; the Legionaries, their Armes; the Matrones their Chaines and Jewels, yea, and the precious purple deckings of their children. Caesar doth not declare apparently, whether the seruants & domesticks were throwne into the fire, living or dead: but that he meant the living, may easily be coniectured by that which Mela saith.

They wer such (saith he) as voluntarily wold cast themselves into the fires made for their parents kindred, and masters, holding opinion, that so they were sure to liue with them. We haue such another example, in the 5. of *Cicero*es Tusculanes, where it is said, That the women of India, when their husbands died, had a custome of combat and iudgment, to make prooff thereby, which of them was best beloued of her husband, for one man had many wives. She that carried the honour of the combat, being followed and attended by her other companions, was (with great joy) placed in the fire, and there burned with him: the other that had fought, and lost the day, returned home mourning, and disconsolate to her house. This cruell manner of behaviour, may well keepe company with the other ceremony, of immolating or sacrificing humane oblations.

Tacitus speaketh in this manner, concerning the Funerall of the Germanes. They bring the bodies of their companions into doubtfull battels, and that there may be found no ambition of glory among them, for interring of their dead: they onely obserue, that the bodies of the most noble, or of greatest apparence, may be burned with certaine wood. They do not heape vpon the pile of wood, neither their garments, or any odours: but onely allow to each man his proper Armes, & in the fire of some, they make addition of their horses. One only sod or urse of earth is building sufficient for the sepulcher, they contemne pompous workmanship and honourable labor about Monuments, as being offensive to the dead. Complaints and teares are some ouerpass with them, but griefe & sadness is of longer continuance: for women to weep is honest, onely men are to remember.

But Pliny in his thirteenth book & first chapter, speaking of the Sacrifices, & the whole discipline of the ancient Gaules, sets himselfe against the Magick Arts, as fraudulent and deceitfull, seeming to reproue and accuse the discipline of our Druides with the same crime. Let no man meruail (saith he of the Art-Magick) if great authority be giuen to such discipline. Because it onely will comprehend and rediggest the three Sciences all into one, which haue most command ouer our humane will.

First of all, no one doubteth, but that it receiuieth birth & beginning from Physicke, and that vnder pretence of yeelding helpe by little and little: it hath vlsurped the place, as feigning it selfe to be more high and healthfull, then Physicke, and with such enticing and delirious promises, makes addition of some strength and power of Religion, whereby men (yet to this day) do abuse themselves. And yet to satisfie them better, they haue intermingled the Mathematicks, because there is not any one, but he is very conetous, and desirous to vnderstand future things concerning himselfe, and of his fortune, as beleeuing vndoubtedly, that such knowledge cometh from Heauen. Thus the reason and vnderstanding of men being surprized, and seriously busied in this manner: the discipline is fortified with a triple bond, and growne to such an encreasing greatnes; as euen in these dayes (in most parts of the world) it beares away the reputation from all other, commanding ouer the Kings and Princes of the East. From whence issued the Magick faction, Persian, Mosaiacall, and Ciprian. Finally, the fixe hundred, sixty & seuenth yeere from the building of Rome, Cneus Cornelius Lentulus, and Publius Licinius Crassus being the Consuls, an Edict was made, that no man was to be offered in sacrifice, and assuredly, the celebration of such prodigious sacrifices vanished away. But contrariwise, the Gaules kept them, euen till our memory: For Tiberius Caesar wholly abolished the Druides, & such kind of Prophets & Physitions. What mention shall I make of this discipline, which hath out-stept the bounds of the Ocean, entering into Britanny, where (at this day) it is celebrated with all reuerence, & such ceremonies, as it seemes that they haue taught it to the Persians? It hath attained to such consent with the whole vniuersie, (although it can grow to no agreement, or can well know it selfe): as we do little conceiue, how highly we are beholden to the Romans, who vterly abandoned all such monstrous behaviour: being formerly fauoured (as a charitable work) to kill and sacrifice men, yea, and a very wholesome thing to eate them.

So far extend the works of Pliny, whereby one and beside the Arts formerly remembered, he attributeth Physicke also to the Gaulish Druides. But he greatly blameth the frauds therein concealed, & deseruedly commendeth the Romanes, for excluding such monstrous qualities out of their Empire. But would to God, that they had onely abolished the frauds and deceipts in such Arts, and not the true Arts themselves, nor the Schooles and profession of them: For then vndoubtedly, wee should in duty thanke them, and crowne them with honour. But Pliny saith, that Tiberius wholly ouerthrow the Druides. Notwithstanding, the same man dislouered Magick, by some example of the Druides, as in the last Chapter of his seauenth Booke, speaking of Glew, or a certaine Gumme, hee hath these words.

We may not omit (saith he) in this case, one admirable matter of the Gaules. The Druides (by such name they terme their Magicians) esteeme nothing more precious then Glew and Gum, and that the Tree where it groweth, during the time it hath vigour: they themselves do then make chaffe in their Woods and Forests, which haue such power to nourish those Gummes, that they will not offer any sacrifice, without the leaues of such a Tree. And it may be very likely, that from the Greeke interpretation, vpon this occasion, they were called Druides. In briefe, they hold opinion, that that which taketh but its original with those Trees, is sent from heauen in such sort, that such a Tree is chosen of the Gods. Such a Tree is very rare to finde, but being found, they take it with great ceremony and religion, & as one al other, at the time of the Noons festiue, or first Aeon, which is the beginning of their Moneths and yeares, and of the world after thirty yeares. Because that then she is in her strength, you being in diminution of her moiety, and they terme it by a word in their language, signifying, To be helping in all things. They prepare the sacrifice and a banquet under those Trees bringing thither two Bulles wholly white, the hornes whereof are as yet scarce able to be bound. The Priest, clothed in a white Robe, mounteth up the Tree, and cutteth the branches with a Sickle of Gold, and such as fall are received in a white cloth. Then they offer their sacrifices, making their prayers that God will make their gift prosperous and happy, for them to whom they intend the giving. They are of opinion, that such things being given in drinke to any sterile or barren body, either of women or beasts, will make them fruitful, and be able that it is a soveraigne remedy against all poisons. Thus sometimes a Religion is made among men in matters merely frivolous, and not of any importance.

Thus you see what Pliny saith, concerning the mysteries of the Gaules Magick, wherein he findes the greeke etymology of the name of the Druides (although that it is a Gaulish name, to wit, of Dryon, as already hath bene said) as in all languages you may finde infinite words, which (by some conniunity) seeme to be derived from another tongue: as in like manner the Mathematicians, in their moneths and yeares, and the Chronology of their ages, do declare sufficiently, that the Mathematicall disciplines, albeit after the Greekes descriptions, do not alwaies fall out to be one and the same. But letvs pursue some other examples of Pliny.

In his one and twentieth Booke, and the eleventh Chapter, hee speaketh thus. There is a certaine hearbe, like unto Sabine, called Selago, which is gathered without any yron weapon, by the right hand, thrust into some left-handed plowe or steene, in manner of a sheefe. And the party must be clothed with a white garment, having his feete naked and cleanly washed: and sacrifice must be performed with Bread and Wine, before any offer of gathering, and modestly brought thither in a new Napkin. The Druides of the Gaules have written, that this hearbe is very soveraigne against any perill or dreaded danger, and also that the smoke thereof is profitable for the diseases in the eyes. They haue also another hearbe, which they call Samola, which groweth in moist and waterish places, and they use to gather it alwaies with the left hand: it serueth against all diseases in Swine and Kine, and whoeuer gathereth it, must not (by any meanes) be seene, neither must he bring it into any other place, then a gutter or brooke, and there breake or bruise it in the water, that the Beasts may swallow it in their drinking.

In the same place is recited another Magick of the Gaulish Druides, whereunto (in the third Chapter of the twentieth Booke, written by the said Author) there is another very like euery way. Moreover (saith hee) there are a certaine kinde of Egges, whereof great account is made in Gaul, and whereof the Greekes haue not made any mention. Summer causeth an infinite number of Serpents to heape themselves together, writhing and embracing in a kinde of artificiall hugging: when either by the moisture issuing from their mouthes, or slimy scumme of their owne bodies, that which they call the Serpentine Egge is engendered. The Druides say, that (by their hissing or whistling) it is exalted up into the Ayre, and in the meane while it must be received downe in some robe or garment, because it may not touch the earth. But he that receiues it, must make great speed away upon a horse, because the Serpents will pursue him swiftly, untill they find hinderance by some River or Water. The proofe and experience thereof is, when it is floated against the water, especially when it is enchaied in gold. But as the cunning of Magicians is well contriued, for the more ingenious conueryng of their fraud: so they say, that it must be taken in a certaine Moone, as if it were lawfull in humane iudgement, to accord such an operation of Serpents. Verily, I haue seene this kinde of Egge, of the bignesse of an indifferent round Apple, bearing a crust or shell like a gristle, seamed with little mouthes or opening, like to them which are on the armes of the Polypus or Pourcortrell, and the Druides holde it for a most notable thing. It is highly esteemed, as for gaining victory in fights and combats, and to haue access to Kings & Princes: by such an abuse, and no other reason that I know, a Romaine knight of the Poenitians, was put to death by the Emperor Claudius, onely in regard of fighting, for he alwaies carried such an Egge in his bosome. Neuertheless, the embracing and colligation of Serpents, and the alliance of the most cruell creatures, seemeth to haue bene bee the cause, whereby strange Nations (as an argument of peace) made a Caduceus of Serpents writhed round about, and it hath bene a custom: also, that they should be created in the Caduceus.

Thus hath Pliny noted the Serpentine Egge, to proceede from the Gaules Magick, and that for this cause onely, the Knight was thine by the Emperor, who stood in feare of this Magick. Finally, the Romanes, to abolish utterly the discipline of the Druides, tooke occasion by this Magickall superstition: but though impiety, superstition, magick and vices may be rooted out, yet vertue will continue still sound and intire. Would to God that the Romanes had maintained in like place, and in like number, the Gaules as the Greeks. The Empire hath bene snatched from the Greeks, but Learning and Artes was left with them still. Greeke hath bene contriained to make way for the Latine tongue: but yet continually Grammer, Rhetorick and Philosophy hath bene, and yet is taught in greeke. What greeke then was it to the Romanes, to expulse not onely the Gaulish Iudges from their seates: but the professors also, yea, the very sciences & disciplines of the Gaules out of their Schooles?

CHAP. XVI.

Of the Iustice exercised in Ancient Gaule, compared with that of the Romanes, by dividing the chiefe men into two degrees, of Druides and Knights, and two kinde of Magistrates, with the punishment of disobedience to superior Officers.

therto we haue gone thorough three parts of the proposed labour, to wit; The prudence of discipline. The entire knowledge of truth; and likewise of providence. There yet remaineth the fourth part, namely of Iustice, which is Princesse and Mistresse of all other manners. It behooveth vs then, to seeke for the principality of ancient Gaule, and what it was; what power the people had, and what policy was maintained among them: that which we terme the Platonick good and benefit of Temperance, Fortitude, & of Providence, whereby each man hath that belonging to him, without vamping on any thing appertaining to another.

The Common-wealth, at least that of Gaule, whose lockes of hayre being long enough in Cæsars time; was mecerly Timocraticall, and in many parts very like vnto the Roman liberty, as by that which followeth, hee which will examine things particularly, may easily perceiue. Let vs then obserue what Cæsar hath said, and especially concerning customes and behaviour. In all Gaule, or Gallia (saith he in his sixth Booke) all men that are of any make, or made any account of, are diuided into two sorts; to wit, into Druides, and into Obenalliers: for the common people is of no other reckoning, but as vnderlings and flaves, not daring (of themselves) to do any thing, neither are they admitted to conuence in any matter. Be hold what partition Iulius Cæsar hath instituted of himselfe, albeit it is not altogether true which he speaketh of the people, as shall at large bee deliuered hereafter, in place more conuenient for the purpose.

In this partition of Cæsar, There is one (saith he) that Presideth, or is as Primate ouer all the other Druides, that hath cheefe command and authority of the rest. He being dead, if there be any one among the other, that hath the aduantage in worthinesse, or desert: he is to succeed, if there be many of equal parity and condition; he is to be chosen (by votes of the Druides) from among the rest. Diuers times they contend for the soverainety or Mastership by weapons, and so strine who shall haue the prime place.

Here Cæsar propoeth two distinct kinde of Magistrats, one to rule or gouern in diuine things, y other in such as are humane and ciuill. Among the Druides, he institueth teth one, to be as the high or cheef Priest, and he defineth his election, to bee either by Dignity, or by Suffrages, or by Arms. And there is no great difference, between the institution of the Roman high Priest, and this other man: but onely, that at Rome he is annuall or yerely, & in Gaul it seemeth he hath bene perpetuall. That the Druides have bene spread ouer all Gaule, even in Cities, Townes and Burroughs, their estates haue shewne sufficient manifestation: for the Druides did euer command ouer the three principall parts of the Common-wealth: as in profession of Artes, in iudgments, pleading, & ceremonies belonging to their sacrifices. All the younger sort (saith Caesar) haue their recourse to them, to be instructed by them, and to learne sciences, as also a great number of verses; so that some continue there twenty yeares, only to learne knowledge. And surely, an honest stipend or recompence, can neuer want Masters to giue instruction.

The young men resort to the Druides, to learne of the

The Druides exempted from war & taxation.

The Druides (saith Caesar) are not wont to goe to warre, but stand exempted from it, and immunity of all other taxations & charges. So that in regard of such faire acknowledgements and freedoms, there are many that come to be ranked among them, and to follow the study of their disciplines, they are sent thither by their parents & kindred. Let me now entreate yee, and (euen in honest charity) but to obserue well this place alleged by Caesar. Can there be any thing more excellent, or more magnificent, thē when the Primates of a Country, or the Governours and very greatest Princes in a Common-wealth, do make profession of disciplines? Perhaps, some will consider sweatingly on this point, as though wee would haue the cheefest men, and those that are the grauest in our Cities, to keep Schooles, and apply their paines to instruct other. Notwithstanding, let me tell ye, Plato would haue such men (and no other) to take the charge of educating, & deliuering the knowledge of Sciences: because such a place should be as a Seminary or seed-plot, of great, iudicious, and learned men, meete to administer and beare authority in a Common-wealth: wherein the grafts and plants must needs be the more rare and excellent; by how much the grafters and planters are most vertuous and honourable.

Plato, his aduice concerning men of iudgement & learning.

I wonder at the opinion of Pliny, in many passages alledged by him, and especially in this, where he writes: That with the ancient manners and fashions of Rome, the Land abounded, & did daily bring forth double increase. What was the cause (saith he) of such abundance? The earth was as then husbanded by the hands euen of the cheefest warriors, and, as it is credible, that the earth toyed and reioyced, to be honoured with a share or culture crowned with Laurell, and by the labour of a victorious triumphing conqueror: euen so did it transile and endeavour it selfe the more industriously, to produce the seed sowne in that nature, as to prosper their other warlike proceedings. And the like diligence, for well husbanding the ground, as also to order and direct a potent Army, or else in all other things, which are performed by noble and honest hands: do increase the more abundantly, and become so much the more fertile, by how much they are the more carefully executed. But now adiaies, this faire and honourable mystery, is exercised by foule, infamous, and condemned hands, by men that are either theues, or banifits, or haue lost their eares, or branded with some such other wicked impiation. Notwithstanding, the good earth is not deaffe, who being called Mother, and bids herselfe to labour and fructifie, by a Latine word, called Coli, which significth also to do honour, as beeing thence deriued: whereby it plainly appeareth, that what seuer she now doth or produceth, she doth it but in meere disdain, and against her owne liking. And therefore we must needs mernaile, that no such profits arise in the times of these labourers, as in the famous daies of these flourishing Captaines. So farre extend the words of Pliny.

But by your fauour, do not we conceiue, that it is as conuenable for vs, to speake of the exercise of disciplines, as of those which concerne the earth? Euen such was the fertility and abundance of the Gaules disciplines, when in the times of our Druides, the Schooles of the Muses, became the Pallaces of Kings; the chaires of Masters, were the seates of Princes; the number of Students, was the company & following of honorable Lords. Then Palles delighted to be in a royall Colledge, vsing one & the same Rector or governor in the common-wealths affaires, & to declare the Sciences and disciplines, explicating those instructions in one self-same manner, manner, for gouerning their Common-wealths. And by the same discretion and providence, they instituted the rules of Arts, Lawes, and Ordinances: wherein all things increased the more prosperously, and more abundantly (by honest labours) as they were the more diligently and respectfully followed. There were many in those daies, who being spurred on by such recompences, and the expectation of those proposed honours, addicted themselves (gladly) to apprehend those disciplines, being sent to the same end & purpose (from the remotest parts) by their parents and kindred.

Hereupon, and for the same occasion, Lucian was the more willing to haue the Gaulish and Cymian Hercules depicted; not onely couered with the depoyle of a Lyon, and a massy Club: but also decrepite, bald, aged, wrinkled, and meager; drawing a great number of Conquered men after him, in chaines of gold fastned to their eares. Their tongues also were pierced thorow, and at them hung little Chaines of gold, in such sort, that those valiant disposed and conquered gallants, followed the Hercules that drew them, he turning oftsoons his face and looks to behold them, with very milde & affable behauiour. And what else was all this, but the eloquence of the Bardes, as also the wisdom of the Sarronides and Druides? which euen at the first sight (without any more regarding) caused such admirable affection to the same. The great number of Students, which submitted themselves vnder their charge, onely to learn their disciplines and goodly knowledge in so many noble things: figured those Chaines of golde. And euen so the Schollers, hung by the eares at the mouths of their Master, as being taken & bound by his rich words, and the sweet doctrine flowing thence. Then did all disciplines flourish, in regard that the professors of them were rare and excellent. But so soon as by the Romaine Empire, the salary and honour of Learning was taken away and abolished, euen as sodainly was the profession of those Disciplines esteemed and held to bee but a seruite and mechanickal thing. Which was the onely occasion, that (necessarily as it were) those honest and liberall studies languished for a long time, and by an ouer-tedious experience, hath approoued the saying of the Orator to be true; That Honor is the Nurse of arts, and all hearts are enflamed with the love of the Sciences, onely in regard of their glorie. For neuer should any account bee made of such things as are misprized and condemned by euery man.

Thus the loose and burying of the Gaules disciplines, are due to none but vnto the Romaines, by whose tyranny the honour of their profession, and their liberty together, was violently taken from the Druides. Wherefore Melas (who flourisheth vnder Claudius saith. Now are not the braue and worthy Schooles of the Dryydes, because they are become clandestine, and suppressed by other, banished into the deepe & furthest off Forrests. So that the Discipline of the Dryydes, was not onely robbed of her former honour, but compelled in meere feare of danger, to hide her selfe in caues and thickest woodes. Lucane seemeth to take knowledge thereof with Melas, speaking thus of the Dryydes.

—Your dwelling now, is in the strongest and profoundest Forrests.

Caesar also in his fifth booke. The Gaules (saith hee) perceiving from whence the beginning of warres came, held their consultations in the night time, and in desert places. Likewise in the sixteenth booke. The Princes of the Gaules, in their Councells (appointed in Woods and concealed places) complained amongst themselves of their seruitude. Neuertheless, we conclude not, neither by the authority of Melas, nor of Lucane, nor of Caesar, that the Colleges of the Dryydes, that the assembly of Councell, and deliberation of their men of Warre, were in the woods: for that would appeare rather to be a signe of seruitude and constraint, then of erudition or consultation. But proceede we on to speake of the fallacy of wages, and honest presents, usually giuen to the ancient Dryydes. The Dryydes (saith Caesar) doe not onely take the reward of their honest profession, but ouer & besides, the Gaules giue them great honor and reuerence. All castes in controuersie, bee they either publicke or private, are referred to their iudgement. If there happen any thing to bee done amisse, or any murther committed: if there arise any dissention, concerning inheritance, succession, or bounds of Landes: they are are them that give sentence, and constitute the reward of well doing, and punishment of misdemeanors. Strabo addeth hecetero (I know not how) that by their Magical superstition, they judge of the fertility of the year, according to the multitude of criminal causes.

But proceede we with the rest of Caesar. If there be any man, either a private, or publique person among the common people, that will not obey their ordinances & decrees: he is interdicted from coming to the sacrifices, which is the most greivous punishment in all their Nation. They that stand so interdicted from the sacrifices, are reputed among the number of lewd & wicked people: All men flyes from them, and euery man stands in feare to speake to them, or to keepe company with them, as dreading some Contagion or Plague should happen to them by such frequentation. And if they demand Law or Justice, it is denied, and may not be granted them, neither may they enjoy any preferment or honor, or the least reverence done vnto them by any. But what manner of sentences or iudgements do the Germanes obserue? What penalties, and punishments are amongst them? It appertaineth to none but Priests, who haue the full power of commanding (saith Tacitus) to impose silence in publicke consultation. Moreover, it is not permitted but to Priests onely, to chastise, beate, or bind them, not as the paine or punishment of the offence, nor by the command of the Prince: but euen as by diuine permission, & as a commandement given by God, whom they make account to be then in presence, and to be assisting in their fights. In Warre also they carry certaine Pictures and Images, vpon which they bring away from their halloved places. The difference of punishment is an inuincible run to the delict. Traytors, and such as forsake their Captaines of their Nation, to doe any seruice vnto a stranger enemy, are hanged vpon the Trees. Vagabondes, Rogues, ydle liuers, and all such as are noted of foule infamie, are drowned in muddie, or in some Adarish place, & covered all ouer with slish. The variety of punishment is much respected there, to the end, that the enormity of the offence, may be knowne by the qualitie of the infliction, and that vice may by no means be couered. But in crimes of lesser nature, the parties which are conuicted, are condemned in Fines, of a certaine number of Horsettes, or other Beasts, whereof one part of the forfeite is giuen vnto the King, or to the Cittie: and the other part is giuen to him, for whom the penaltie is done, or to his nearest Kindred.

Returne we now again vnto the Druides of the Gaules: for, Caesar defendeth the times and the places, where they did vie to keepe their Sessions. The Druides (saith hee) vpon certaine dayes in the year, and vpon the Borders of the Carnutes (the which Countrey is reputed to bee the verie midst of all Gaule or Gallia) do vse to keepe their great dayes meeting, in a certaine consecrated place, where all sortes of men, that haue suites or Controuersies, make their Assembly, being obedient vnto the sentences & iudgements of the Druides. Caesar doeth not distinguish the times of the year, but onely the place, which was on the Limes and Confines of the Carnutes, as being the Center and middle of Gaule, where the Druides of all the Countreies of Gaule (euen as of all the world) were wont to meete together. Neuertheless, the Cittie of the Carnutes, named Chartres, was (in those ancient times) of much larger extendure, then now it is; and it is very likely, that it contained not onely the Chartrain Diocesse, but that also of Orleans. For before that Caesar arrived there, it was a Realme, which afterward was put by Caesar into the power of Tugetus the Carant, as himselfe hath written in his 5. booke.

In breefe; it seemeth that the Realme of Orleans, which afterwards was a long time maintained to bee a Realme by the Franconians, was the very same of Chartres: Considering withall, that Genabum or Genaba, was one of the Townes in the Carnutes Kingdome, and leated vpon the Riuer of Lotre, beeing in the time of Caesar beyond Orleans, a farr off by a great many Miles, and which hindered him in his way, when hee went from Agendicum to Gergobia. But those Druides assembled themselves together in that place from all partes, as in the Center of Gaule, according as Caesar hath spoken. I say then, that in all Gaule, and in the Citties, Townes, and Villages of Gaule, there were Druides, who gouerned in suites and Controuersies, and likewise in the Ceremonies of Religion: In breefe, the care of all things was committed to them. The Druides were then dispersed thoroughout Gaule, as now adayes are the

the men of the Church: notwistanding the Princes were wont to refer to a common Councell (at certaine times of the year) all the suites of their Citizens and subiects, wherein the chiefe Priest of the Druides gouerned onely.

Such (in elder times) was the Councell of the Amphictiones, which during the liberty of Greece was kept in Delphos (as Pausanias reporteth in his Phociques) & in the middle of Greece. Whereby appeareth, that the Druides of the Gaules, were like to the Amphictions of Greece, & their place as sacred in the Chartrain Countrey, as inuenerable to the Temple of Delphos, made so famous by the Oracles of Apollo. The matter would haue bene a little the more noble, if Caesar had called the place Delphos, which was consecrated within the limites of the Countrey of Chartres. Herein is shewen the authority, and (almost) royall power, which the Druides not onely held in priuate and particular, but intirely ouer all the people. The profession of Disciplines was in great reputation; the estate of iudgment a most famous authority; the power to performe sacrifices, and to speake of Divination, appertained vnto royall Maiestie.

The first degree of the Gaulish Commonwealth, was that of the Iupreme Magistrat; next, the Princes; then, the Chathalliers; the people made election according to his aduice, and for his benefit, and the commodity in generall, the Princes gaue him order how to make his warres; and such as did not well by their instruction, they would expulse and banish the. But you may demand of me, how this is to be proued? I will answer from Caesar, who speaketh thus in his sixth Booke. In Gaule (saith he) there are certaine factions, not onely in all Citties, Burroughes, and quarters, but also in euery particular Honbold, or the Princes or Heads of such Factions, are they whom they conceine (in their iudgment) to be the worthiest persons for authority: by whose aduice and determination, the verie greatest matters of weight or importance, either for publique affaires or Councell, are wholly disposed. Vpon which occasion it seemeth, that this matter hath bin thus ordered from reuerend Antiquity, that none of the meaneft should be deliuite of helpe, against a rich or potent superior. For there is no man, that will indure or suffer, that such as appertaine or depend vpon him, shall any way be oppressed or circumuented: for if he offered to do otherwise, hee shall not beare any sway among the people.

Thus you heare what Caesar saith, whereby may be vnderstood, the Timocraticall gouernment of a Commonwealth, which Plato and Aristotle so much commended, and which Greece (being in her libertie, and Italy also) did keepe so carefully: wherein, all the kinds of a iust and equitable policy are comprehended. Note the selfsame reason, in the whole charge of the affaires of Gaule; for there was royaltie in the annuall Magistrate, whereas Aristotle was discerned in the Senate, and briefly, Timocratie in the plaine power & authority of the people, by whom the Senators and Magistrats were created. And therefore let vs goe somewhat neerer, and examine the testimony of Caesar a little more narrowly, speaking of the Common-wealth of our Ancestors.

Such was the freedom and liberty of Gaule (saith Caesar) that in euery City, Towne, and Burrough, and almost in euery house, there were certaine factions, and it was in such sort, that euery one was permitted to deale closely and vnderhandly by voices and suffrages: so that the very meaneft and simplest, had power to giue their sentence, and deliuer their voyces. Heere then we are to vnderstand, that the Electors of the Magistrats amongst the Gaules, were such kind of men. And heereby wee plainly perceiue, that the authority of the people was not small in their Commonwealth: in regard that by voices and suffrages of the people, the Magistrats were then created. But what was hee that had the power to make election of these men? He that was reputed to be in the greatest authority, beside, all the affaires of consequence, and the whole deliberation of the Councell came onely to him. But why was it requisite, that so much authority should be in one Magistrat? Caesar himselfe makes answer vnto this Obiection. Because (vpon this occasion) it seemed that Antiquity (venerably) had so instituted it: to the end, that no man among the people (how meane or poore soeuer) should stand in neede of ayde against the richest oppressor. For he might not indure that any of his faction should be oppressed or circumuented. This then was the end of the the Magistrate, and the reason why the people said; We will not have this man, except by his vertue, and by his authority, he do defend that no man offer vs injury. We will not have this man, because he is both bad and ignorant.

But if a good Prince, who (at the beginning) hath made prooffe of his vertue, happened afterwards to change his manners; and as one that hath no longer care of the weale publike, propofeth his owne particular profit before the publike, and carry himfelfe otherwise then the Ordinances of the people haue commanded: he is excluded and banished, and (as Caesar saith) Deprived of all power and authority among his owne people. And to the end that this might not be imagined to be observed in some one Citie only, The selfe same course (saith Caesar) is kept thoroughout all Gaule. Herein then may be noted, the political authority of the people, when Magistrates are not onely chosen by the people, but also depofed & expelled. But Caesar saith nothing, whether this principality was constituted in the authority of many, or of one onely, neither for how long time it continued. Neithertheleffe, Strabo (in his fourth booke) defineth both the one and the other, saying: There were many kinds of Aristocratical policy, in ancient times they elected every yeare a Prince, as the people elected a Chief or Commander for the warre. Thus wee see, what Strabo saith: but a matter for goodly and commendable, should bee enriched with fower examples.

Cicero hath fo highly extolled the commonwealth of the Massilians, that before the people of Rome, in the defence of Fonticus, hee sayde: That the Discipline and grauity of the City of * Marfiles, deserved not onely to bee preferred equall to Greece, but almost with all other Nations of the world. In that Citie (saith Strabo) there were fixe hundred Senators, whome they termed Timouches, as men honourable, and who (all their life time) enjoyed that honour: from forth of which number, were elected and chosen fifteene Princes, to iudge such suits & causes, as happened day by day amongst them. And questionleffe, these were the fixe hundred Marfilians, and the fifteene cheefest men among them, whereof Caesar speaketh in his first booke. But let vs go on with the words of Strabo. Out of these fifteene (saith hee) they elected three, which had the most authority and power. In this manner Strabo describeth the Common-wealth of the Massilians, which neuertheles I alledge not as a name of Gaule onely, because it was better beloued and esteemed to be Greekish, rather the Gaulish: but also, because none of those Timouches was to bee elected, that had not bin a childe borne there, and had not bene a Citizen, euen to the third race or descent, as the same Strabo saith. Vpon this occasion, Aristotle (and very delectfully) calleth the Common-wealth of the Massilians Oligarchie, and not Aristocratie: for this declareth her Oligarchie, that Princes were not elected by their vertue, but in regard of their race.

I doe not alledge (I say) this Common-wealth, as an example of the Gaules Common-wealth: I desire to deliuer their owne true estates indeed, and those that truly were of Gaule, and first of all in general of all Gaule; next, of the Nations, and then particularly of euery Citie. The fcauenth Booke of Iulius Caesar, shall serue as a sufficient Testimonie in my common example, wherein Gaule is intirely described, both in orders, and all reuennues: albeit in the fcauenth yeare of the warres in Gaule, great store of the afflicted Townes and Citties, had diminished much of their reuennues. First (by a Common Councell) Percingetorix was elected for cheefe Commander, as Caesar himfelfe saith, when the Hedunians fought, that the Empire might bee giuen to them, as the matter came then in controuerfie. The whole Councell of Gaul (saith hee) was called as, Bibraete or Beaulne, where arrived a great number of men, and the Election was appointed to the most voyces: but by general consent it was concluded that Percingetorix should be Emperor, & the cheefe Leader of their Armies. Onely Caesar saith, that the men of Rhemus, the Lingones, and the Treuirians were not present at this Councell: but hee maketh no mention at all of the Aquitaines.

Afterward, when Percingetorix was besieged nere to * Alexia, the Gauls then called another Councell; wherein was ordained, that a certaine number of martial men should command ouer euery towne. And it was concluded, that fixe & thirtie thouthousand men should command the Hedunians, and their neighbors the Secufians, Ambinacres, Aulerkes, Brannonikes, & the Brannonians. The like number was appointed to the men of Anuerne, together with the Cadurcians, Heluterians, Gaballes, and Vellannians, who were vnder the domination of the Anuerians. To the Sequanes, Senones, Biturigians, Santorigians, Ruthenes and Carnutes, were appoynted twelve thousand men. To the Bellocanaces ten thousand, and as many to the Limoignes. To the Poitouines, Tourangeans, Parisians, and Heluetians, eight thousand to each. To the Sueffones, Amangeans, Mediomatrics, Petrocorians, Neruians, Morines, and the Nitiobrigians, fixe thousand to each. To the Aulerians and Cenomanians as many. To the Atrebatians four thousand. To the Bellocasians, Lexobians, and Aulerkes Eburones, three thousand to each. To the Rauracians and hoians, two thousand a peece. To all the Citties that border vpon the Ocean, and (according to their manner) are called * Armorica, fixe thousand.

Heere we haue a view of the publique Councell, vniuersally obserued thoroughout Gaule, and one selfe same manner of behauiour, and answerable to the Amphytriones, of assigning by a Councell publique, the estate and reuennues of euery Citie. Notwithstanding, one onely man did not command ouer all these Companies: but there were foure captains, with whom were ioyned some Councillors of these Citties. Caesar in the same place saith: That the whole charge of these affaires of the Empire, was giuen to Camius the Atrebatian, to Viridomarus, to Eporodix the Hedunian, and to Iergasilanus of Anuerne, Cosine Germane to Percingetorix by the mothers side: and vnto them were assigned certaine other chosen persons of the Citties, as Councillors for the warre. Neuertheleffe, we may obserue, if in all the Gaulish Nations, the same estate of commonwealth was kept, as among the Celts, Belges, and Aquitaines.

In the time of the warre in Gaul, it neuer hapned, that the Celts kept the like ceremony of Councell: for the greater part of them were associated with the Romaines, either by amity or alliance, or by what kind of dutie else, I know not. Notwithstanding, in the war of the * Ventes, a coniuration was made of the Armorican Citties, the * Ventes, the * Ofsifians, the * Lexobians, the * Nannets or Nannetians, the * Disblinters, the * Curiofolites, the * Vuellians, the Ambiliates, and the Eburones. Suddenly were Ambassadors sent (saith Iulius Caesar in his third booke) and by aduice of their Princes & Noblemen, they conferred together. To do nothing without Councell, and to abide such disasters as Fortune should send vnto them. Soliciting the rest of the Citties, to choofe rather to continue in the liberty which they had receyued from their Ancestors, then to endure the seruitude of the Romaines. Neuertheleffe, the cheefe Head or Commander of all the Army, is not named by Caesar in any part whatsoever. And yet in the publique councell of the Belgians (whereby was plainly and openly determined against Caesar, the intire liberty of all Gallia:) the maine and eminent charge of the affaires (by the wil and consent of all men) was put on Gallia King of the * Sueffones, as well in regard of his owne good deservings, as for his wisdom and prouidence.

In this warre at that time, the * Bellouacanes contributed to the number of three score thousand armed men; the Sueffones fifty thousand; as many the Neruians, the Atrebatians fifteene; the Ambians ten; the Morines fixe and twenty; the * Menapians feuen; the Caletines ten; the Pelocassians & Veromandunians as many; the Aduatians nineteene; the Condrusians, Eburones, Ceressians, Pemianians (which all by one name are called Germanes) forty thousand. Here is to be seene a Common Councell indeede, and thereby likewise, the intire power and authority of euery Citie. Such a coniuration also was amongst the Aquitaines, of whom Caesar writeth thus: Then the Aquitaines began to send forth Ambassadors, and to interchange Hostages, to muster men of warre, and to craue ayde of the Cantabrians their Neighbors: as also to elect for their Capitaines, certain men that had serued (all their time) with Q. Sertorius: & therefore were reputed to bee most expert in the actions of Armes. It is then plaine and apparant by the places before alledged; that the policy proposed by Caesar, was not onely common to all Gaules; but likewise generally in recommendation to all the Nations.

CHAP. XVII.

Of the forme of Government observed in the Common-wealths of the severall Cities and Nations: and what their Rulers and Magistrates: as also how they attained to their authority.

ET vs now particularly illustrate the Governments in the Common-wealths of the Nations and Cities of the people. And first of all, let vs speake of the Celts, among whom the Heluetians have bene reputed to be the most braue and valiant Nation. What administration & government of Common-wealth hath bene observed in their cheefest City? The City of the Heluetians was situated betwene Rhein & Rhone, as also the Mountain Jura, in a triangular forme or shape, having twelue towns, and foure hundred Villages, & the whole diuided into foure Regions: yet not for warre onely, but likewise for Iustice, and for doing right to all men. There were two, named by Caesar himselfe, * Tigurine and Verbigenia. These Regions were as one Parliament, that had the whol charge of the affairs of the Realme, and for matters of consequence, were wont to come into a publike Councell, where for the Election of a Prince, hapned a coniuration amongst them of the Citie, to burne all their Townes, Burroughes, and Villages, to forsake their owne limites, and by force to seize and surprize the kingdome of the Gaules.

For the better execution of this enterprize, Orgetorix, one of the most apparant and Noblemen was made choise of; and this act declared at the first, even a meere and certaine Timocraticall affliction. Orgetorix overcome with a courteous affection of Soueraignty and reigning, imbraceth this Conspiracie: but the issue requieth obseruation, after the matter came to be discouered. This happening to the knowledge of the Heluetians, by some presumptions and coniectures, Orgetorix was taken prisoner, and they would haue compelled him (according to their manner) to confesse the truth: which if he fell out to be approued, their Law condemned him to be burned with fire. Orgetorix summoned to this Sessions all his friends, kindred, and alliance, who were in number ten thousand men, together with his seruants and debtors, who were a great company, that they might assit in the case of iudgement. Hee preuayled so well by this multitude of men, that hee freed himselfe from answering to his enditement, or disclosing vpon what occasion hee was incited to this matter of conspiracy.

In the meane space, while the Citie (being offended) sought to maintain the execution of their Lawes by the sword, & the Magistrates nexted men from all parts: Orgetorix dyed in prison, not without suspicion (as the Heluetians imagined) of murdering himselfe. Kingdomes (saith Caesar) were bought in Gaul, by such as were most potent and abounding in riches, and such as had the meanes to command most men at their pay. But what these kingdomes were, is easily to be coniectured, by the example of Orgetorix, and by others beside, whereof we are to speake hereafter. The Common-wealth then of the Heluetians, was parted in this manner by Regions, as at this day that of the Switzers is, who viurp and make vse of the borders of the Heluetians. Next, there were three great Cities of the Heduanes and * Aruernians; let vs now suruey these Common-wealths, and first that of the Heduanes, who were the very brauest and most valiant people, when Caesar made his warre in Gaule. Let vs make a good obseruation of this Common-wealth, and how (in three kindes of a iust and commendable government) it was iudicially ordered & maintained.

By a yearly election of Priests, in a certaine place, at a certaine time, & of diuers delects, amongst the Heduanes was chosen one called a Vergobret, who had full power as a King, and absolute authoritie of life and death; but he was not permitted to go forth of their iurisdiccions. Caesar in his first booke, making mention of the Heduanes, speaketh in this manner. After he had summoned together the cheefe Noblemen and Princes in his Campe, amongst whom were Dinnianus and Liscus, who at that that time was the cheefe Magistrate, and by the Heduanes called Vergobret, created year by year, & having power of life and death.

The rest is reported in the tenth Booke, where is declared how the Senate and people of the Heduanes, were in a great sedition about their Magistrate, for the appealing whereof, Caesar was called: these are his own words. The Princes Ambassadors of the Heduanes, came to Caesar & intreated him, that he would come to succour their Citie, especially in a time of such necessity, when their Common-wealth was in great danger. For where as (in former time) they were wont to haue but one Magistrate year by year, who had authority Royall: now there were two that bare that Office, yet both making their account, to be created by order of Law. One of them was called Conuictolitanus, a man in the flower of his youth, of great power, and well allyed: the other named himselfe Cottus, of a most ancient race, and one that was able to doe much: whose brother, named Valetiacus, had borne the same Office the year before. Moreover they sayd, that all the City was up in Armes, that the Senate and the people were diuided, each holding apart their severall factions: And if this mutinie should bee suffered for any long time among them, and no other means of help were afforded, they would make prize and bootie of one another, and all must goe to generall ruine.

Caesar, though he knew it to be a dangerous matter, to forbear his wars, and depart from his enemy: yet, in regard he was not ignorant what great inconveniences do grow out of such distentions; and fearing withall, that such a Citie, so well allyed to the Roman people, which he had alwayes maintained, and furnished with all things he could devise; least also the part that was most distrustfull of him, should send for ayde to King Vercingetorix, he resolved to go thither, & prevent the perill betimes. And because, by the Lawes of the Heduanes, the cheefe Magistrate might not absent himselfe out of the countrey, as doubting thereby, that hee should diminish any part of their right & Lawes; hee went himselfe in person vnto them, and called before him all the Senat, and they also among whom the strife had happened. When the whole Citie was (well-neere) assembled together, and hee was fully informed, that by the consent of a few, priuily congregated together in an vnmeete place, and at an vnlawfull time; vnderstanding withall, that one brother had subrogated the other in his place; contrary to the lawes, which plainly did prohibit, that two of one Linage and family (being both liuing) should not onely bee disabled from creation in the Magistracie, but also not admitted into the Senat: Cottus was compelled to giue ouer his Office, and Conuictolitanus (who according to the custome of the City, vpon the ceasing of the former Magistrate, had bene created by the Priestles) had the full authority appointed to him. Caesar wrote all this himselfe, about the commotion of the Heduanes, whereby most clearly appeareth: that the royall dignitie was in the Vergobret, and the authority of the Seigneurie in the Senat; and finally, the Democraticall power in all the people.

But to know what, and how noble this City was, wee need no more then to look vpon many Townes, as were in the protection of the Heduanes, whereof Caesar speaketh in his Commentaries. Among them of greatest note in this Common-wealth, is Sibrac named, whereinto Caesar (as he writeth in his first booke) meant to go (as to the principal place of the Heduanes Nation) to haue Corne of the Heduanes. And to this place (as it is recorded in his tenth booke) Litanicus had withdrawn himselfe, because this was a Citie highly authorized among the Heduanes, and there the Magistrate Conuictolitanus, with a great part of the Senat came vnto him. Thither also were all the hostes of Gaule brought, when Caesar's Guards were slaine at Noviodunum. And there likewise was assigned the Councell of all Gaule, against Caesar: and thither also (finally) Caesar, after that he had recovered the Heduanes, betooke himselfe to winter for that season. This City (I say) was the very principal of the Heduanes, & (as the ambassador said in the Panegyricke of Conuictolitanus) it was after called Italia, Polia, Florentia, Flania. Moreover (in his 7. booke) Cabilone, & Maticon on Arar, are named among the Heduanes, and Noviodunum on Leyre. These that I haue named were their Tributaries, but their honors were the greatest in all Gaul. For the Riturgis, where in elder times were the ancient Kings of the Gaules; the Senones, and and (by the same meanes) the Parisians (who were in the protection of the Senones) their Clients, as being under their protection. So then, the City and Commonwealth of the Hedunnes had the most absolute authority in all Gaul anciently: according as hee hath written in his first Booke, but as wee may sooner see in his first booke; at all times it had the principality throughout Gaul, especially before it had aspired to the friendship of the Romane people. But after that the Hedunnes were called: Cousins and Brothers to the Romains: what decrees of the Senate, how many times, and in what honourable manner were they pronounced on their behalfe? VVe see then, that such and so great a City of Celtick Gaul, had had this Democraticall Commonwealth, and Pliny numbers it not among the Tributaries, but among the Cities allied together.

Now, concerning the commonwealth of the Aruernians, it was sometime the cheefest of Gaul; for (anciently) there were two Leagues throughout Gaul, as we read in the first booke: the Hedunnes were the ring-leaders of the one, and the Aruernians of the other. And Strabo hath related in his 4. booke, that that of the Aruernians, was more potent than the other; extending their Seignidury so farre as the confines of the Narbonians and Maisilins: to the Pyrenean Mountaines, to the Ocean, and to the Rhine. In like manner he speaketh faithfully concerning two cruell batrailes of the Gauls, giuen under the conduct of Bittus the Aruernian: and Strabo reporteth them in the same place, & Titus Livius in his 61. booke. The one was against Domitius, at the confluent of Sulgo and of Rhone; and the other against Fabius at Tijara & the same Rhone: where by we may plainly perceiue, that there was the same forme of Commonwealth, as formerly we haue spoken of.

For the Romane Senate, as it is in the first booke, being willing that the vanquished Gauls, or repulsed (at least) from the confines of the Roman Prouince, should continue in their franchises and liberties: nay, which is more, to the end that Gaul might remaine in the greater libertie; or, indeed, that Bittus himselfe (King of the Aruernians, according as Titus Livius ter-meth him in his 61. booke) who was gone to Rome to purge himselfe, should be kept in guard within Alba: but Centuriatus his son was taken and brought to Rome. Afterward, Celtillus the Father of Percingetorix, although he had held the principall place of all Gaul in a warre, yet notwithstanding, because hee pretended to make himselfe King, as is the 7. booke, the City put him to death. Percingetorix, by the meanes of his own people, was saluted as King of the Aruernians, and likewise it is said in the same booke, that all the Gauls called him King: neuertheless, vpon the same occasion hee was charged with treason, and hee came in iudgement before them as soueraigne Iudges, and in the end, couetousnes in desire of rule, procured alike to the father and son.

Thus the Kings were excluded out of the Commonwealth of the Aruernians, & they remained at liberty, even to the time of Caesar. And Pliny (in his time) remembereth it amongst the Cities of the Celts, which were at freedom: and then it had no lesse protection, then they of the Hedunnes as is already made manifest by the numbring of military forces formerly declared. The City then of the Aruernians hath anciently bin the Lady ouer that of the Hedunnes, and after that, the Hedunnes affected rather to bee brethren and cosines of the Romans, then of the Aruernians: they became like vnto them in habits and manners. And when at the last coming of Caesar, the Hedunnes were overcome & spoiled by the Germanes, yet were they then far greater in forces. Finally, when (by the courtesie and fauor of Caesar) the Hedunnes were not only replanted in their former condition; but it plainly appeared that they had more countenance and authority, then euer before: yet the other were equall to them, and alike in wealthie possessions. But in fauour and esteem throughout all Gaul, they were much greater; as the election of Percingetorix hath sufficiently shewne. VVherefore we may perceiue, that the liberty of a Commonwealth remained in these two cities of Celtick Gaul. For the remainder of the other that were of meaner ranke, hee speaketh not so much as of any one King, or of a Prince: but only we heare no other name, then of the people, and of the City.

among the principals, and of great authority among the Celts. Of some store of Towns that were vnder it, Caesar hath named two, Agnetecum & Vellunodunum. Caesar wrought by certaine meanes, that Canarinus was their King; because Mortisagus, brother to Canarinus and his ancestors, had held the same authority in that realme, for Caesar had undertaken this colour, only to establish a kingdom there. Neuertheless, the Senones, although Caesar was present, essayed by a councill publike, to put Canarinus to death. And as he (hauing intelligence thereof) fled away, they pursued him so far as the Frontiers, expelling him from his house & kingdom. The commonwealth of the Parisians was the like, by that which we read in his 7. Booke. For the Parisians, by a Common Councell of diuers Cities, vnderooke warre for the liberty of their country, electing Camulogenus to bee their commander, by reason of the experience hee had in actions of Armes, and the good will they bare vnto him.

Carnutum also was a great City, as already hath bin shewn, & Caesar wrought the like meanes to establish a kingdom there. Among the Carnutes there was one Tafgetius, a man descended of a great place and whose Ancestors had held dominion in that City. Caesar (as he saith himself) in regard of his vertue, and for the good will hee had found in him, because hee had bene a great helpe to him in all the wars, planned him in the same place which his Ancestors had held. Hee had reigned but 3. yeeres, when his enemies being authorized by many men of the city, openly slew him. These Cities then had their Bruti, as well as Rome. So Caesar named the Senate of the Eburones, Lexobians, and Vennetes. At the same time, Teutomatus was king of the Nitiobrigians, but by a publike Councell of Gaul, hee yielded obedience against Caesar. This may serue as sufficient, concerning the government of the Celtic Cities.

What then is to be said of the Cities of the Belgians? By what manner of Empire were they particularly gouerned? The extendure of the men of Rhemes was very great: because it ioyned with the Segnans, Mediomatrics, Treuirians, Veromandunians, and the Sweftones. Notwithstanding, in all these parts, hee nameth but two towns or Cities, Durocororum and Bibrax. In the first Booke, the councell of Gaul was assigned at Durocororum; and in the second booke Bibrax was besieged. Concerning the men of Rhemes, in the time of Caesar, they hadde the managing of the Gauls, and held the second place in dignity, next to the Hedunnes. Caesar nameth their Senate, and the Prince and Prouost of the city, as that Pertiscus, whereof wee haue already spoken.

In the time of Caesar, the Sweftones had Diuitiacus as their king, who was the most powerfull man in all Gaul, and who opened a great part on this side of the Empire which hee helde, holding also the Empire of Great Bretaigne. After Galba (of whom hee hath spoken) hee succeeded. But wee may vcll perceiue hereby, what manner of kingdom this was: in regard that the Sweftions (who were brothers & cosines to the men of Rhemes) vsed the same course of authority, and the same lawes, hauing one and the same Gouernement, and one Magistrate, as they had. For such are the vwords of Caesar himself, by whom one only Magistrate was allowed in their cities. But yet notwithstanding, the Sweftions, although they were brethren; yet they had a field (apart) of great largeness, and very fertile, and twelue towns, vvhich of Caesar nameth onely one, vvhich is Naiudunum, and vvhich Caesar (after the Belgians were retired to him) paising thorough the countrey, essayed to surprize. But hee could not compasse it, by reason of the deepnesse of the ditch, and height of the wall: and yet there were but vvere few people to defend it.

Wee come now to the Bellouacenses, what kind of commonwealth was kept among them? These men were highly esteemed with the Belgians, for their vertue, authority & number of people. For their extendure was from the limits of the Senons, & also fro the Normans, so termed at this day (even there where the river of Seine, throwes it selfe into the sea) so far as Callete, known by the name of Calice. Caesar nameth Bratupanium, a city of the Bellouacenses. But by what forme of commonwealth did they gouern their city? They chose their Princes, as (among other) Corbus, vvhich though his Army had bin defeated yet vould he neuer for any discomfort hapning, or possible to befall him; neither forfake the fight, nor retire into the woods, but fought valiantly, & in wounding many, compelled his conquerors to runne in vpon him, and so to kill him in their rage and fury. Caſar alſo maketh mention of the Senate of the Belouacanes, and authority of the Comminality: whence enſued the excuſe, which the Senate of the Belouacanes made to Caſar: That during the life of Corbus the Senate had neuer the like power in the City, as the common ignorantans had.

But now concerning the moſt potent Citie of the * Neruians, after what manner of order were they governed? The body of the Neruians, is diuided into members of diuers names, as of Hannonia, Fladders, and Brabant, and the name of the Neruians ſignifieth no more than a Citie or Towne, including (as now adays our words are) of Hannoyers, Flemings, & Brabanters. And why you may aſke mee? Where to I can make no other anſwere, then as already I haue done, when as the Neruians had neither Towne or City: but I will diſcouſe the bounds and limites of that ſometime moſt noble Citie, according as Caſar himſelfe hath deſcribed it; obſerue then what I ſhall ſay vnto you.

When the Ambians had ſubmitted themſelues, Caſar went thither, to goe to the Neruians which were their Neighbors. And hauing made three daies journey into the Country of the Neruians, he found by report of ſome that hee had taken: that there was no more then tenne miles diſtance from his Campe to the riuer * Scaldus. This Scaldus, which paſſed through the middeſt of the Neruians Country, runneth now through the middeſt of Hennault: wherefore the Country of the Hannoyers, is comprehended within y of the Neruians. Of Caſar himſelfe we may learne the limites of the country of Flanders, which is in firme land, and alſo of Brabant, for there is a paſſage in the ſift booke, which maketh well to this purpoſe. VVhen Ambiorix (after that Sabinus and Cotta, Lieutenants Generals, were ouercome with a Legion and ſixe Companies neere to Vatua, which is in the Eburones land) exhorted the Neruians to doe the like to the Legion that paſſed the winter ſeaſon to their country, vnder the charge of Quintus Cicero. Hee perſwaded eaſily (ſaith Caſar) the Neruians, and thereupon diſpatched meſſengers immediately to the Centrones, Grudians, Leukes, Pleumofians and Gordunes, who were all vnder their obedience, and ioyned together the greateſt forces that they were able to make. Theſe are the very words of Caſar. But the Grudians & Leukes were enſkirted with Lothane, in the Country of Brabant; and the Gordunes (as much to ſay as the men of Gauwt) were in the Mediterrane country of Flanders. Likewise the Pleumofians, whom ſome doe hold to be them of Cortray: And they that are of this opinion, do plant the Centrones in the Dioceſſe of Liege.

This ſo great Commonwealth of the Neruians, and which was of ſuch large extendure, elected a Prince, ſuch as Bodwognatus was in the firſt warre of the Neruians. It had alſo a very great Senat, for Caſar reckoneth vp ſixe hundred Senators of the Neruians. After that the Atrebatians were vanquiſhed, Caſar gae them Comius (who was of the ſame country) to bee their King: that is to ſay, that of a Prince, which was but for a time, he created one that ſhould continue. Hee maintained the franchises of the City, & gae to them their laws and rights, and annexed the Morines to his Empire. Neuertheleſſe, this King enioyed his authoritie no long while, for after that the Atrebatians had put themſelues vnder Caſars obedience: his ſway ceaſed, & Comius bare Armes againſt Caſar again. The Eburones then alſo had two Kings, Ambiorix & Catimulcus; but their authority was ſuch, that the commons had no leſſe command ouer them, then they had to contradiſt them.

The Commonwealth of the Morines was anſwerable to that of the Helvetians, although it was diuided by diuers villages, & had extendure farre off from them: as to Calles, and all along the coaſt of Picardie and Flanders, in the Porreſſes & marſhes ſeuen ſo far as the * Menapians, who dwell vpon the confluent of the haine, as alſo of the Meuze or Maze, and who were their neighbors, as is to be ſcene in the Tencthers war, in the 4. booke. But the Treuirians, as well for a kinde of gouernement, (wherein they were very ſkilfull) as alſo for the occaſion of tumult and ſedition, very frequent among them; reſembled in quality the Heduns. Cingetorix and Indiciomarus quarrelled for the principalltie, euen euen as did y other two, Comuſſolitane & Cottus, but Caſar ſeated again Cingetorix as he had done Comuſſolitane. Thus the gouernment of the Belgian Cities, were mingled with three formes of citates.

The Santone Aquitaines ſeemed to bee gouerned by ſuch a kind of commonwealth. For that City, when the made prooffe of her own vertue, by fighting both on foot and horſeback, and well to ſuſtaine all aſſaults in her own defence: the rendred hir necke to ſuch authority. But Adactianus their Prince (of his owne power) ſtept in to do his duty, and ſallied forth with 600 * Soldayres, or Soldurij. Wherefore I thinke that the gouernment of the Gauls Commonwealths, hath bin already ſufficiently explicated, and by ſo many examples, as we may well conclude, that the principalities of the Gaules (according to Caſar) were ſuch, as wold not ſuffer that the ſubiects ſhould be oppreſſed or circumuented; but if any Prince did otherwiſe, hee helde no authority amongſt his ſubiects. VV e haue ſpoken then enough of the gouernment and authority obſerued among the ancient Gaules.

Let vs now liſten vnto the Commonwealth of Great Brittain, and that likewise of the Germanis. There is mention made in the fourth Booke, concerning the Princes of the Britains, with their conferences and conſultations held among theſelues, for the common good of Great Brittain. And in the ſift booke, the common council is obſerued by Caſar; and that the whole charge and command of warre againſt Caſar, was put into the power of Caſſibelane, and the diuerſity of Kingdoms which were ſubiect vnto that common Council, doe ſufficiently declare, that Great Brittain vſed the ſame kinde of gouernment that Gaul did, Caſar alſo deliuereth (almoſt) very ſame gouernment of the Germanes. When a Commonwealth (ſaith he) either endured war made vpon it, or attempted any, Magiſtrates were elected to vndertake the charge of the war, and they might alſo take or ſaue life. In times of peace, there was no common Magiſtrate, but the Lordes of the Countries, and of the Burroughes, who exerciſed law to their ſuſſals, and appoynted all their contentions.

In the time of Tacitus, Germany had ſome Kings: but they were ſuch as had more honor then power; in other mar-

ters they were like to the Gauls manners. They made Kings (ſaith he) for their Nobility, and Captaines for their vertue. Nor had thoſe Kings any vndeſined or free power, & the Captaines were obeyed more by example, then by command: either, whether they were deliberated in fight, or doing their deuoye vpon the point, making wonderful prooffe of their proweſſe. As concerning the Captaines or Princes (as the ſame Author relateth) & likewise for them, termed companions of the Princes, thus it followeth.

The Princes alſo they elect in the publique Councils, which doe hold the iuriſdiction of Burroughes and villages. Every man hath an hundred Companions, who are of the popularity, and doe giue aſſiſtance vnto them in Council together, and alſo in their Authority. A Noble or generous ſtock of ſtame, whoſe high deſerts of their Fore-fathers, doe challenge to haue the dignity of a Prince, amongſt the younger ſort of people: They are accompanied with other of more robuſt complexion; and ſuch as haue had (long time) good prooffe made of them: and yet they blaſt not a worde, to bee ſcene amongſt ſuch Companions, albeit there are ſome degrees in this compaignie, according to his iudgement whom they follow. VVhy then I may ſaſely ſay of the Germanes (according to Tacitus) that their Magiſtrates haue bin anſwerable to their Kings, Captaines, or Princes, and likewise to them called, the Companions of Princes.

I come againe vnto the Knights of the Gaules, which (in the times of warre) haue the managing of the affaires. And theſe Knights (thus ſaith Caſar in his ſift booke) when there is neede, and any warre happeneth: they are all employed, and according as each man hath authority and meanes, ſo hath hee moſt ſeruants and clients about him, & this is the onely fauour and power that they doe know. Heerein is continued the ancient Gauls manner, for election of Magiſtrates, and we may learne by a new argument: that the Gauls Princes were choſen for their Vertues, and for their deſerts towards the Commonwealth, and that this eminencie came from Vertue onely. For every Prince wold not ſuffer his ſubiects to bee oppreſſed, nor decayed (ſaith Tacitus Caſar formerly ſaid) but if hee ſhould be otherwiſe, he muſt beare no authority among his people. And hereto doth this justly make answer: That this is the onely fauour and power which the Knights knowe, if according as they haue most meanes and authoritie, so they shall haue the more seruants, and the more Clients about them.

The difference betweene seruants and clients.

By seruants or vassalles, are meant such as stand obliged or indebted (of whom I haue formerly spoken) and who, vpon that occasion are dedicated to the seruice of those Knights: for, these vassalls serue as Waggoners to their Masters, and carry their shields. And the Clients (as it is in the seauenth Booke) neuer dare, euen in the extremitie of all misfortune, forsake or leaue their Lords. Thus then the vassalls or seruants, do accompanie their Knights and Masters in warre, and the Clients doe attend on their Lords, and these are the companions of the Germanes, whereof Tacitus speaketh, as already hath bene saide.

Strife for popularity, and eminency in the Princes fauour.

There is great ieaiousie amongst these companions, who shall haue the cheefest place about his Prince: and amongst the Princes, who shall be followed by the most and best companions or attendants. It is held a high dignity, to bee dayly rounded with a great troope of young and choyse men: it is an honour in time of peace, & security in time of warre. This honor, and this glorie is not onely in euerie Nation, but euen in the neighbouring Cities, coeucting as much to be accompanied with such a company of men, as with so manie vertues. Whereof practise is made by Ambassages, and plenty of presents sent; nay, oftentimes, they will vndertake Armes, for the bare name to be termed a souldier. When a man is in the fight, it is shame to a Prince to be fūrmounted in vertue: and it is a more shame to his follower, if he doe not equal the Vertue of his Prince. It is a most infamous & shame full thing, and not to be washed off in a mans whole life time, to return from the battell, his Prince being there slaine. The principall Oath that he takes, is to defend and sustaine him, and if he doe any braue or worthy acte in his owne person, to referre it to his Princes glory onely. Princes fight for victory, companions and followers fight for their Prince. Tacitus writeth: The Prince recompenseth such as follow him: for they receiue (saith he) from the Princes liberality: this Horse of service, that victorious and bloodied Sword: for such Bankers, although they are not properly serued, yet are they sumptuous to them, & men are well contented with such wages.

But can you tell me, what were the recompences of the Knights amongst the Gaules, and who managed this other part of their Common-wealth? As for the recompence of the Druides, it hath bin spoken of already, which was honor, the greatest payment that could be, and only proper to vertue. Neuertheless, the Common-wealth it selfe could not be ingratefull towards them in recompences: considering that there were Imposts & Tolles, which appertained to each Citie, as is to be seene in the first Booke, and their greatness of Tribute, in the first Booke. Tacitus hath declared among the Germanes, what worthy recompences were performed to Princes. Cities had a custome, to collect (with their owne good liking) by the poll or head, either of their cattle, or of their fruites, to giue to their Princes: which being received as an honor, serued also to supply necessity. About all, they tooke delight in presents giuen by their neighbouring Nations, not onely by particular persons, but in generalis of choise Horses, faire Armour, trappings for seruice, and also of Chaines. And since then they haue taught vs to accept of money.

But let vs pursue other manners of the Gaules Common-wealth. Cæsar doth often accuse the infirmity of the Gaules, because in aduice they were fadain and mutable: but especially in this place of his 4. Booke. There is a common custome (saith he) amongst them, to compell passengers or way-faring men, to say whether they will or no, and to enquire of them, what each man hath heard, or knoweth of euery matter what soeuer. The popular and common people, they flocke about Merchants in the Citie, and constrain them to tell, out of what countries they come, and what things they knowe, or haue heard of there. The ancient Gaules, had not onely this wonderful desire, to know matters of nouelty: but besides, that they should be imparted, and made knowne to them and theirs.

I will set downe two examples of some admiration, the first is in the first booke, of the victory which Julius Cæsar had against the Neruians. During the bruite of Cæsar's victory (this he writes himselfe)

Recompence to the Gaules Knights for their seruice.

Recompence to Princes amongst the Germanes.

Cæsar his blaming the Gaules for their vailiblenes & fustianess. Jul. Cæsar in Corn. lib. 4.

the men of Rhemes (with incredible swiftnesse) carried tidings thereof to Labienus, in somach, that where he was about threescore miles from the Garrison of Cicero, and that Cæsar came: thether after the ninth hour of the day: yet notwithstanding, there arose such a cry or noise before the gates of the Campe, and before it was midnight, that the men of Rhemes (onely thereby) gaue understanding to Labienus of the victory, & made a signe of their reioicing with him. But the other is an especiall, and most notable cry or noise, when the Romanes were ouerthrowne at Genabum before Sun-setting: yet before the first watch was set, the cry was heard to the Arnernians; the noise running through all the Townes of Gaul, as Cæsar affirmeth in his seuenth Booke. For so soone as any important matter happened, by a cry they made it knowne in the fields, and so along thorough the Countries, and still as it was heard, others sent it in like manner to their neighbours, and according as it came to them. And that which had bene done at Genabum before Sun-setting, was knowne in the confines of Arnerne before the first watch, & yet the distance was about an hundred & sixty miles. So saith Cæsar, and haply it may seeme, that that singular description of Fame, which is set downe in Virgill, tooke hence the first originall.

Virgill lib. 9. de Aeneid.

Fame, an euill, vnmatchable in swiftnesse, Is sudden, moing, gadding with rapidnesse.

Rumor is commonly a babbling liar.

Julius Cæsar in Corn. lib. 6.

Cæsar describeth the like celerity and effect of this cry, as Virgill doth of Fame. This concerneth the bruite and cries among the Gaules, whereby being moued, they often held Councils of important matters: whereof (not long after) they repented themselves, in regard they gaue credite to vncertaine novles, and found them in the end to be nothing but fables. But hee that thus reproued the common people of Gaul of lightnesse, commended their constant & politicall wisdom. Those Citties (saith he) which are accustomed to gouern best their Common-weales, haue their Lawes, which or haue, that if a man that hath heard any thing of his neighbour (either by report or otherwise) concerning the estate of the Common-wealth: he is to impart the same to the Magistrate, and not to any other whatsoever. Because it hath bin of old seen, that rashly headed men, and of small understanding, are affrighted by false noises, or prouoked on to unhappy attempts, and (dreadleffe) enter into important enterprizes. The Magistrate concealeth what he thinketh fittest; & discouereth to the Commons, any matter needfull to be knowne.

This last passage of Cæsar, reſureth (very strongly) popular seruitude, for it testifieth, that euen in those Cities, which gouerned best their Common-weales: that yet the Commons haue their authority, because the Magistrate imparteth to the people, what is necessary for the to know. Strabo auoucheth in his fourth Booke, that this was also vfed in the Councils of the Gaules. If any one (saith he) did interrupt him that spake: the publicke Mimister stepped up with a drawn sword, and vſing threatnings to the party, commanded him to hold his peace. If he would not do it, he aduertised him in the same manner a second and third time. In the end, he would cut off such a peece of his garment, as the rest should afterward do him no seruice. Tacitus expreſſeth it more plainly, as hee doth many other things; concerning the manner of electing Magistrates, and the Councils kept among the Germanes.

The Princes (saith hee) hold a Councell, wherein matters of meaneſt importance, and such also as are of greateſt consequence, are handled together: And yet in such manner, that those affaires which appertaine vnto the people, are managed and ordered by the Princes. They assemble together (if there happen no sudden accident or aduerture) on certaine daies, either at the new Moone, or the full of the Moone: For they beleue, that those seasons are most happy to treat on their affaires. And they do not make their account by the daies, as we vse to doe, but by the nights. The fault ensuing on their liberty, is, that they are not altogether on the day assigned: but two or three daies is lost to attend for such as slacke to come.

The same Authour declareth another strange thing of the Germanes, affirming, that many times they deliberate at Banquets, to reconcile enemies, to make alliances, and to gaine grace of Princes, yea, euen then to consult of peace or warre: because as then (rather then at any other time) they haue their spirits most open, cyther to simple thoughts, or more earnest to them of greater importance. They deliberate when they know no dissembling, and determine when they cannot erre. Such also was the custome of the Country, when the Gaules helde their chieft confutations: as hath already bene declared, in the leuying of their men for warre.

The ancient Gaules came armed to Councell.

Titus Livius, speaking of the Gaules, reporteth the same in his one and thirtieth Booke, saying. Tunc is scene in them a new and terrible apparance, because (according to the custome of their Nation) they are armed when they come to Councell. Why then the Pallus of the ancient Gauls, came herselfe armed to the Councell: and because they would not do any thing, but it should expresse the courage of the Gauls, their assemblies were always made by sound of Trumpet. For Livius writeth so of the Bellouacanes Senate, having knowne their misfortunes by all contrary things. Corbus being flaine, all their Cavallery overthrowne, and the very valiantest of their foote-souldiers, when they thought that the Romans drew nere vnto them; then suddenly they assembled a Councell by sound of Trumpet, crying all with one voyce, to send Ambassadors and Hostages to Cæsar.

What shall wee say of the Germanes? What garments did they weare whē they came to councell? They did not any thing (saith Tacitus) neither in affaires publike or particular, but all in Armes. They went armed about their daily negotiations, and came in the same manner to their Banquets. Blame not then the counells of the Gaules to be done in Armes: for the Romane Orator could say in his owne Language.

Let Armes giue place to Gownes.

The habite of Warre and Peace.

Because Armes are the accoustrements of Warre, and the Gowne is the habite of Peace, followed and attended on by Eloquence. And when the Court of Rome was enuironed with souldiers of Armes, at the pleading of * Milo: the spirit thereof was not onely terrified, but the whole body also trembled with feare. But Eloquence vnited it selfe with the Armes of the Gaules, so that there wanted not at one time and place, both Commanders of warre, and learned Orators: for the Gaules Orators (by the irradiation of Armes) were encouraged to speake the more brauely. Princes were pleading Orators in the Gaules counells, where (in generally) all might heare, that had interest in the case in question, as is euidēt by the examples of Cæsar.

Princes were pleading Orators.

*Among the Germanes (saith Tacitus) in publike Counells, the King or Prince, according to his age, according to Nobility, according to the place for warre, and according to his readinesse in utterance: was much rather heard for authority in perswading, then any power in commanding. It was also permitted in a full Councell, to accuse of crimes: deserving death. The cry or noise of the people, by listening fauourably, or otherwise: signified to the Romane Orators, that their Oration had found good or bad successe. But the counsell of the Gaules, which was made in Armes, as it was reasonable, made a signe by their Arms (although the clattering of weapons was a signe among the Gaules) how they tooke liking of that which had bene said. Cæsar writeth so in his 7. Booke, speaking of the Oration of Vercingetorix: All the people made a cry (saith he) and according to their custome, made a clattering with their Armes, as they do, when they approve the Oration of any man.*

Marcellinus li. 1.

Marcellinus declareth in his 21. Booke, that after Julian had made his Oration: the Army of the Gaules applauded him, and mingled dreadfull cries, among the loud clashings of their Targets. The Gaules confutations were in Armes; their Orationes were approved by Armes, and the oath they take, was vpon Armes. The Carmentis (as it is in the 7. Booke) promised in a full councell of the Gaules, that they would be chieft in the warre against Cæsar, and because they could not in fielde giue assurance by the meanes of Hostages, fearing how matters might come about to the end that all might be certaine and sworne, after they had brought together all their Ensignes of warre (as alwaies they vsed to do in very ceremonious manner) they requested, that they wold begin the war, and the other would not forsake them. And in the same Booke there is a most holy oath, to assure the battel giuen by

by the horsemen. They on horse cry altogether, that this holy oath may be imposed on euery man: Neuer to be receiued into his house; neuer to goe backe to his parents, nor to his wife, vnill hee haue twice thwarted ouer the enemies armies. Wherto that of Marcellinus conformeth, speaking of Julian: All were commanded to sweare in his Name, & setting solemnly the points of their swords vnto their throates, made execrable oathes and curses on themselfes, if they brake their vowes.

But now it is time to finish our discourse. Hauing thus reported the manners and customes of ancient Gaule, the temperance of the peoples liues, their assurance in dangers, their wiledome in artes and disciplines, their iustice, in ruling and establishing the best meanes, for good ordering and gouerning their common-wealth: There remaineth now no more, but if we can recouer the like leysure (hauing finished some other studies already entred on) we hope to proceed in the manners and customes of our new Gaules or Frenchmen, which will yeelde the more delight and pleasure, because the subiect is of a farre more excellent nature.

CHAP. I.

Of the new Gaules, or those that are called (now adaies) Frenchmen, or the people of France, succeeding after their Predecessors, the Ancient Gaules.

Among all parts of the Earth, Europe, (though it is the least) holdeth the verie cheefest rancke, as beeing the principall, and most worthy: So it is not to beedoubted, but that among all the Countries of Europe, France must needs be the most excellent in al respects. The people of Arabia that now are, haue a customay kinde of saying, that if the world were a Ring, the City of Ormus must bee the Beazell, Collect or Head, wherein the most precious Stone is to be enchafed. By much better reason then, may it lawfully be saide of France, and a true saying:

France the cheefest country of Europe

Romard in Cant. 5.

It is the lesser eye, & the Pearle of the world.

France abounding in the fertility of all things.

As one of her owne Poets formerly hath sung, Which no way can be accounted strange, when consideration is iustly made, of the great blessings, commodities, and graces of Heauen, wherewith the Land is and hath beene endowed. For there is nothing else found to be compared therewith; be it if we regard the fertility and abundance of all things, not only necessary for the life of man, but also for all sorts of pleasures and delights. Bee it also, for the sweetnesse, temperature, & amenity of the Ayre: not hauing any other, more graciously regarded by the eie of the Sunne. No lesse commendable (for valour) is the courage and spirit of the people, which haue inhabited there to this present time, who not only haue extended their renoune through all Lands habitable: but also haue excelled in whatsoever can be applied to the height of minde.

Aboveall (as most admirable) is the dignity, greatnesse, and Maiesty of their Kings, redoubtable and exalted (for their vertues truly heroycall) about all other on the earth. In this excellency then, there are three things to be discoursed: the first is that of the Land it selfe; the second is of the People; and the third is of their Kings, which reule as well from the two Precedents, as from their owne proper vertue.

Concerning the goodnes of the Land, it were an infinite labour to expresse to many blessings, and all things else which it produceth, euen of best vie for the life of man, and that in such abundance, as sufficeth not only for the people; but also are imparted and dispersed to other Nations, without any incommody to it selfe, and (in a manner) not to be discerned. The fat fields, covered with good wheate and all graines else of any kinde, fill the Graunges & Garners euery harvest season. The Mountaines and Hilles, clothed with goodly Vineyards, which bring forth most healthfull and delicate wines; & almost euery where stord with all kinde of fruite trees. There is not a iote of vnprofitable Land, all is laboured and husbanded, or serues for pasturage for feeding beasts, which causeth such plenty of all sorts of fesh. There ye may likewise behold goodly VVoods & Forrests, filled with all kinde of game and Venison. Most excellent Flax & Hempe, wherof cloth is made in great abundance. many singular Plants and Hearbs, not only for Medicine, but also nourishable.

Heereto I may adde, the admirable sight of great and goodly Riuer, both nauigable, and abounding with fish, dispersing themselves through France, as veines in the body of man: making the mid-land Regions as apers for commerce, as those on the Sea-coasts. Beside a great number of other waters, great Pooles & Ponds, Fountaines, and cleere running Riuer, all metuailous and delectable. Then haue yee goodly houes and buildings; an infinite number of rich and great Cities, Townes, Burroughs, Villages, Castels, and other Edifices. Moreover, greater plenty of people, then in any other Region of the world. This is that which is so much wondred at by strangers, who haue thought France to be a terrestriall Paradise: making more account (in this case) then Frenchmen do themselves, because it is so ordinary and frequent vnto them. But to such as haue sayled into farre remote strange Countries, or otherwise haue had intelligence of them: they hold it a happinesse to themselves, to see the felicity of France so far beyond other, and thereby to know their owne good. All these graces might much better be acknowledged, if we did but seuer and consider them particularly.

First, for VVheate and other Corne, which is the principall sustentation, to maintain and strengthen the bodye of man: it encreaseeth and aboundeth so in France (and that of the best that can bee) more then in any part of the world, and likewise all other sorts of graine. It is not a time now to acknowledge so great a happinesse, for wee see that our Elders haue better knowne and felt it, when the Land was not thoroughly so well husbanded and tilled. As wee discern by that which is written by Strabo, Iulius Solinus Polybius, & Pomponius Mela, who speake thereof expressly. Also Cicero reporteth, that (in his time) was brought to Rome, and into Italy, great quantities of Corne from the Gaules. Pliny the Great hath also observed the same, for speaking of the Corne of France, he saith: That it was most cleane Corne, and that it yielded foure pound of Bread, more then any other. It is well known in these dayes, that Spain furnisheeth herselfe with the WHeate and Graine of France, and that it is to her as a nursing Mother. And Portugall it selfe, which is described to bee one of the most happy and fertile countries of the Spains, hath recourse to France: as we may see by which Ozarius saith, a Portugall Bishop of Syluaz; & the same is reported likewise by others, who haue written of Relations.

And for VVines, the country is no lesse fruitfull, in producing such as are very good, and in great affluence. This hath also beene confessed by our Ancients, according to the testimonie of Solinus and Pliny, who renoune Bituricam vitem, Perhaps this may be interpreted, not of Bourges; but of the wine about Bordeaux, wherof the people are called Bituriges Vinifci. He speaketh also of the wine of Rezers, whereto hee giueth the cheefest place among all them of Gaule. And Iulian the Emperor said, that there were good vines in the grounds of Paris. Behold how Columella makes his moane, at that which the Italians did, for planting of Vines: forsaking their owne country, they went to seek in the delicate grounds of France, in the Iles Cyclades, and those of Andalonia. Whereby we may perceiue, that hee equalleth the grounds of France and their wines, with them of Muscadella, Greece, and of Spain.

Pliny saith, that in Italy they highly esteemed the Grapes of France, making mention also of a certaine kinde of admirable Grape there growing; which daily turneth it selfe to the Sunne, like as the Heliotropium doth, and therefore is called after the Greeke word Strepitos. Wine is transported from France to Rome, which is there accounted very delicious: especially that which is gathered in the groinds of Piem, which they call Picenum, as Plutarch declarcth in his Symposiakes. Notwithstanding, there is a difficulty found in these words, as namely, that which Propius saith, in the life of the Emperor Probus. That he had permitted to the Frenchmen to haue and plant Vines. Notwithstanding, it appeareth, that they were in France before his time.

The restitution of this, dependeth thus; that by the Edict of the Emperor Domitian, he had enioyned to the inhabitants of the Provinces, to cut all the Vines, soe except excepted. Induced so to do, because vpon view taken, that some yeares there was abundance of Wine, & scarcity of Come: he conceived, that the earable Landes were left barren, in regard of the Vines. Afterward, the Emperor Probus tooke off those inhibitions in Gaule, permitting them to have Vines. And so to this day, the wines of France are transported by great quantity into England, Flanders, Holland, Germany, Denmarke, Sweden, and into other Notherne Regions.

Moreover, France produceth store of fruite Trees, bearing (in abundance & fluence) most excellent, dainty and delicious fruites: as well stone-fruit of all sorts, as those of other nature. And yet notwithstanding, Italy and Spain cannot vaunt to have any that come not into France: as Oranges, Citrones, Pomegranates, Oliues, &c. For though the Land doth not produce these euery where: yet notwithstanding, Provence & Languedock, which is the Narbone Gaule of our Ancients, do beare the same fruites, yea, and much better, as hath bene noted by experience. Also Strabo obserued it well enough. The Country of Narbone (saith he) produceth all the same fruites as Italy doth.

Our Ancients have also giuen thereto another commendation, to haue great store of pasture grounds, and so (by consequence) plenty of beasts to feed in the. Strabo testifieth as much, making so good esteeme of the woollens and clothes of this Country: that they are carried thence to diuers parts, and therewith all Italy is sufficiently furnished. But ouer and beside the great commodity, ensuing by the flesh of domestick creatures: there are Deare in abundance, as also all kinde of game, & Fowles in no meane plenty.

And to the end that nothing should be wanting, in necessary matters for support of life: the Country is not destitute of good, proper and profitable horses, as well for ordinary trauell, as also for combats, fights, and battels, bred in the Nation, and continually nourished. The Romans were thereto addicted, but principally to the horses of France: as is to be seene in Trebellius Pollux, who saith, That the Horses of the Celts, were renowned aboue all other. Pollux the Grammarian, interleaceh (among the rest) dogges of a good and gallant breede, apt for the Celts hunting, or such dogs as the Gauls vsed.

This may serue sufficiently for terrestriall creatures, because to number this particularly, would require an infinite labor: let vs come now to them that live in the waters. It is apparently knowne, that the coasts of the Sea which enuiron France, are richly stored with fish, and the fish also to be delicate and excellent, better the elsewhere is to be found. And as for the mid-land Regions, where Sea-fish is wanting: the fresh and sweete waters are most copiously stored. For the Rivers, Streams, Pooles, Ponds and Riuolets haue most dainty fresh-fish, and countlesse in number. Daily experience makes prooffe thereof, Strabo auoucheth it, and Aulusius sings it, making mention thereof in his worke called Mosella.

There are many other commodities, which come and encrease vnder this ayre, for the necessity, vility and ornament of mans life. Among other, Flax and Hemp, and the clothes made of them, are labored and sought for by strangers: wherof great traffique and transportation goes to other Nations, & returns home store of money to France: In briefe, it is one of her best wealths and riches.

In this place, to stay no longer on a matter so frequent, and ordinary in vs, as clothes and other works, it may appeare lawfull (with Pliny) to enter into consideration (it may bee) of one of the most admired things that is in nature: To say, that so small a plant should bee the cause, that the Sea cannot bound men within limits, nor separate their Countries, but suffers herselfe (thereby) to bee vanquished. This is that herb that drawes Syria neere to vs, Egipt to Italy, and Africa and America to France. In a word, it is that which makes man tread vnder his feete, and trauesse ouer that dreadfull gulfie, the heape, or pile of the whole Element of water, the vaste and profound Ocean; wherein principally appeareth the admirable workes of the high and Soueraigne Creator of all things. And the same Pliny wondreth not a little, that (so small a graine) such a matter should come, as carries men through all the Cantons of the world. Which only is by the means of Sayles & Cordages, the principall helpe and wings of navigation. Such workmanshipes are performed in France in mighty quantiquantities, and thence transported to in-spaire other Countries: especially into Spain, where they haue greatest need, to arme and prepare their Ships for seruice.

And this is that & hath so often serued them, and yet daily doth in their greatest navigations: beside their very finest clothes, and others of all fashions, brought together to them. Pliny also recordeth, that (in his time) the Gauls, were esteemed and renowned for this reuenue.

France produceth also Wood, apt and needfull for all good Dyers; and the grain for Scarlet dye, anciently called Coccus, which groweth in the Country of Narbone, and Saffron likewise, with infinite other shrubs & hearbs of great vse, especially in Physicke. Boterus, Bensius, and other strangers haue obserued and reported, that there is a Mount in Auvergne, called the Mount of gold, full of an infinite number of rare and singular simples, proper for Physicke, which nature there produceth liberally, & without any constraint. So that to speake no more then truth, France hath no neede of the rich East & West Indies. It is a little world, a collection and an abridgement of the happinesse and felicity of all Lands: not onely for necessity and profite, but also for the delicacy of life. And if we goe so farre as medicaments themselves, such Simples are there to be found, as equall the drugs of strange Countries, which yeeld nothing else.

There are also goodly Thickets, Woods and Forrests, to furnish whatsoeuer is requisite (beside fewell) for building, engines for warre, fabrication of ships, and other vessels, as also for moueables and household-lustre. Heerewithall one of the cheefest considerations which caueth France to be esteemed, is, that it is wholly inhabited and well husbanded: not a iote of desert or waste ground, no place empty, nor any thing but hath his vse. Heare what Strabo acknowledged in his time, vnder the Empire of Augustus. There is not any thing unprofitable (saith he) nor any idle grounds: except such as are bindred & vsed with Pooles and Forrests. By much more reason may we now say, all grounds there are better tilled and husbanded, the in those times they were: & that Pooles and Forrests yet remaining, are not a iote
the lesse beneficiall, but rather more then some other grounds be.

But no man can better breefly figure forth the felicity of this goodly peece of Landship, seeming heere to be done but in dissembler or day colour; then that bin already wrought by two Ancients, Julius Solinus Polyhistor, and Pomponius Mela, the one of the describing it thus. De Rebus Gestis in fatis Landis, quodlibet proper, et commodum, in bringing the reuenues of fruites: A great part planted with Vines, shrubs, and fruit-trees. Most happy and rich, to produce all kinde of creatures, and that which is needfull for them: walled with cleere wyters of Riuers and Fontaines.

Pomponius Mela speaks thus. Terra est frumenti præcipue & pabuli ferax, et amena, luscio immensis: noxio genere animalium minime frequens. It is a land principally fertile, and abounding in Corne & pastures, goodly pleasant and delightfull for goods, and great Woods, and wherein few living creatures are to be found hurtfull, or doing any harme.

In like manner, Messire Michel Suriano, a Venetian Lord, and one of the Glorious, having bene Ambassador from his high and honourable Commonwealth of Venice, in France, in the time of King Charles the 9. left vs this figure, of his own skilfull handy-wooke.

Pa sempre riputata la Francia ricchissima, & piena d'ogni commodità; & abbondantissima di tutte le cose ne essarie alla vita humana: perche essenda quasi nel mezzo della più nobil parte del mondo, che è l'Europa, ha il cielo molto temperato & benigno, libera da quei freddi grandissimi di Alemagna, & da gli eccessi caldi di Spagna. L'ueri benchè sia alquanto uentofo, & però salubre, & fertile, & non ha del grosso & paludoso come la Fiandra vicina. Il paese è aueno & piacevole, pieno di fiumi, & tutti navigabili: non ha monti aspri, salvo nel estremata de' confini: ma nel mezzo per tutto sono colline & pianure, tutte fertili & lavorate. Et fa tanta copia di biade, & di vini di lini & canape, di giardi, di altre cose, che non solamente bastano per vso del regno, ma serue ancora a mandarne fino in Spagna, Portogallo, in Inghilterra, & in Italia, Danemarka & altri paesi più lontani.

France was alwaies reputed to be most rich and full of all commodities, and abounding in all those things necessary for the life of man. For (being as it were) in the midst of the most noble part of the world, which is Europe: it hath the heavens very temperate and benigne, free from those mighty coldes of Germany, and the excessive heates of Spaine. The Ayre, although it be somewhat windy, is therefore healthy and subtle, and hath no grosse & paludus moistures, as mere neighboring Flanders hath. The Country is wide & pleasing, full of Rivers, and all navigable. It hath no sharpe Mountaines, except on the extremity of the Confines: but in the middlest, every where are little hilltokes & plaine champaigne grounds, all fertile, and husbanded or tilled. Ankeeldeth such plenty of Corne & Wine of Flax and Hempe of Wood, and of other things: as not onely serve for the use of the kingdom, but also sufficeth to send into Spaine, Portugall, into England, Scotland, Denmark, & into other Countries further off. The same Strabo, having bene (before that time) Ambassador in Spaine, & made therethis Relation: speaketh not in the same manner, but in other termes farre different.

Among the causes of this fertility, and delicious abundance in so happy a feasting: one part of this felicity may be referred to the temperatour of the Ayre, & the Climate of Heaven; vnder which it is situated: Being iustly the middest of one of the temperate Zones, to wit, the 42. degree of Latitude, about which is Marsellus, and the coast of Prouence and Languedock, so farre as about the 50. degree towards the North; which is the breadth of France. Whereunto in like manner do contribute, the great number of waters wherewith it is bedewed: which serve as well for the generation of fruites, as pleasure and amenity, beside (in greater manner) for commerce and traffique. For Gauls hath bene alwayes (throughout) furnished with sprightly Fountains, and cleare running Rivers, with some of small and greater current, yet very navigable, for the carriage and recarriage of Merchandizes, and communication of the Prouinces one with another; a mighty commodity, (and then which) there is not a greater in the world.

This is that also, which makes the midland Regions, and the Cities & Townes there seated, as Merchantable as the Sea coasts, as strangers themselves haue both knowne & reported; that there are more great and navigable Rivers in France, than in all other parts of the earth; & though they speak it as an hyperbole, yet nothing commeth neerer to truth. For in all Italy, hardly can any navigable River be found beside that of Poes; and likewise in Spaine almost as few, at least that haue any course (how little soever) in length. Strabo hath made good obseruation thereof, as before is saide, and that in every Country heere; are Rivers, which come and retorne to all parts, coasting the very principall places. But (about all) that of Seine is to be admired, a sweet River, the most profitable and commodious for navigation, & this only (among all those in the world) is best bounded and restrained within his bed, sildome or little overflowing, and when it once floweth, doth little or no harme at all, yielding (beside) a most cleare water, and fit to be drunke; abounding also with plenty of fish.

Which noted the Emperor Julian to speake in this manner. Very sildome (saith he) doth this River exalt or abate it selfe, & it keepeth (almost) one ordinary course in winter, as it doth in summer: furnishing generally with a most neate water, sweet & cleare to the eye, and wholesome to be drunke by such as will. And although this should not be alwayes certaine: yet notwithstanding, there are few to be spoken of, concerning other Rivers to be seene, in comparison of this. Whereto may be added, that which is spoken by Botero Benefe the Italian, as these are his owne words. It beareth such great Ships, and sustaineth so mighty burthens, as they that see it, will not beleene it, and there is no River, that (in proportion) governe an equal weight: so that although it exceedeth not mediocrity, yet admirably it supplieth the businesse and the necessities of Paris, &c.

I might also make some reckoning of diuers waters there, producing effects admirable and prodigious: but because it would be a labour long and infinite, to stand vpon all their particularities; I will satisfie my selfe, so much that which concerneth matters wholesome and medicinall, wherewith the fauour of Heaven hath in like manner graced this Region, to the ende it should not faile in any thing.

There are many Wels or Springs, which are found in diuers parts of France, that haue certaine properties and vertues, as receiving a iuyce & taste, by the mixture of Niter, Sulpher, and Allum, which are vndervnderneath, and entred into their fourle: in regard whereof, they haue power to remedy many great diseases, iudged otherwise incurable; as dropsies, and the stone in the reines, and others, the causes whereof are vnkowne, and ordinary remedies vtterly vnprofitable for them.

Quasique nocent artes, cessare magistri.

Such are the famous Wels of Pongues in Nuernoy, and of Forges in Normandy. Such also are many other, especially towards the Pyrenean Mountaines, which haue the vertue to stay the bloody fluxe; to soften and make come forth (in forme of paste) the stone that is in the bladder or reines; to fetch again sight almost lost, to warme and strengthen the nerves; and to cure the gout. In the time of Pliny, he had then discovered something, for hee makes mention of a certaine Well, in the Towne of Tongri among the Gauls; the water whereof fauoured like yron (as all other Wels almost doe) which healed Tertian Feuers, and the diseases of the stone, as also the running of the reines.

Now, to speake of Metals and Minerals, France cannot be destitute, neither can other Nations make vaunt of any advantage about it, if due search might be made. Strabo declareth, that in his time, the Gauls affirmed themselves, to haue the best in the Cemenes and Pyreneans; and that therefore they would not giue place to any other people, especially the Spaniards, who made their glory, in hauing great quantities. Gold, which is held and esteemed to be the most precious, shining, replenishing, and domineering about all other, yea, qualifying the Sunnes bright beames, is to be found in France. For Strabo testifieth, that there was excellent Gold, and in great quantity, in Cemenus. To which purpose, we reade in Procopius, a Greeke Historian, that the Kings of France caused money to be stamped of Gold, with their marke and character, found in France: reporting withall, that other barbarous Kings had not that prerogative, no, nor the Kings themselves of the Persians.

of the most learned Philosophers. And they further say, that this gold commeth, as being deriued by continuall agitation of the waters rowling, and maketh it so much the purer, about the Marcasity or Rocke, yea, or that in the earth. Among other Ancients, Diodorus Siculus affirmeth vs, that there are many of these Rivers in France. Ausonius (by his verses) celebrates his golden Turne, and (euen now) it is a matter most certaine, that there are such Rivers in Gascogne, which descend, either from the Pyreneans, or the Cemenes. Let the Cappadocians cease the, to make vaunt of their Pactolus; the Thracians, of their Hebrus or Marissia; the Colchians of their Phasis the Italians, of their Eridanus or Poes; and the Spaniards, of their Tagus.

And as for Metall, whereunto the second value is giuen next to gold; Strabo affirmeth, that there are many Mines in France, as Cesar himselfe also doth the like; and (at this day) good proofe and experience hath bin made thereof. Cesar saith, there is found Copper and Brasse in large abundance. But about all, there is great plenty of excellent Iron & Steele: whence it came, that reuerend Antiquity so highly commended the Swords and Courtelasses of the ancient Gauls. Let the skillfull Julius Pollux be credited, who saith; that the Emperor Marcus Aurelius made his choise of such a man to bee Schoolemaster to his Sonne, who preferred the Gauls Courtelasse, among those other weapon that were most excellent. This Metall highly aboundeth there, & is the most common in France. Beside, it best agreeth with the Frenchmens generosity, who haue euermore made themselves famous by Armes, and bin knowne by their manhood, to all the vtmost parts of the world.

Gold and Silver, so much esteemed among vs to be precious, are no more apt for Armes, then other instruments and vensils for the commodity of men, and the great account we make of gold, proceedeth onely from the rarity thereof. But we ought rather, to value things by their vtility & vse, although they be common, as Aristotle saith among which is Iron, the most profitable Metall of all others, & not by the to be surmounted: so y (without it) with great difficulty can gold (more harmefull and lesse beneficial) be cular houses; but Villages, Burroughs, & great Cities altogether, yea, many times whole Provinces. Deluges and inundations haue also wrought there strange effects, spoiling, ouerthrowing, and defacing whole Countries, & that very often Earthquakes, ingulfings, and impetuous showres of raine, are (as a man should say) there daily: thus you see what delight and happinesse, is in the greatest & most renowned kingdome of the East.

There are Countries, which suffer colds and insupportable freezings: as other are meere burnt and wasted with heates. Witnesse the * Nasamones, who in regard of this heate (they dwelling beyond the Torride Zoane) do curse the Sunne when it passeth ouer them. Thus then other Regions, being esteemed for happy for perfumes, odours, & such kinde of delights: doe sometime pay very dearely for their pleasures; perill is euermore neighbour to ioy, and contentment is close followed at the heeles, with some or other mishap.

Whosoeuer thinketh to gather the sweets of their fairest flowers, or the iuyce of their most delicious plants; may as soone meete with deadly poyson, and in stead of sweetnesse, finde such bitternesse, as quickly will bring him to his graue. Either by the Aspicke lying close hidden; whose pricking causeth sudden sleepe, & procureth death in that sleepe. The Snakes byting, bringeth a deadly drought with it. The Viper filleth the whole body full with venome, by his byting. The Basiliske slayeth by his very sight onely. The earth by quaking, endangereth to swallow men vp, or ouerthrow and kill them in their houses. A deluge suddenly carrieth away, and couers all with water. The Lyon or the Tyger comes onely to deuoure.

Strabo hauing related the goodnesse of Bætica in spaine, which is now Granada & Andalusia, saith withall; that the country is persecuted with an affliction very strange yet reputed to be ridiculous. It is by the great and immense multitude of Conies or Rabbits, which feede on, and consume their seedes, plants, and rootes of trees. He also saith, it hence ensueth, that almost throughout spaine, yea, and the neighboring isles, are thereby afflicted. Adding beside, that the inhabitants of the Isles Gymnasiades or Baleares, now called Maiores and Miniores, sent Ambassadors to request ayd of the Romanes, against these hurtfull creatures, and to chafe them out of their country, as being vnable to endure their multitude. And succour was necessarily required in fo great a warre, which doth not alwayes happen (saith he) but when the country is subiect to be infected with some plague of pestilence, famine, or such other affliction and punishment sent from Heauen.

Marcus Varro writeth, that a Towne in spaine was wholly vndermined, and ruined by those Conies, & another in Theffalije, by Moales. Some that haue bene dispeopled & forsaken in regard of the great multitude of Frogs. Another in Affrica, by Locusts: Allothat the inhabitants of the City * Gyaros, now called Gura, in one of the Cyclades; were expelled thence by Rats: and that in Italy, an ancient City called Amycles, was vtterly ruined and lost by Serpents. There is a Region in Affrica, where a great extensure of the country is become desert, the people which dwelled there being driuen to all extremities, and quite exterminated, onely by Scorpions and Pissemites, which are a kinde of venomous Ants. Theophrastus reporteth, that others were expelled by * Scalopendres. And Strabo saith, that spaine was ordinarily infected with a strange multitude of Rats: whereupon (oftentimes) followed contagious diseases. The like happened once to the Romanes, when they were in the countries of the Basques and Altures: so that they were glad to hire men to chafe them away, the Rats came fo fast vpon them, and hardly could they saue themselves from them. An ancient Philosopher, named * Dicarchus, wrote a Book, of the ruine of men, and had collected together, how many ruines had happened in diuers countries, by reason of the inopinate multitude of beasts: by whose impetuous violence, he sheweth, that some Nations haue bene lost and consumed.

France, on the contrary (God be praised for it) neuer was subiect to so many miseries; & there is not any Region found in all the habitable world, being so happy, rathert lesse inconueniences. Deadly poyson cannot deceiue him that gathereth there her wholesome flowers & hearbs, or perfumes. The Lyon or Tyger, the rauenous Beare or Panther, cometh not to set vpon the traeller, or driue the husband-man from his home. The Serpent cannot annoy the passenger, nor haruest Reaper by his byting, because there is none at all to be found there. A man may safely take the Evening or Mornings benefit on the greene grasse, without dread of any venomous creature, which are most dangerous in other countries. But admit that there were some kinde of Serpents or Snakes in some peculiar parts: yet are they very few, and no harme at all thence to come from them. No Egyptian Aspicke is there to be found, and that which is termed in France an Aspicke: it is no Aspicke at all but rather a Viper, as is verified in the Obseruations of P. Bolognius. Nevertheless, it is rare or sildome to be seene there, and benefit (rather then any harme) is to be receiued thereby. And say that this Serpent were very venomous: yet notwithstanding, it serueth most commodiously for the life of man, and Treacle is compounded thereof. The verie learnedst Physitians do hold, that the flesh thereof is soueraign for many diseases; and, that which is much more, it hath power to lengthen the life of man in such as make ordinary vse of it, as manie of our Ancients did, and other healthfull people yet liuing, who haue heretofore referred the cause of their so long healthfull continuance. Thus our Ancients, and especially the learned Egyptians, vfed the Snake as an Hieroglyphick, marke and signe of health: presenting it to their Goddesse Sanitas, rouled about with other creatures.

Moreover, France is not subiect to the miseries and horrors of earthquakes. Neuer shall ye there heare the earth grone, bellow, then tremble, shake, and swallow vp houses, Burroughes, & whol Townes, making growth of Mountaines, by leuellling and plaining other places, to drie vp waters and riuers, and then fodainly to let loose Flood-gates of Noulties; to stay their violent course of a streame, and then to make it run directly against his current: to let forth flaming fires, to finish that with greater defoliation, which the former Earth-quake had left behinde it. By an especiall priuiledge of heauen, France stands exempted from all these; experience hath made it apparant, & Pliny long ago witnessed it, when he saide: That the Gauls were not shaken by tremblings of the earth.

To know the quiet condition and felicity of France in this case, wee may compare and consider other Nations & Provinces, and what great afflictions and ruines haue ensued to them by such harmes, in most part of the worlds Regions. We finde, that in Italy and other Countries, in the time of the Punicke warres, the people were tormented with Earth-quakes, seuen and fifty times in one yeare. VVho would not be amazed, to heare that two hills should approach neere each to other, to iustle (as it were) together; then, to retire and auancer on againe, after the manner of fight, stirring and mouing furiously, with an horrible noise and breaking? A great fire and smoke rose vp betweene them; and by this their rude encounter, houses and villages (seated in the valley) were bruised and beaten downe, & both men and beasts smothered to death: euen as it happened in the Territorie of Modena, in the yeere 622. and in the City of Rome, in the time of the wars of Marius and Sylla. This was seene in broad day time, by a great number of passengers & Romane Cities, who beheld this wofull spectacle, from the neere-neighbouring high-way, or hill ascending to the Capitoll.

It was a strange thing, that trembling or Earth-quake, which happened vnder the Emperor Tiberius, and in the 5. yeare of his Empire (to the end we may not, as Orosius doth, confound it with that which chanced twelue yeares after, miraculously, euen at the passion of our Sauour) Tacitus reporteth, that in this yeere (which was the 770. of the City of Rome) in one night, twelue great and famous Cities of Natolia, were ruined and vtterly ouerthrowne, such as was Ephesus, Sardis, Cuma, Philadelphus, and other of the same ranke. And that which was most terrible, they had not the means of open fight, an ordinary succour in such misfortunes: yet thereof they were deprived, because the earth shrunke and opened vnder their feete, and swallowed them vp immediately. Herewithall arose thinings and flames of fire among the ruines; and that which was plaine champaigne ground before, was exalted to Mountaines, and contrarywise, Mountaines became euen and leuell ground.

Heere might also bee alledged, the vmented with a pestilence, which doeth greatly dispeople it: to the no meane amazement of many, that haue made deep search into the cause. So it is in like manner affirmed by diuers, that the Grand Cairo is euery yeare afflicted with the Pestilence. Vndoubtedly, when I consider with my selfe, that great Louis, vulgarly called Chlouis, stayed his opinion, and made Paris the seat of his kingdome, leauing many other Cities which were then far greater: and that before him, the Emperor Julian (being come into France) established there his ordinary abode, and called it Amiable or Lovely. I am compelled to admire therein, their great Wisdom and vnderstanding, in choosing a place so commodious, so pleasant and answerable; although then it seemed to be one of the least Citties of Gaul. It would require an entire volume to speak thereof, and yet none will credit what it is, except they haue the happinesse to see it: & the sight may much better satisfye them, then all that can be sayde or written of it. Therefore I wil end this discourse, adding onely that which is sayde by Botero Parigi, Città che di popolo, e di abbondanza d'ogni cosa, auanza di gran lunga tutte l'altre di Christianità. Paris a City that in people and abundance of all things, goeth farre beyond all the rest of Christendome.

CHAP. II.

Of the People dwelling in this fruitfull Land of France, what they were being ancient by Gaules, and afterwards Frenchmen: their Manhood, Valour, and successful Fortunes.

Land it selfe in all things: let vs now see (according vnto our intended purpose) what the people haue bene and are in their condition. Such as haue heard of so extraordinary felicity, perhappes may quickly condemne mee, by alledging it as a matter impossible: that in a Region so pleasant, gracefull, and abounding in all kindes of goodnesse: the inhabitants can any way be vertuous, valiant, and courageous. Great Cyrus was of that Opinion, when his victorious Persians laboured to change their Countrey; in regard it was sharpe, rough, rude, and Mountainous; for one of them which they had conquered, that was more pleasant, consisting of goodly plaines, and euen Champaigne grounds. Which hee would not suffer them to doe, but shewed them, that like vnto seeds and plants, so are the liues of men made conformable vnto those Regions where they abide. As if hee would haue sayd, that in a fair & fortunate countrey, the mindes of men alter, and quickly become effeminate.

Hanniball, not onely inuincible by the Armies of the Romanes; but also by: so many victories ouer them, bringing them neerer to their viter ruine, then euer they were or had bene: was ouerthrowne and confounded, by the soft and carefull delights of Capua. The swines of his winter sojourning there, did enervate and weaken both him and all his army, which the rough Alpes and freezing snowes, had formerly made vnconquerable. Euen so we may say, and very truly, that the high and mighty courage of Alexander, was softened by the luxury, sumptuousnes, and dissolutions among the Persians.

It is a matter verie frequent and ordinarie, that the Provinces of greatest happinesse, become a prey to others, in being voluntarily destitute of courageous men. For, a more warlike people coming to inuade them, after they haue continued there for some time: they forget their former generosity, as if they were wholly changed, and with the very ayre of the countrey, had deriued to themselves the verie same Nature. Sicily hath alwaies bin the butte and ayme of all warlike people, as of the Grecians, the Carthaginians, and the Romanes, and of many other beside.

Also in Egypt, which is one of the verie choicest, fertilest, and richest Nations of the worlde: the most martiall people that come to stay there, doe after enter into such a lazic condition, that they stand in neede of chafing thence, euen as they

they did to the first inhabitants. The like great and frequent changes haue bin often obserued, as well in ancient as more moderne times; and namely, vnder the Mahometane Galyffes. It is reported of the Wel Salmacis in Caria (which is one of the regions of Natalia) that such as drinke the water thereof; of men, doe immediately become women. But the truth is, according to the relation of Vitruuius, that it is a place so goodly, pleasant, and where the people liue in such delights and dissolutions; that the courages of men, after they haue liued there any long while, becometh altogether effeminate or womanish; which gaue such a subiect to the Fable, as if they had bene changed into women, and receyued into another Nature. Some haue attributed (to the selfe same reason) the vnmancinelle of the latter Grecian Emperors of Constantinople, through the ouer-much delicacie of the Countrey.

All this is contrary in France, for a mild such a great affluence, and euen among a world of pleasures; generous spirits are borne, truly warriors, and of men excelling in all vertues, yet cloyed withall the like abundance of euery oyster thing; yea, euen among those Frenchmen as lister themselves to be led into all pleasures, in peacefull & vndisturbed times; yet are they not thereby softened a iotte, neyther loose any of their courage, valour, and adresse to actions of Armes. But euen, as if they were merely borne thereto, nor euer learned any other kinde of exercise: being euer more readie to giue ouer all pleasures, to follow the warres, march to fights, and throw themselves first into the mouth of danger. This is their true exercise, their naturall inclination, which they knowe not how to forget or giue ouer: and whensoever they delight in hunting, yet are they more readie to returne to Armes.

The like naturall disposition is described by Zozimus, of the Emperor Valentinian, who although hee was a man giuen to much pleasure, and addicted himselfe thereto at due seasons: yet notwithstanding, when occasion required, he was alwayes readie to undertake Armes, whereof as patiently he endured all the paines, toiles, and incommodities, euen as if hee had taken a great pleasure and felicitie therein. Such a man was Demetrius King of Macedonia among the Grecians, and Marcus Antonius among the Romanes, and Scipio giues very little ground vnto them in martiall disposition. Cesar also, speaking of his Army (composed for the most part of Gaules) saide: That his Gauls, howeuer they were persumed, yet they left not (for all that) to fight valiantly, and courageously. Milites suos etiam vnguentos, bene pugnare. The like account was heterofores made, that the Belgians were the most hardiest and valiant amongst the Gaules: because, they would permit no Merchandizes to be brought into their Countrey, that any way might serue to soften the naturall inclination of Men. But he knew well enough soon after, that valiancie and Militarie vertue was so naturall, vnto them that were borne and nourished vnder the ayre of Gaul, as it could not by any means bee quailed in them, or separated from them, by the plentie of any thing seruing vnto voluptuousnesse.

Some haue held opinion, that the rigour and austeritie of the Persian youths, and their continuall manner of liuing in so stricke a kinde, prouoed to be the onely cause, that they were much better men of warre, then their neighbours. And surely, the Lacedemonians differed not from this coniecture of them, when they saide: They made no great meruaile why they went so boldly to warre, and exposed themselves vnto death; considering, what small delight and contentment they tooke in life, in regard of the hard and rigorous discipline of their lawes. But the Gentlemen of France, although they be borne and bred delicately, they doe neuer faile in generous courage: Armes, and verie hard Trauailes in Warre, are vnto them as sportes and pastimes; and, to speake iustly, they are borne thereto, without neede of so much cunning and instruction, as others haue to exercise and prepare them.

Those people that France hath bred and yeldded, haue alwayes bene redoubtable for their Armes, to all other Nations of the world. The Romanes well seile it, when they were hewed in peeces by the Gaules, on the day at Alia. And afterward, when (vpon their soldaine coming on them) they were constrained to hide themselves in their Capitoll; the which yet was not sufficient to save them till (in the end) they were gladde to pay a great quantity of golde and silver to the Gauls, for their ransom. And although their historians labour to make men beleene, that Camillus the Dictator exterminated the greater part of the Gauls, & brought back againe that which was given for ransom; yet notwithstanding, Polybius a very ancient Author, neere enough to those times, well experienced in the history, & being an excellent writer beside, hee declareth the contrary, saying: The Gauls went away victorious, having granted peace to the Romans, by means of a great summe of gold, which they brought thence with thē. Which is moreover confirmed by Suetonius, who sayeth: One of the house of the Neroses, Ancestors to the Emperor Tiberius, having made warre on the Gauls called Senones, descending from them that surprized Rome: brought backe the gold of the ransom which had bin payed them; & that it was not recovered by Camillus, as the rumour ranne. And beside, those very men that sacked Rome, returning thorow Italy, made alliance with the elder Dionysius, the Tyrant of Siracusa, and aided him with their troops against the Locrians and Crotonas his enemies, as it is avouched by Trogus Pompeius.

If the losse of the Gauls had bin so notable, as Linius hath described it: they could not have peopled a greater country in Italy, & made war so often on the Romans, as at divers times they did. Wee had enough to do (saith Cicero) to resist them & to defend our selves, being continually assailed by them. And our Captaines and Commanders in war perpetually accounted, that it was fitter to defend by beare off their blowes in such a war, then to set on or assault them. It is well known of great Marius, when he opposed himselfe against the efforts and stratagems of the Gauls, that hee neuer durst attempt to enter their Lands. They to whome all other war was easie, lost all their fencing trickes against the Gauls. Hitherto (saith Salust) the Romans enermore conceived, that all things gaue way, and were to be yoked by their vertue. But only against the Gauls, when they were to fight with thē, not for honour and glory, but for defence of their lives.

Nor did they tearme this warre but tumult & insurrection, because that by the promptitude of the Frēch, in vsing arms; they had not the leisure to beate their drum, to raise or call their companies; but suddenly, without any choise, tooke such for soldiers as could carry Armes. They had a particular Exchequer or Treasurie by it selfe, destined to be employed only about the charges of the Gaulish warres, whensoever they hapned: as being one of the greatest & most extreame necessities belonging to their City. And though in all other wars some stood exempted from going to them, as such as had spent their time in war, being called Veteranes, or ancient seruitors; yet (in such a case) they much needs march, without any regard at all of such exemption. Et oportet bello Gallico ut maior iura moreq; prescribant, nemo est Civis Romanus qui sitis villa excusatio utendum puet. According to the Lawes of our Ancestors (saith Cicero) and according unto ordinary custome, there is not any Romane Citizen that must think only to propound any exemption, when there happeneth any war with the French.

Nay, that which is more, the Romans quitted and gaue them freely the honour belonging to actions of arms. Cato voluntarily contesteth in Salust, That the Grecians had gone beyond the Romans in eloquence, and the Gauls them, in the glory of war. And this is the reason, why they alwaies stood in feare of the country that brought forth a people naturally warriors, & in so great a number. When they named that Province, they would say, It was too fearefull for the Romaines. Neuer was any speech of the least stir or tumult in Gaule, but they would all tremble. And thereupon, immediately after the death of great Caesar the Dictator, it was propounded to the Senate to give ouer Gaule, leaving it to full liberty, although it was formerly conquered and assured. These are the very words of Appian: There was (saith hee) made a Decree and arret to the Senate, concerning Gaule: all the Senators being possessed with feare. A little lower hee saith: Some amongst them were of the minde, that they must needs give over, and forsake all the whole Country and People, leaving them at libertie, and to enfranchise them from subjection unto the Empire. So much they stood in feare and dread of the Neighbourhoode of Gaule.

And Cicero saith: Nature hath munited Italy with a rampier of Alpes, not without divine providence. For if that entrace (saith he) were laid open to the fury and multitude of the Gauls: ever would the City of Rome, the seat and dwelling place of the Emperre, only Sovereigne of the worlde, bee besiedged.

It is not to the Romans only, that the French have made knowne their unconquerable corage, and to feel the strength of dreadles armes; what Captayn? what quarter of the world is there, where they have not planted their conquering Ensigns? The Celts (for so the Grecians termed the French) are found to dwell in most parts of the vniuerse, as having lefte France, in regard of their ouer-great multitude, to seeke new countries elsewhere, which they conquered with their swords, and became Masters of them. They are dispersed ouer all Europe, and hardly is there any quarter, where they have not left the markes of their victories, and records of their name. Spaine is full of such Colonies, whose names would bee considered out of diuers countries, according as ancient Geographers have stiled them. And first to speake of the Celtiberians, who are proove sufficient to our purpose, and accounted to be the most valiant people in Spaine. No doubt, as they stil retaine the name, so doe they (in like manner) keepe the vertue and valour of the Gauls their Ancestors, that came to inhabite there, and also to make a Plantation of their name.

Some foure thousand of those Celtiberians, defended most courageously the city of Namantia, and sustained the siege for fourteen years, against the Effortes of many Roman armies, yea, and of their very cheefest Captaines, untill such time as they were enforced to send their Scipio thither. In the end, the so long besiedged Celtiberians, chose rather to burn themselves and their City together, then to yeeld to their implacable Enemies, unto whom they left nothing to adorne their triumph, but their very name only.

At this very day, Portugal and Gallizia do carry the names of their first founders the Gauls. They entred also vpon a great part of Italy, comprehending (in the same respect) the name of Gallia Cisalpina, where they first entred in the reigne of Tarquinius Priscus, King of the Romaines, about the year of the world, MMM. CCC. LX. There they founded Millan, & afterward Brescia, Verona and other Cities; this country, ravenous, hardy, and warlike Nation (I vse the very wordes of Trogus) the cheefest next to Hercules, and iustly celebrating to be called immortal, they (I say) ouerwent the sharpest and bitternes of the Alpes, vnpossible for the snowes & colds. They are found to dwell thorow all Germanie, where are the Boemes and Carnes; in Pannonia or Austria, and Hongaria; in Transylvania, Valachia, and Albania; in Thrace, where they have reigned a sufficient length of time. This may be the reason, why from our Ancients named Europe, Celtica, Keltica, because that the most part of the inhabitants, called themselves Celtes or Gauls, as is plainly asseuared.

For the same respect, an ancient Geographer saide, that the Northern part of the earth was inhabited by the Scythians; the Eastern by the Indians, the Southerne by the Ethyopians; and the Occidental or Western by the Celts or Gauls; each place and part of the world taking first denomination according to the excellency of the people that were the principal and most renowned in euery part. The verie same Gauls haue made all Macedon and Greece to tremble, and haue solde peace to all other people, who came to buy it, before they were any way assailed, as affrighted with the name of the Gauls only. Trogus reporteth it in this manner: Tantus terror Gallici nominis erat, ut etiam Reges non laceffiti, ultro pacem ingenti pecunia mercarentur. Such was (saith he) the terrour of the Frenchmans name, that Kings neuer being encountered, came of themselves, and by their owne meere motion, to purchase their peace with great summes of Money.

All the lesser Asia were as slenderly able to resist them, for it hath bin, wholly subdued by them. In like manner, such account was made of their man-hood, that there hapned not any war in the East, but they were the forwardest partakers therein. It was euermore to them, that afflicted Princes fled for succour, as it is declared by the same Trogus, and here you may read his owne verie words. Gallorum ea tempestate tanta fecunditate inuentus fuit, ut Asiam omnem velut exanime aliquo implerent: Denique, neq. Reges Orientis sine mercenario Gallorum exercitu villa bella gesserint, neq. pulsi regno ad alios quam ad Gallos confugerint. Tantus terror Gallici nominis sine armorum intuitu felicitas erat, ut aliter neq. Maiestatem suam tutam, neque amissam recuperare se posse, sine Gallica virtute arbitarentur. Denique in auxilium a Bithinia Rege invocati, regnum cum eo parta victoria dismerunt, eamq. regionem Gallo-Graciam cognominaverunt. There was as then such an abundance of youthfull French, that they filled Asia, even as if it had bin swarms of Bees: in such sort, that the Kings of those quarters of the East, attempted not any war, wherein they had not Frenchmen under pay. And if they chaced to be expelled from their cities, they had no other recourse, but to throwe themselves into the armes of the French. Such was the terror of the Frenchmen Name, or the invincible felicity of their Armes; that Kings knew not howe to provide, nor conserve their Maiestie, or to recover it againe being lost, without the valour of the French. To conclude, being called by the King of Bithinia, to lend him succour, after they had parted away with victory; they also parted or divided his kingdom with this, and named the Countrey Gallo-Grecia, or French-Greece.

Those verie Gaules whereof we now speake, were come away from Thrace, where they (before) had established a Kingdom: which continued afterward, till the time of Cyarus their last King, according to the report of Polybius. The people of Thrace, of Bizantium, and of Cherronesus, being then their tributaries. All this is affirmed and maintained of the ancient Gaules.

Nowe, as concerning such as have carried the name of Frenchmen or Gauls, ancient standers, and dwellers in partes neerer hand, as well on this side, as beyond the Rhine: they long time made warre with the Romanes, pursuing them with their Armes, and over-labouring them by so many courses; that at length they expelled them quite from amongst the Gaules. They were first observed to appeare vnder that name of Frenchmen, in the time of the Emperor Galen; and from thence onward, the Roman Histories are copious, how manie times they passed and repassed the Rhine, to make warre with the Romanes, when they thought to teare away Gaule out of their hands. Panegyricall Authors, exalting those Emperors with praises to heaven, that had in any encounter (how silly foucer) got any advantage against the French; do yet make it sufficiently known what great account was made of this people and generous Nation, yea, more then of any other, as being most fearefull to them, and to whome (for this cause) they yielded themselves tributaries.

Vnder the Emperor Claudius the 11. they invaded Holland, and other neighboring Countries, and made thence theyr courses and wonted expeditions, as well by Land as Sea; vntill they extended their power so onward, that they entred somewhat farre into Spaine. Zozimus and the Rhetorician Eumenius, doe report a certaine voyage of theirs, and a chance well deferring memory. The Emperor Probus hauing made warre on them, and wonne the vpper-hand in some encounter; hee tooke diuers of them prisoners, which he led away into Asia. Soon after, they made an escape, & being imbarked in certaine small vessels, which they found sitting for their purpose: they ouer-ran and rauaged the coasts of Greece, and the Isles of the Ionian sea, besieging and taking Siracusa, and afterward passing the straites of Gebaltare, returned home againe into theyr owne country. The verie greatestt affairs, that euer the Romanes had with Straungers, were alwaies against the Gaules, or French, who neuer would suffer them to liue in quiet.

In the end, the Emperors well vnderstood their valour, and made vse thereof to their seruice. Constantine the Great, in the warre hee made against Licinius: had great store of them in his Armie, vnder conduct of a verie valiant French Capitaine, named Bonicius, whose manhood is well noted by Ammianus Marcellinus. At the same time, partly by conquest, partly by conuincence of the Emperours; they extended the Gaules name very farre, and did so great seruices to the Romanes, that they filled whole Legions of them. Especially vnder the Emperors Constantius, Constantine, Valens and Valentinian, as is to be seene in Ammianus Marcellinus, Zozimus, and diuers other Historians of those times.

more strict alliance with them, could find out a Mellobandi, Prince of the French, beside many other Captaines and Soldiers: by whose meanes he assured his owne estate, and carried away great Victories from the Germanes, whereof thirty thousand were slaine in the field. This Prince did so highly esteeme of them; as they serued him in all occasions: yea, they filled vp the Army which he gaue to Theodosius, to make quietnesse in the East; and to repulse thence the Gothes. Moreover, he fauoured and advanced them to great charges of his Court, and euen as if (in respect of them) he began to grow in distaste with his Romanes; so procured it (partly) to be the cause of death.

It is most plaine and apparant, that for the space of about 200. yeares, they were the threshing Flaile, the terror & amazement of the Romane Empire: wherto (vnto) the same words that Claudius sayth of them: They sold peace and quietnesse at the prizes of money, and tooke great recompences to cease theyr fights. The Epithets, which the Authors of those times gaue them, were the names of Terrible, dreadfull, and redoubted Warrior: as being the only nation, that (more then all other else could do) amared, bruised, yea, & utterly brake in peeces the Romane forces.

After that this Monarchy of the French in Gaule was fully established: they could then vndertake other great enterprizes & voyages. How many times did they passe in Armes, both into Asia and Affrica, to chase thence the Infidels, Sarazens, and Turkes, to deliuer the Holy land, and the Christians that were there in their seruitude? There hath not bene any expedition in Christendome, wherein they haue not bene heads and conducters, yea euen the better part it selfe. Many times haue they succoured & re-established the Emperors of Constantinople. And in the end, to reuenge the death of Stacius Angelus, (whom they had reuealed som short time before) cruelly murdered by the Tyrant Mur Jusse: they took in their assault) that great City, where they commanded (almost) four hundred yeares. They made themselves so knowne thoroughout the East and South parts, and haue so liuely engrauen there the memorie of theyr name: that (euen to this day) all the Orientals terme the inhabitants of Europe, by the word Franki, as thinking that name to be vniuersall. As in like manner the Arabians and the Abyssinnes, who call Europe by the name of Frankia.

Orosius, the learned byshop of Sylas reporteth, that the Indians when the Portugals make warre against them: they call them by no other name then Franchi; as confessing naturally, that since the brasse expeditions of the French; against the Turkes and Sarazins; this name (full of admiration among those people) had so spread it selfe thoroughout all Asia and Affrica; that alwaies afterward, the same was to be attributed vnto all the Western people.

But to deliberate no longer at this time on all the expeditions of warre, and voyages attempted by the French for the christian name, for the defence of religion & the Church, against Moores; Sarazins; Turkes, and other Mahometanes; in diuers Countries of the world, and the glorious and goodly actions, thare by them performed: Can any thing bee tearmed more hardy, valiant & generous; than that which they did for conquest of the holy Land? Vndertaking so long a Voyage, crossing so many Countries, & with such store of difficulties: Nothing could dant or turne them; nothing seemed impossible to them, being altogether inflamed with a zealous & diuine desire. They exposed themselves to all kinds of dangers, inconuenience of places and passages, famine, thirst, pestilence and warre: meere prodigal of their liues, for religious zeale. In whatsoever we read concerning antiquity, yea euen of the fabulous ages, neuer art to be found such deedes of prowess, as they did in that conquest.

Let Godfrey of Bullen set himself before you, with his gallant French troopes, traueeling al Germany & Hungary, & arriuing at Constantinople; there is assailed by diuers ambascadoes on the Emperors behalf, yet overcoming them all, euen as if it were against his wil to preuaile. Then looke on him passing the straits of the Hellepont, besieging the city of Nicea, one of the strongest in all the East, munited with all things sustained and defended by a people refoled, as wel for assaults giuen, as sallies repulsed, or by any cunning to be circumvented. comming expressly to rayle the siege, is overcome, broken, and cut in peeces, &
the City surprized in the end.

After this, behold another battell giuen in Cilicia or Carmania, by thirty thousand French onely, against an Armie of two hundred thousand Turkes and Mahome-tanes, led by the same Saliman, and the Sultan of Persia. These two hundred thousand Turkes, hauing (at their first charge from farre off) couered all the Christian Army, with a cloud of Arrows;
and making a counterfet shew of flight,
sent another shower of shafts in the same manner, and then a third, they not hauing any means to ioyne or come nere them.
So that there was scarcely one man among the Christians, but was wounded with their Steele Arrows, some in the armes, others in the legges, and many in diuers parts of their bodies, notwithstanding the helpe of their Targets: euen as if we had the Army of the Romanes led by Adrian against the Parthians. Vntill such time as Godfrey refused to make apace of flight, and (indeed) retired;
as if he had beene no longer able to endure them, which moued the Turkes to pursue after them out of order, as if they were altogether overthrowne and disfla-ned. But when the French behelde them within their compass, that they might deale with them by handy stroakes: all wounded as they were, they giue such a courageous charge vpon the Infidels, that they foiled and vanquished the whole Army. So proceeding on, the Cities of Tharsus and of Edessa, and all the other betwene them, were likewise taken.

Antioche besieged by a long siege,
the besiegers being incessantly assailed,
as well with the ylling forth of an Army that was within, as by the ambu-sades of many troopes at liberty abroad, besides cutting off victuals, and all other commodities from them. In these extremities they were also oppressed with contagious diseases, famine, and other kinds of necessities and miseries, every thing being opposite and contrary to them, and the Emperor of Constantinople, doing his very utmost to endamage them. All which notwithstanding, they lost not a iote of courage, or became any way at disheartned in this their enterprize, although to make their misery much more:

there came also on them another dreadfull Army, containing all the powers of the East, and appearing impossible to be resisted. But the Christians conducted by Godfrey of Bullen, out-spent and wearied
as they were, hauing giuen the battaile, ouercame the great Armies, and droue them to flight.

It passeth an infinite number of particular charges, encounters, combates, fights, ambushes, surprizes and assaults, to come to the siege of Ierusalem, where they met with all resistance possible, both by force and cunning: which neuerthelesse (in the end) after infinite famous actions of Armes, was wonne by liuely force, and in a general assault. All this was done in lesse then two yeares, from the yeare 1097, to the yeare 1099, when Ierusalem was wonne, and in the Month of Iuly. Then was Godfrey chosen King of Ierusalem, who yet refused the crowne of gold, saying: It fitted not him to weare that pompe, where his Lord and Saviour wore one of sharpe pricking thornes. Every one of the other Princes & French Lords, which made vp the body of the Army, were also partakers in the chiefe possession of Cities and Prouinces thereof; & there was not a man among them, but was capable of holding the Empire of the world, and by farre greater reason, then is reported of Alexanders Captaines. And this may iustly be the cause (in part) that the successe was not so great as it might haue bene: they being able to haue passed on, so farre as the extremest parts of the East, to conquer all the Country, and plant their Ensignes on the banks of the Indian Seas. In briefe, there was neuer any thing comparable thereto, neither for religious piety, nor manhood in Armes.

It was also a matter admirable in Godfrey, that being Souldier; he should be culpable of so great prouidence, iustice, and moderation of spirit. It is reported of him, that although he was King, yet he cloathed himselfe, and liued so simply,
as the very meanest Souldier about him.
So that vpon a certain day, diuers Lords of the Country being come vnto him, to present him with gifts, but (to speak truly) to espie and take knowledge of what they could: being brought before him, they found him sitting on a Sacke full of straw, & vpon the ground. After they had well observed it, being driuen to no meane admiration, they made enquiry: how so great a Prince, being a Lord of such matchlesse merit, hauing shaken all the East, and seized on the very greatest kingdome, should be seated so poorly, without any pompe, no rich hangings, not a ny Guard about him, to make him dreadfull to such as should come nere him.

But he demanding what they had saide, replied thus: It is the best seate for a mortall man, and by good right, the earth should suffer, and serue to haue him for a time: in regard that (afterward) it must be the house for his body to dwell in. Which when the Lords had heard, admiring his answer, humility and wisdom, they returned thence, saying: *This is (indeed) such a man, as was to rule over all these Regions;
and to him (in equity of desert) is belongeth
to command ouer all other people vnder
the sun*.

Thus the kingdome of Ierusalem was held for the space of about fourescore & tenne yeares by the French, who (in the meane while) made warre vpon the Infidels, being succoured from time to time
by the Kings of France: among whom,
Lewes the fourth, called the young, and Philip Augustus went thither in person.
But afterward, this kingdome was conquered by Saladine, first Souldan of Egypt:
And then the French, vnder conduct of their Kings, ceased not alwayes to attempt voyages and expeditions, as shall be declared in place more conuenient: Heere I forbear to speake of the great warres and goodly exploits in Armes, of the French against the Allemaignes, Hunnies, Danes, Normans, Saxons, Sar-razins, Gothes, Lombards, and English, which are to be discoursed heereafter.

There is not any other people, that haue caused themselves more to be spoken of, to spread their renouwe so far,
and enterprise matters more great, goodly, & difficult, then they haue done. Other Nations neuer could come neree them, no
the Spaniards, of whom Strabo yieldeth testimony, that they neuer did, or euer durst vndertake great occasions. They being (saith he) exercised and inured to slender exploits, by lowe or base enterprizes; as some light ambuscades, courses, and brigandages or theueries. But concerning the valour of the French, and the greatnesse of their courage, there remaineth very sufficient proofes in antiquity. Some haue attributed this quality to them, to be voyd of feare, and boldly to cast themselves into the midst of dangers. Strabo reporteth, that certaine Frenchmen being brought to Alexander the Great, when hee demanded of them, what it was they most feared; made this answer: Nothing at all, except the Heauens should fall on our heads.

Signifying by this manly reply, that feare had no power to freeze their blood, or vistipate any place in their warlike soules.

In like manner, they neuer knew what it was to flye, or turne their backs in the most dangerous fights; neither to giue so much as the least inch of ground: as the Emperour Leo declareth in his Art Military or Tactics, and Chalcidius the Grecian, in his Turkish History. Both of these Authors do affirme, that they hold this the heauiest sinne, which can happen to be committed by them. The selfsame is also toucht by Aelianus, who deliue-reth these very words. *Among all men, they least most affect dangers, and most valiantly expose their liues to periles; I wonder that them to be the Gauls. The whole subject of their Songs, is of such men of vertue, as died valiantly in foughten battels. Crowned they combat, and adorned with Markes & Trophies of their victories: as well to honor the worthy acts which they haue done, as to serue for memory to posterity, according to the manner of the Grecians. But about all flight is held so dishonest and shameful among them, that very many times, they will not get them gone, or make escape away from a tottering house, though it be ready to fall vpon them, or all on a flame, and themselves in immediate danger to be burned. This may seeme very strange, and rather blame worthy,
then commendable: yet it is done in no other regard, but only to shew what their resolution hath alwaies bene, as shunning all occasions, whereby they might be reputed timorous.*

In like manner, the Emperour Sulan, speaking of his sojourning among the Gauls, saith; That it was with the most warlike, and onely courageous people of all other Nations. Pausanias declareth, that although they were wounded quite thro-rough their bodies with the sword, and euen cleft in twaine with axes sharpe slices; yet notwithstanding, not a iote of their courage abated. And when they were shot through with darts and arrowes, so long as any respite of life remained, or the very last gaspe or breathing; they fought still manfully, and made a massacre among their enemies: yea, there were many among them that snatched the Arrowes & Darts out of their own wounds, and shot them backe against the Greeks, or being neerer hand, slew them with the same Arrowes and Darts, even by meere stabs. Whereat the Greeks being amazed, to behold such wilfulness in fight, such courage, contempt of death, & prodigality of life; not knowing whereto they should attribute it, nor (to speake truly) what to say of it, (being wont to commend no men but themselves) they saide; This goes quite beyond the nature of men.

In the same case and respect, Aristotle, imagining that such strength and valiancy was without example, and about the capacity of any humane spirit: attributed this viuacite of soule, to a kinde of furious and naturall insensibility, not fearful of any thing; neither earthquakes, nor the roughest stormes or tempests: Even like (saith hee) as it is reported of the Celts or Gauls. Warre was their true trade & exercise, there was not a man among them, that would excuse himselfe from marching to the field, without any distinction of ages. The olde man, wearied and spent as he was, went to it as cheerefully, as hee that farre greater force and vigor. A yong lad, euen in the first floure of his time, found therein no difficulty at all; he made offer of his youthfull members freely, to be hardened by colds, and inured to traualles, alwayes disposed and ready to support most difficult occasions, yea, and the very dreadfulllest accidents of war.

In briefe, as it is confirmed by Marcellinus a faithfull Author, a Souldier or mās fit for the warre, who hath liued any time among them; shall neuer be there mette withall, as among the Romanes: where there were some, that to shun the warres, would cut off some member of their owne, especially their thumbs; *Whom we termed (saith he) in derision and mockery, * Murci.* To men of such base and feruile condition, as will thus cut off a ioynt, to make themselves vncapable of being Souldiers, may be referred that iniurious French disgrace, Poltron, à police trunco; A knave hath his thumb cut off.

This generosity and greatnesse of courage, is likewise familiar among the womē of France, whereof we haue testimony in the same Author. Ammianus Marcellinus, who writeth thus: If a man of Gaule enter into a quarrell, his wife being with him, there is not any troupe of strangers able to resist or stand against their strength. Especially, when the women are moued & enflamed with choller, stretching forth their brassey armes, gripping their strong knie hands together great and white as snow: so that both with feet & fists, they discharge blowes as liberally, as if they were stones from slings, or quarrels from Cross-bowes. And as they are thus excelling in magnanimity, so are they as complete in other perfections: but chiefly in prouidence, discretion, and good aduice.

VVe reade, that before the Gauls passed into Italy, a strong sedition happened to grow among them, which dispersed it selfe into a ciuill warre. But the women, euen as the two Armies were ready to meete each other; threw themselves into the midst betweene them, and questioning the reason of their difference, drew them to so great equity, and fullnesse of content on eyther side; that they began admirable and reciprocall loue and kindnesse among them, not onely betweene the Townes and Cities, but also in the houses neighbouring together. VVherupon, after that time, they continued all consultations of their affaires: (as well concerning warre as peace) with their wiues, and pacified all quarrels and differences with their neighbors and kindred, onely by their meanes. And therefore, in the composition which they made with Hanniball, when he passed by the Gauls, they concluded (among other Articles) in this manner. That if it came to passe that if the Gauls pretended any wrong to be done them by the Carthegians; the Carthagien Capitaines and Gouernours (which were in Spaine) should be the Iudges thereof. Contrariwise, if the Carthegians could alleadge, that the Gauls had offered them any injury; the women of Gaule should bee Iudges therein. And therefore Plutarke had great reason, to ranke those Ladies in number, among them reputed to be vertuous women.

The composition that was made betweene Hanniball & the Gauls.

The Gauls called their wiues to consultations and counsell.

Kingdomes in India where Noble men admit no marriage.

Of Bertrand du Guefclin, and his noble minded Lady, Tiphania.

Behold what generous words of a woman can doe.

The Gauls euer called them to their counsells and consultations, as well for warre as peace, because they knew their naturall disposition to be such; as not a woman among them, would seeke any to soften and weaken (willingly) the boldest or most couragious enterprize her husband could vndertake. And this may be the cause, why the ancient Romane Souldiers would not be married: As now at this day, there are certaine kingdomes of the Indies, where the Noble-men will by no meanes admit marriage. But the Gauls knew well enough, that this sexe were so farre off, from any way hindring their Martiall designs; that they would by no meanes permit the very least inclination to negligence or cowardise; they rather serued as sharpe spurres to their vertue, to excite, encourage, and animate them more and more.

To this purpose, I may not omit a notable example, though not of the ancient Gaulish women, but of a French Lady, as yet recent and fresh in memory. Bertrand du Guefclin had bene alwayes a most valiant Knight, and one highly renowned in all Histories. After he had performed many worthy enterprizes, euer to his fame and honour: he married with a beautiful Lady, named Tiphania, descended of a noble family. After which marriage, he growing to leaue, and discontinue his former exercise of Armes; as he sate discoursing with his Lady, she gently began to blame and reprove him, declaring, that (before their marriage) hee followed the warres, wherein hee had achieved the cheefest reputation. And that it neyther suted with the nature, nor duty of a true Gentleman, to lose the least repute of honour worne before, by ouer-much affecting a new made choise. As for mee (quoth shee) who ought to shine by the bright radiance of your fame, I shall account my selfe too low deiected, if you giue ouer a course so well begun, and lose your spirits in doating loue, w^{ch} it to one more worthy then my selfe.

These words did so neerely touch the Knight, that hee began againe to follow Armes, wherein he carried himselfe so valiantly, that they did well and worthily attribute it to him, to stand as a stout Ram-piet for France, in the very sharpest times of warre, and euermore made a meere

Barre of his body, against the hottest inuasions of the English. By vertue of his valour, King Charles the fifth, hauing reconquered most part of those territories, which had bene insulted on in the reignes of the precedent Kings: alwayes helde head against that valiant Edward, surnamed the Blacke Prince, and Prince of Wales, and disappointed all his hopes. It was he that re-established Henry the 11. King of Castille, in his kingdom, in despite of all the Armies and English forces. Hee was also made Constable of France, by King Charles the fifth, who helde him in such endeared affection for his valour, that hauing bestowed great gifts on him in his life time; after his death, hee did him so much honour, as to let him be buried at S. Denis, at the feete of the same Toombe, which this King had prepared there for himselfe.

Whatsoever is here set downe, concerning this honourable Lady Tiphania, hath bene, and is as familiar to all the Ladies of France, who partake in the selfe-same affection; and couet rather to enflame, the freeze their husbands forwardnes, in winning honour by Armes; and the like they are (in all respects) to their children. For whosoever will but aduisedly well consider, on the admirable generosity, and greatnesse of courage in the people of Gaule; they will make no meruaile at all, of those bolde words vled by the braue Souldier Vercingetorix. If I could (quoth hee) unite together all the French: I should compose such an Army of men, as if the whole world did conspire, and bend all force against them, they were not able to withist and them. Take it as a vaunt or brauado who will. The very proofe of their fights and conquests, made but by some part of their people, may yeeld sufficient testimony, that if the words spoken by Vercingetorix had bene put in execution; they would haue proued true, and the same effect must needs haue followed.

And to speake truly, if we conferre them with other Nations, we shall apparently perceiue, that the French haue gon beyond all in Military vertue. So many expeditions, and yet into farre remote Countries, so many warres attempted, & fortunately finished; so many foughten battels; and so many actions of Generosity,

The honorable actions of Bertrand du Guefclin.

ity, haue made them sufficiently knowne to the world. The Greeks and the Romans (albeit their sworn enemies) do render but too true testimonies thereof: not speaking (in the liketearmes) of any other people whatsoeuer. But especially the Romans, who neuer feared any Nation so much as they, whom they acknowledged to be fatal to their City, and the greatnesse thereof. So that when the Gauls of Italy, but particularly those on the higher side of the Alpes, made but a countenance of removing themselves: or designed any enterprife: they were immediately possessed with terror, and in a continuall apprehension; omitting no needfull prouision of all things, euen as if their City were to be besieged againe, or halfe surprized. Polybius saith. They verily perwaded themselves, that they should neuer become Masters of Italy; no, nor conserue their owne lands sufficiently; so long as they had the Gauls to be their neighbors.

Of the second Punic warre.

In a word, after that the Gaules of Italy were emptied of men (by continual wars) and brought into subiection, Polybius reporteth, That there was the end of the Gauls war, the like whereof was neuer heard or seen, be it for courage, boldnesse, and resolution in souldiers; be it for greatnes of fights; be it for numbers of slaime men, or multitudes of their troups. Further he proceedeth on in the accidents of their wars, by way of giuing them more encouragement to weakne mindes, against the dreadful attempts of the Gauls : Who made seizure (saith he) on the Greeks not only before, but also in my time. Of any other nation he findeth none but the Grecians & the Romans, that can deliuer any such true testimony of them : which rendreth faith sufficiently on their side : y among all other people) they neuer could be followed. Albeit Cicero in his time, speaking of the Spaniards and the French faith, That the Spaniards exceeded in number, but the Gauls or French in valiancy. Wherby is evidently seene, that in the comparison of these two Nations, he giueth the honour to the French, attributing to the other, nothing but number

And yet me-thinks it is strange to be credited, that the Spaniards should exceed the French in multitude of men, considering that Spaine (as hath bin spoken hereofore) is described to be but sparsely inhabited, euen by ancient Geographers, and them more moderne : whereas contrariwise, that France is so filled with men, and so greatly inhabited, as it is wondrous full to behold. But it may bee, that the mighty numbers of the Gaules were not (as then) knowne, Gaule being not subjected to the Romanes, as Spaine was, which they held almost wholly. For whose sœuer shall consider, what Armies that Gaules gathered from time to time, to make warre vpon the Romanes, according to the recital of Cæsar himselfe will iudge, that Spaine, nor any other Province of Europe, could not be so fully furnished felues to no other exercifes, but to wander at randome among the Mountains, there to pilfer and rob from one another, or elfe to feue as mercenaries, partly to the Carthagenians, and partly to the Romans, after they had once got footing there. On the contrary, the Gauls (of whom no queftion was at any time made to be all warriors, excelling in valour and greatneffe of courage) in regard that they were much civilized, neuer lived after fo bafe a manner. And although they had fuch plenty of warlike people, yet wanted they no meanes of freeing themfelves from ydlenefle, when their grounds were to be tilled and husbanded, or other Arts and Trades vfed, neceffary for the life of man, as well in times of greateft turbulence, as feafons of more fecurity. For no where can it bee read of them, as it is of the Spaniards, that they left their Lands barren, becaufe they would not till them, but referred them wholly to their wives to take that pain: ſo who both before and after their times of childing, were feigne fo to toyle and mowe themfelves.

Other of our Gaules employed themselves in the studie of Letters, and exercises of Religion, and contemplation in celestiall matters: wittnesse for many skillfull Druides, and such beides as followed after them, renowned for their Learning through all the parts of the world. So that the Gaules dwelling beyond Gaule, served but very slemderly to the Romans, untill such time as they had conquered Gaule: then they found the sufficiency of their assistance, and acknowledged not only their vertue and valiancy, but also their infinite number of warriors. And this was the reason, why Cicero, speaking afterward to Cæsar, concerning his victories in Gaule, said: That hee had overcome Nations, innumerable in multitudes.

Now, to speake of all other Countries, there is hardly any one of them, but it hath bene as a prey to strangers. Italy, sometime the Conquerresse of many people, with her Rome, calling her selfe, cheefe Lady of the world: was then not (for long time) expoyled to the rauages, irruptions and pillages of the Vaisigoths, Hermles, Cerpides, Ostrogoths, and Lombards: who intirely tacked and rent her in peeces (each after other) and droue the people out of their dwellings: Spaine became inuaded in the same manner, and afterward was canted by the Vandales, Alanes, and Swenes: yet were they also expulſed (in following time) by the Viſigoths, who eſtabliſhed their owne abiding there. Next to them, came the Oſtrogoths, who held the Countrey powerfully to long, till the Sarrazines ouercomming them, were viſually poſſeſſed of well neere all Spaine. Allemagne, or Germany, was not it likewise made ſubiect to the inuafions of thoſe people which dwell more Northerly, who at length ouerthrow the whole Romane Empire? I ſay nothing of ſome other quarters of the world, where the like fortune hath many times happened: yet this is moſt certaine, that thorough all the Provinces of the earth, there haue bene changes of people, and of frequent Colonies.

But to speake more particularly of Spain, at the first it was filled with people of the French Nation, as along the River  Anas* or Ana, now called Guadiana in Castille, so farre as the Promontory Artrabrum, or Cabo de finis terra, in Gallicia in Portengall. Also the Celiberians in Castile, by the testimony of Strabo, Ptoleme, Pomponius Mæla, Pliny and Appian. From whence it enfueth, that some ancient Geographers, as Ephorus and others, haue comprized them vnder France. But be it howsoeuer, Spain hath continually bene taken, held and commanded by strangers: as by the Ionians, Lydians, Thracians, Rhodiens, Phrygians, Cypriots, Phœnicians, Egyptians, Phœnices, and Carthaginians, according as their owne Historians haue acknowledged. Since then, by the Vandales, Alans, and Suenes, that inhabited there for a long time: and afterward by the Visigothes and Ostrogothes. At last, wholly filled with *Moor*s and Sarracens, who held it in possition aboue seven hundred yeares. And there they remaine yet to this day (according to some Writers) in the Mountaines of Andalouza, called Alpuexarras; whether the Armies of Conquerours could neuer come or reach.

Heereby may bee gathered, that they are a mingled people, and composed of so many severall Nations, as haue dwelt there in the countries from time to time. As their very language it selfe (euen the best polished and most frequent) suffici-

enly sheweth, consisteth (for the most part) of the Gothish and Arabick. It would aske an infinite and wearisome labour, to make search for all the mutations that haue there happened. But France is a Country, which hath least bene that way ill entreated: as hauing kept herselfe more pure, entire, and neate from ramage, and incursions of so great numbers of strangers.

* Timagener, an ancient Greeke Author that flourished in the time of Augustus, cited by Ammianus Marcellinus, saith; That according to the opinion of his Nation, the Gauls were Autochthonos, that is to say, Originaries, and borne in and of the selfsame Country. Declaring thereby, that they were not come or deriued of any strangers Colonies; which the Athenians allow attributed to bee a matter of great honour. I know well, how it may be objected to me, that Marseilles was builded, and inhabited by the Phoenices: yet there was none other but that only Colonie, beside that which is reported of the children of valiant Hercules, which he had by the women of France, and who there commanded for sometime, as is testified by ancient Monuments and Antiquities of the Gauls, which Ammianus Marcellinus saith, That he himselfe had seene in Gaul.

As concerning the Britannijs or Bretons, who being expelled out of England by the English Saxons: they withdrew themselves into Bretaigne, the called Armorica. I hold, agreeing with the iudgement of many learned men, that they being ancient Pillars of the French, parting from the firme land of the Gauls, to dwell in the Isle which was before it: coming backe afterward, to refuse themselves in France, did but re-establish their owne ancient Country, and returne to their true originall. Naturall reason, for the neighbourhood both of the one and other, doth apparently shew it selfe. The same is confirmed by Cornelius Tacitus, & by the common opinion that then was, as also by the similitude and likenes, both in faces and manners of the inhabitants. And beside, there is to be seene in the Geographical description of that Island (according to Ptolomy) the names of many Gaulish people, who vndoubtedly had planted Colonies there. Such were the Belgians, the Parisians, the Arrebatians, & the Cornabians.

As for the French, they were no strangers, they entered among the Gauls, not as enemies, but as friends and bretheren to the Gauls: to deliuer them from the tyranny of the Romanes and Goths, who had expelled them, and were (in that manner) restored to their former freedome, and so the Gauls and French became but one people, as shall hereafter more plainly be declared.

The Goths, hauing so long time kept their reuels in Spaine, to speake truly, came also among the Gauls, but yet for a very short while: nor was there any Ensigne or remarkable valor in those Goths, making comparison of them with the French. It is said, that their property was to be fearefull, and soone put to flight: so reporteth S. Gregory Florentius, Arch-Bishop of Tours, who liued somewhat neere to those times. And Salustianus, that eloquent Priest of Marseilles, acknowledged the Goths to be the most feeble and slothfull, among the generous Nations of the North parts. When they were in Gaul, and stood to encounter with the French: they durst not tarry, or make any head against them. The Kings Mero-ueus, Chlonis, and Childebert, beheld them to passe ouer the Pyrenean Mountains, yet they assailed and ouercame them in bataille, even in Spaine, hard by Toledo, their capitall abiding. The Burguignons and Germanes, who had invaded those small parcels of France, were soone cut off, and quite exterminated.

So the French and Gauls, conferred themselves within their own limits, without hauing any strangers mingled among them. And as (in former times) they filled the world with their Colonies or troops of people, so did they continually the like afterward: hauing againe peopled Germany and Italy, vnder the Emperour Charles the Great, and his successors. So that it is not without good reason, that (at this instant) the very greatest houses of Germany, deriue their originall from the French: as is declared by Hermanus, Count of Niear, in an Epistle which hee sent to the Emperour Charles the 5. on the Annales of Pepin and Charlemaigne.

True it is, that the Gauls haue bene ouertaken by the Romans: but what people knew how to resist them; considering their their admirable order, and exact Military discipline: Josephus, very fitly to this purpose, attributeth thereto all their great conquests and large extendure of the Roman Empire. So that after he hath demonstrated the forme of their Campe, their ordinary exercises for Armes, and a summary obseruation of all their behaviour, he concludeth. All these being well considered, wee neede make no doubt to say, that the possessions was much lesse then the possessors. Adding withall, that hee extended so farre in declaring all this, not as any commendation to the Romanes power; but rather as a comfort to the conquered.

Moreover, of the Westerne Prouinces, France was the last conquered by them, whatsoeuer is else saide to the contrary. Whereas (on the other side) Spaine came among the first into their hands, in the time of the wars against the Carthaginians. France was that Country, that longest of all resisted, and against which (to speake no more then truth) their invincible Armies, yea, they that were victorious throughout the whole world; became meerey edgelesse and blunted, as not able to beare off their blows. All other Romane Captains utterly lost their labour, Caesar onely excepted. Which is no meane honor to the Gauls, to yeeld themselves vnder the yoke of so great a Prince: who is acknowledged to be the most wise and perfect Captaine that euer was. And yet for all that, France was not conquered at the first onset, neyther made surrender of her spoiles, without sweate and blood. That great Commander in warre, tooke intollerable paines, and trauelled for the space of ten yeares continually, with all the power and strength of the Romanes, which then held the more part of the wide world. And yet (euen then) he had not preuailed neither, if hee had not serued his turne with Frenchmen themselves, & made a conquest of France, by France. Diuisions and partialities, which were then on foot among them (an ordinary and fallall ruine to the most potent kingdomes) called him thither, where finding all to be diuided in diuers factions, ciuill warre kindled among them, allied with many, and fortified with their troops, as namely them of Arthun and others: it was so much the more easie to be surprized by him, and in such an opportunity of aduantage.

All which notwithstanding, it is an admirable matter, and well worth the obseruation, that in the resistance made against him, by people so defynted & perplexed: yet in ten whole yeares, the Gauls fought thirty ranged batailles, wherein, according to the account made by Appian, there were slaine well neere eleuen hundred thousand able fighting men. And beside, himselfe testifieth in his Memories sufficiently, with what manner of people they had to deal: & they likewise could no way performe, without receiving great losses, as there he seareth not to confesse.

If wee had but his Ephemerides, or particular Iournall booke, we should see other matters of his owne confession; considering, that Ammianus Marcellinus, speaking of the conquest of the Gauls, saith: He pacified them, after many great losses on either side sustained in ten yeares war. And as touching his owne person, it is recorded, that in a certain encounter, he was releued, (notwithstanding all his Greatnesse and goodly Armour) by a Gaul, who hauing remounted him vpon his owne horse, bare him away through all the throngs. But there came another Gaul, who brauely cryed to his companion, Cecus Caesar in the ancient Gaulish language which is as much to say, as I see Caesar passe, & this was the reason of his safe passage. Wherein they worthily declared, that it was honour enough to their generous mindes, to carry Caesar safely away from danger, when they had him in their power, and could haue slaine him, satis est praesentasse. The Grammarian Seruius citeth this example out of the Ephemerides or Iournals of Caesar, which wee cannot come by in these dayes. In like manner, Caesar knowing them wel, and hauing (on the other side) experimented the dulnes of the Easterne people, in the war which he had against * Pharnaces, King of Pontus, saide. Most happy was Pompey, that hee had nothing to do with the resolute French, but with the faine-hearted men of the East. Got the surname of Great as Jo. de la Mare. In briefe, the Gauls were neuer ioyned to the Romane Empire, by any power in the Romanes, but thorough their owne proper forces: as a great Captaine speakeeth in Tacitus. Verè reputantibus Galliam suis met viribus concidisse.

And as King Agrippa declareth in Iosephus. It was not through want of courage, or any dull neglect, that they were overcome: considering the Romanes themselves said, it was four score yeares, before they could fasten hold in one small Meridional or Southern Province of Gaule, & afterward fought so much against Cæsar: But rather it was by the frugall managing of their owne felicity, wherein they pacified both destiny and fortune: whereby they plainly saw that the Romanes got the upper hand rather by force than otherwise, and (in a word) by the divine permission or providence. Nay, and that which is much more, after so long warre, against such power, and so great a Captaine, yea, and after so many losses: yet notwithstanding, Gaule fell not into the Romans hands, as being subiected, but rather as allied, and in farre better fashion then all the other Provinces.

lib. 8. in fi.*

He that continued Cæsars Commentaries, saith: That while hee wintered in Belgia, he had a careful eye, onely to maintain the people in amity, without giving to any one either will or occasion, to rise or take themselves to Armes. For that which hee most of all desired, was, that vpon his departing, there might happen no occasions to slay him: or if hee had cause to bring an Army thither againe, yet that he should not be troubled with any long warre, whereunto Gaule gaue listening with very good attention, when the law her selfe out of apparant danger. Vherfore, causing the Citties to come before him, with his best respect, and greatest honour he embraced them, and gaue very goodly gifts to the principall and most apparant persons: not imposing on the rest any charges, or extraordinary subsidies, wherby he contained them in peace, and the better disposition to obedience throughout all Gaule. And so by this cunning, Gaule (at last) gaue place, and became mildly quietted. For the affability of Cæsar, and the courties he extended towards them, did more conquer them in one winter, then all his Forces, Legions and Armies could doe in ten yeares.

One winters kindnesse in Cæsar wonne more then all his Legions could do in ten yeares warre.

Ouer and beside, the titles of Alliances, of Peace, and of friendly conference, are so frequent in the Romane Authors, euer where they speake of Gaule; that it plainly testifieth on her behalfe, that shee was not conquered by Armes, but rather left at louely liberty, by friendly parlanes and confederations. Which Ammianus Marcellinus himselfe also confirmeth, for he saith, that Cæsar: After many losses on the one side & other sustained, during a war of ten yeares continuance: in the ende (by eternall pactions and agreements) ioynd the Gaules to the Romane society and alliance. We see also, that they left some people in Gaule wholly free, as (among other) the men of Auvergne, who termed themselves as Noble as the Romanes, and called them their brethren; the men of Anthun, the Marcellians; them of Tonnos, Porrejs, and the round neighbouring Countries.

Now as concerning Subdies & Contributions, a Romane Gouernour, named Cerealis, sheweth plainly in Tacitus: That such tribute was but for maintenance of the Legions, and for preseruacion of peace in the Provinces; which could not be continued without Armes nor Armes without wealth. As for the rest (saith hee, speaking to the Gaules) all is in common with vs, oftentimes you giue command to our legions, your selues also gouerne in the Provinces, as others do in our Empire. By the selfe-same reason, that which bound them most to duty, was the entire amity of the Romanes to them. Cæsar made a great number of their Cittizens Romanes, and Augustus in like manner, though in more sparing fashion, with some restriction fro vulgarizing to great an honour of the City or Bourgeship of the Romanes. Afterward, the Emperour Claudius gaue the right of Senatours to the principall of the Gaulish Lords. And in the ende, Galba, for the signale seruices which the Gaules had done to him and the Romane Empire against Nero: hee made them all Cittizens, without exception.

The like was neuer done in, or for Spain, where there were but some Colonies: which had the same right, and no more then to any other Province of the Empire: who obtained that priuiledge, but by general Edict of the Emperour Antoninus Caracalla. Nor was it without great reason, that they made such great account of this Province: considering, what great advantages it gaue vnto them. For, were it in respect of treasure, rich Gaule furnished them with more reuenues; then (by vsing the common manner of

Were it for leuening vndaunted Souldiers, and for such as they mustered from thence: therein consisted the maine strength of all their troopes. And that Cæsar knew well enough, and published it sufficiently abroad, as hauing made choise of them a-boue all other, and (by their meanes onely) came to possesse the Empire of the whole world. For ouer and beside what hath formerly beene said, concerning the wealthy treasures of France: the valiauntie of the Gaules holdeth the most eminent place, by whose courage he was especially and principally, to gaine that greauesse, whereunto hee had so long time aspired.

Cæsar victoric against Pompey, ascribed to the Gaules.

*Plin. in vit. Cæsar.
Pompey was allonied at the bread whereon the Gaules fed on in warre.*

The Gaules sent to succor M. Crassus against the Parthians.

Plin. in M. Crassus.

The admirableness of the Gaules to young Crassus.

The victory which hee wonne against great Pompey, ought to be attributed to the valour & warlike vertue of the Gaules. And if he had not bin furnished with such men, valiant and strong, not onely against the enemy, but also to endure famine, and all other kindes of necessities, euen to the feeding on bread made of grasse & roots, he had bin lost in his hopes, and vterly defeated by the long & lingering delays of his enemy. This was that which most of all amazed Pompey, who gaue expresse charge, that such bread should not be scene in his Camps, for feare of disheartening his Souldiers, or driuing them into detestation of their paines, wherby they considered, the sharpe extremities suffered by their enemies, with whom they dealt so cruelly, that they left them nothing to feed on, but euen as brutish beasts.

Moreover, Cæsar hauing sent a small number of Gaules, for great succour to M. Crassus against the Parthians; these were the men, who (in that most vnhappy day for the Romans) performed most strange exploits of Armes, and shooke the enemies victory very sharply. These were the men, in whom young Crassus reposed most confidence, as being the warriours, with whom he performed admirable actions of prowess. For they receiued (with their bare hands) the sharpe points of the Parthians Pikes, and cloeing with their body to body, threw them to the ground, among their horses feetes, where they lay all along stretched out, vnable to releue themselves, onely through the massy weight of their Armor. Many ther were beside, who forsaking their owne horses, crept vnder the bellies of the belonging to their enemies; to pierce & stab them with the points of their Swords: which causing the horses to bound aloft, by extremity of the anguish they felt, trampled vnder their feete both their masters & enemies together, and to fell dead without any rescue.

The same Cæsar, prepared a complete Legion of Gaulish Souldiers, which hee called the Larke, and added it to the Romane Legions, and whereto (at length) he gaue the honour of Bourgeship. Nay, and that is much more, hee not knowing how he might worthily enough recompence the Gaules: made a great number of them Senatours; to the great discontenting of many Romanes. And as for the Caually or horsemen, wherein the Gaules euermore excelled all other Nations in warre: Cæsar had (almost) none other, but continually ready at his seruice ten thousand Gaulish horse, according as it is declared by Appian. These were the French horse, that afforded so many great seruices to Cæsar: as well in Spain against Afrimius & Petrinus, Lieutenants to Pompey; as afterward in Africa. Wher it is said, that in one fight, lesse then thirty Gaules in number, fought against two thousand Mauritians, and droue them to flight.

Nere to Munda in Spain, Cæsar fought against the sonnes of Pompey, where all had bin vterly lost for him, hee knew not any meanes for helpe or redresse: till the Gaulish horsemen reconfirmed all, and was the cause, that the day (being before reputed for desperate) came shie to Cæsar. His successe found themselves alwayes well serued, both with ordinary horse and foote of the Gaules. Tacitus maketh mention of a Cohort or Regiment of the Sicambrians, which did many remarkable deeds; in the warre against the Thracian Mountaineers: Who were (saith he) prompt and hardy against dangers; and no lesse dreadfull for their Armes and order of marching in battaile array. This I do more willingly leste downe, because of those Gaulish Sicambrian Nation, the French are properly descended.

The Poet Claudian auoucheth, that as other Provinces furnished the Emperours with diuers commodities: so did Greece spoiled & waſteth by the Goths.

The Gauls hated to be commanded by a ſolitarie Emperours.

Tiberius, Pelliſſe. In xxx. Tyrannus. De Poſſumma 2.

Proſperus in Conſ.

The Gauls were neuer truly ſubjected to the Emperours.

France alwayes fit them with men for the warres. The ſame Author ſaith in another place, that vnder the Emperours Arcaſius & Honorius, about the time of the inſurrection and reuolt of Gildon, a great Army, compoſed (for the moſt part) of Gauls, was brought to ſuccour Greece, then rauaged and ſpoiled by the Goths: and they performed there ſuch deeds of valour, as holpe the Country to recouer her right. So that being (for long time) wel entreated by the Romans, partaking in the honours and adminiſtration of the Empire: it was no matter of muſaile, that their peace ſhould be of ſo long continuance. One onely thing alſo was irkeſom & burdenous to the, in regard whereof, they troubled the Romane Empire with ſome ſtirres and perturbations, the Gauls being naturally addicted to vertue and ſeuerity. And therefore they hated to be commanded by ſuch Emperours as were negligent, diſſolute, and quite giuen ouer to all vices: which made them deſpise ſubiection to ſuch as was Tiberius, Nero, Domitian, Commodus, Heliogabalus, Galiens, and other ſuch like monſters of their names. They would endure none but vertuous Princes, and ſuch Gouvernors were the fitteſt men to confirme and keepe them continually in peace.

Heereupon was it, that the Emperour Valerian, in a Letter of his ſaid; That hee had made a certaine man, named Poſthumius, Gouvernor of Gaule. A man (ſaith he) well worthy of the Gauls ſeuerity. A word ſufficient to reiect the obediẽtion of leuitie, where with ſome would haue reproched them. Another Author, writing the life of the Emperour Cæſar, confeſſeth: That to command the Gauls, there needed an Emperour very conſtant and vertuous. So that being vnable to ſuffer the detestable vices of many Romane Emperours, they departed (at every occaſion) in this reſpect frõ their obedience: whereby it may be juſtly ſaid, that they continued alwayes free, and being not truly ſubjected, gave their ſeruite to no other Emperours, but ſuch as themſelues repured worthy. Vntill ſuch time, as vpon the declination and fall of this great Empire, by the inſatiable auarice of Romane Gouvernors, and other inſupportable charges: they altogether fell off from them, and gaue ayde to their compatriots the French, and ſo wholly did roote out the Romanes nation.

But to examine a point (heerebefore handled) ſomewhat more particularly, it cannot bee ſaide with any reaſon, that France was conquered by the Romanes before Spaine: neither that the Spaniards made any more reſiſtance, or continued longer time from ſubduing or ſubiection. For on the contrary, it appeareth, that the Carthagenians poſſeſſed themſelues (in few yeares) of a great part of Spaine: even at ſuch time as the Romanes fell like wiſe on it, and carried away their ſhare without any difficulty. Wines the treaty of peace, made betwene the Romanes & Hafdruball, chiefe Captaine for the Carthagenians, wherein it was couenanted, that the Riuer Iberus, now called Ebura, ſhould bee the bound of the Empire for theſe two people, and that the Saguntines, free people originally of Greece, who were betwene them both, ſhould conſederate with the one and other.

Aſter this, it is ſufficiently knowne, that the Romanes had long time made warre againſt the Carthagenians in Spain, who gaue them there many valiant fights. During which while, no citate, or ſewer, made mention off among the Spaniards; who ſtood but as ſpectators, in expectation of the yſſue, to ſee which of thoſe two people ſhould haue command ouer them. This was at the beginning of the ſecond Punicke warre, when the Scipios (after they had ſpent eight yeares in war) were ſlaine by the Carthagenians. And afterward, Great Scipio, ſurnamed Africanus, being ſent thither, after diuers encounters, and taking Townes from the Carthagenians: expulſed them wholly thence, & fiſt of all made it a Romane Province, in the yeare of the Citie of Romes foundation CCCCXXIIII. All the buſines which he had with the Spaniards, was for ſome reuolts of particular people, whom he likewiſe as ſoone ſuppreſſed. So that very truly Ammianns Marcellinus hath ſaide: That all the Provinces of firme Land in Spaine, were the fiſt conquered, & made one Province by the Romanes.

All Hiſtorians agree together, reporting alſo, that in the yeare CCCCCLII. two Pretors were created at Rome to gouerne Spaine, which was then diuided in two parts, and termed Citerior & Pſterior, to wit, on this ſide, and beyond Ebu-

ra. The elder Cato was alſo ſent thither, to qualifie the reuoltes of ſome people. When he had overcome them, & made prouiſion, that no more rebellions might afterward happen: he ſent his Letters & command to every City in particular, to this effect, that they ſhould caſt down to the ground their wals and fortifications, & diſpoſed the action ſo orderly, that his command was obeyed in the Cities, and he arrived there at the ſame time. So they being verily perſwaded in each City, that this command ſtretched but to that place onely: yielded the more willingly, which otherwiſe they would not haue done. Whereupon enſued, that in one day all their Townes were diſmantled, and their wals raced. In regard of which ſucceſſe, Cato made his vaunt; That hee had taken more Townes in Spaine, then there were daies.

Now, as concerning Gaul, the Romanes neuer had footing there, but in the yeare IVCXXII. & in Prouence onely: about an hundred yeares after that Spaine was wholly conquered. Nor had they there but a very ſmall parcel, which was a nere neighbor to them: all Gaule being neuer made a Province, but by Cæſar. By what likelihood of truth can it be ſaid, that Spaine was brought vnder the power of the Romane Empire, after France? Neuertheleſſe, it is very true (as Strabo ſaith) that the difficulties which the Romanes had in Spaine, to make it peaceable, grew onely through the reuolts of ſome particular Townes & people, and by the incursions of the reues gathered together in troops, and theſe (of neceſſity) were to be chaſtiſhed. So making war, not in groſſe, or with a body of iuſt Armes, but by peeces and parcels, one after another, in ſmall courſes and ſurprizes: the Romanes had more trouble to finde out, then conquer them. Again, although Spaine was held & commanded wholly by the Romanes, yet notwithstanding, there remained ſome people, dwelling in difficult, ſharpe & mountainous places, as * Belſiques, & * Atures: who afterward, in the time of Augustus, were wholly vanquiſhed, and added to the reſt of Spaine. As alſo (about the ſame time having conquered Aquitaine) he made it a Province, as the three other of Gaul. Moreover, there cannot bee found ſo great a number of worthy Capitaines, af-foorded by any country, like vnto France. As were among the ancient Bellovaſians and Sigonaſians, chiefe of the fiſt & furtheſt off expeditions among the Gauls: Brennus, that ſurprized Rome, and another Brennus, who afterward ſubdued the moſt part of Europe and Aſia. Dumnorix, Diuitacius, Ambiorix, Dumnatius, Vercingetorix, Diditiacius, and many more recorded by Cæſar. Not can there be desired a better, and more certaine testimony of valour, and generous nature in the French, then that which Strabo deliuereth in these words. All those people whom we terme Gauls, are Martiall, courageous, & ready (of themselves) to fight: And yet notwithstanding, they are very simple, and no way wicked or euill inclined. Heereto he addeth. That they bring nothing to the fight but vertue and courage, without any craft, superchery, or brauery. And although (saith he) they are full of heat to fight; yet are they (for all that) capable to understand and reason, and easie to be persuaded. Willing to undertake the quarrell, for such as they see to be uninjuriously wronged and offended.

Copiae habebat in Gallia bellicae consuetudinis, sed et contra Gallos homines aptos in iustitia, qui per virtutem non per dolum dimicare consueuerunt. Cicero in Philip. 5.

The Author of the Commentaries on the warre which Caesar made in Africa, be it Hirtius, be it Oppian, or whosoeuer else, saith. That the Gauls were more open hearted, and no way deceiuers, using to fight by vertue, and not by subtilty or fraud. The same Strabo auoucheth in another place, saying: They are all warriors, and principally good Knights, for the best Cauallerie of the Romanes, was composed of the Gauls. The Romanes alwayes made most especiall account of the Gaulish horsemen, for Caesar found himselfe to bee best serued with them. And Cicero hearing that the government of Transalpine Gaul should be giuen to M. Anthony, cryed out. Est enim opinio decretum aliquem M. Anton. Gallum vltimum quam Plautius obtinet: Quid hoc est aliud, quam hosti arma largiri primum neruos belli pecuniam infinitam. Deinde equitatum quantum velis? Can any thing else be done heerein, but onely to thrust Armes into the hands of an enemy? First of all, infinite summes of money, which are the nerues and sinewes of warre: And next, as many men well horsed, as be wold haue with him. This passage is sufficient, whereby to conceiue and certainly obserue, the wealthy treasures of France, and the opinion held thereof.

The exercises of these people, spake fully the matter of war so much by them affected, alwayes louing a manly & cheerful disposition of the body, and contemning grosse corpulency: so that they condemned (in very great fines) all such young men, whose bellies exceeded the ordinary measure of their girdles, according to the auouching of Strabo. Moreouer, the French haue bene reputed to surpass all other Nations, in these two noble and warlike exercises, hunting, and ryding great horses. Hunting, which is nothing else but a lively image of warre, and an assidue meditation thereof, as Xenophon saith. Eginhard, the nursing child of Charles the Great, and his Secretary, writing his life, speaketh thus. Exercebatur assidue equitatio ac venando quod illi gentilitium erat, quia vix vlla in terris natio inuenitur qua in hac re Francis possit avari. He exercised himselfe daily to hunting, and to mount on horsebacke. Wherein (saith he) he relieth of the whole Nation. For there is not any people in all the world, that can beerein surpass, but onely may endeavor to equal the French.

But before I can finish this discourse, concerning the warlike vertue of the French. I cannot forbear to say somewhat of that which they performed on the day of * Nicopolis against the Turkes: where a man may well say, that a small handfull of French Gentlemen, excelled (in prowesse) whatsoeuer wee reade in Histories, of all the braue exploits in war that euer were done. Not Leonides of the Greekes at the Thermopylae, nor Caditius of the Romanes in Sicily, is any way worthy companion with them: the history followeth in this manner.

Charles the first reigning in France, the King of Hungaria sent Ambassadors vnto him, entreting that some succor might be afforded him, against Baiazeth's first, Emperor of the Turks, the most remarkable warrior that euer was of the house of the Ottomans. The King consenting thereto very gladly, many Lords & Gentlemen of France prepared themselves to be scene in this voyage, to the number of about a thousand or twelue hundred. Among others, there was the Conte d'En, Countable of France; the Conte de la Marche;

500. hundred French Lances, set vpon 30000. Turkes & their succors

A far vnto different army of Turkes, so meddle with few of the French.

Marche, the Lord of Coucy, the Lords of Trimouille, and John, Conte de Reuers, son to the Duke of Burgogne, who was chief Commander. When they were ioyned with the king of Hungaries army, hauing past the riuer * Danubius, they bare away (in assault) the honor of diuers Townes: and at length came to lay siege before the City of Nicopolis.

VWhile the greater part of the Army besieged the City, Enguerrand Lord of Coucy, taking with him five hundred Lances: made vp into the Countrey, to seeke some enemies that they might fight withall, and it is credibly reported, that (verie nere vnto them) there was a troop of Turkes, of about twenty thousand in number. Now, albeit this multitude exceeded their small companie beyond all measure: yet notwithstanding, they resolved to grapple with them. And hauing first of all drawne them beyond a wood, wherein there was an ambuscado; they came and charged them in the rerre. The fight was (for all that) cruell, and of long continuance, wherein the French, although they were so few against so great a number; yet they did performe wonders that day. So that in the end, the Turkes being disheartmed, faintned extraordinarily, & more then fifteen thousand lay slaine in the field.

Some thort while after, Baiazeth being come with a dreadfull Armie, consisting of more then three hundred thousand fighting men: they advanced themselves to deale with the enemies armie, being not worthy to be termed any number, because they were (in all) but seauen hundred, when they beganne the fight. The French small troops, made a goodly sight to behold, being all well armed and appointed, in rich glittering and gorgeous Armors, wanting no coist of golde and siluer, and brauely mounted on gallant horses, most sumptuously barbed & caparassoned; so that such as saw them, might well haue feared them an Armie of Kings. But (beyond all the rest) with what force, ardour and courage they fought, although they were meerey shut vp, and round railed or ringed in with innumerable enemies. At the first onfet, they wholly defeated and ouerthrew the auantgard and first battell of the Turke, beating them on flil before them, euen to the verie midst of the bodie of the maine army, where was Baiazeth himselfe.

Many there were, who periuourning meet miracles of manhood in fight, cleit or hewed out their passage thorough the prease, and very thicke of all the Turkish Army, compelling them to make them way, both for going on and returning backe again, euen to two or three seuerall times of enforcement. And yet no one man among that poore small troop, who seeing the vnauoydable danger of death, was desirous to take hold on any advantage, or shew so much as a countenance of retiring, albeit their enemies (gladly) offered them many meanes. All refused to loose their liues, but yet the enemies bought them at very deere rate, filling the field with mountains made of their dead bodies: euen till such time as the fight hauing held a great deal of the day, the most part of the French lying dead on the ground, and the rest (a very small number) wearied with killing the Turks, and pierced through with wounds, being ouerwhelmed with multitudes, were (in the end) taken prisoners. But it was generally held for truth, that if the great body of the Hungarian army (beeing well nere the number of an hundred thousand able men) had seconded them, or vfed neuer so little resistance, in making but a shew of withstanding the enemy, to hinder the French from being so enclosed, (by any forwardnesse in redeeming them, and not fearefully fly away on heaps thorough the valley, as the Hungarians most cowardly did, suffering themselves to be murthred, without any offer of fight) the day had remained to the Christians. And I dare speake it, that the power of the Turkes, which afterwards so greatly enlarged it selfe (meerey thorough our diuisions) had then bin vterly ruined from the top to the bottom.

Then you plainly perceiue, that of this small troupe of resolute Champions, the greater part of them lay dead in the field, hauing made a slaughter of infinite enemies, more by fifty times then they were, and fought to their latest drop of blood; but verie few of them remayned prisoners. But on the next day, Baiazeth going himselfe in person, to view the field of battell, and take acknowledgement of the dead, when he found that for one French

Concerning matters belong to iustice

Plutarch in vit. Pom.

Agathias in l. 1.

The French great louers of iustice.

A notable example of iustice among the French. Strabon.

Frenchman slaine, whole heapes and piles of Turkes filled vp the field, and all his Army left in such pittifull condition, he tooke it for desperately, and entred into such outrageous choller, as being vnable to consider on his losse, or take any means for contentation, hee commanded a passage vnto death thorough the army, of all the prisoners, except about some twentie of the greatest Lords: as the Comte de Nevers the General, and others who being knowne, were faued and put to their ransomes. Boianeth complaining on so fadde a victory, which cost him so deare, could not depart thence but very pensiuely; and in plain truth, such another ouerthrow woulde absolutely haue confounded him altogether.

This may seeme sufficient for the valiance of the French. But som may obiekt, that such warlike people, accustomed to liue among Armes and Martiall exercises, should bee voluntary disdainers of matters appertaining to Iustice, acknowledging no other right then that of armes. Forbear (said Pompey) till to morrow, to alledge your Lawes to vs, who haue our swords by our sides. This is quite contrary to the French, who are no way to be lesse commended for their iustice then for their valor and excellency in actions of armes, and haue euermore bene accounted to be true louers of Iustice. Agathias a Grecian authour, who liued more then a thousand yeares since, hath prayed and commended the French for their Iustice. Whereof (saith hee) they are verie desirous, as also great louers of their Country. He further addeth, That because they possesse a most assured estate, they haue (as their bases and support) many goodly principles engrauen in the hearts of their Kings and People. Why then let mee vndoubtedly tell yee, that among all other Nations, the Gauls & the French haue most highly cherished and loued Iustice, and haue alwayes religiously honoured it, yielding themselves thereto, and making continuall exercise thereof, without any passion.

And not to make repetition of an infinite number of goodly institutions, and diuers examples of their Iustice, it may well appear by this notable custome, which both Greeke and other ancient authours haue observed among them. To wit, that if any one haue slaine a Citizen or Bourgesse, he hath no other infiction but banishment; whereas, if hee commit the like offence on the person of a stranger, he is punished with death: for the paine is augmented in consideration of the stranger, to whome the more easily the injury may be offered, so much the more (they hold) that the offence which he hath done, ought to be severely punished and reuenged. It may be thought somewhat hard, that a stranger should be faoured and defended, more then a Citizen. To cutt off which difficulty, wee by the diuine law, ordained on the strangers behalfe, that he is so oftentimes repeated and defended, that a man must very carefully keepe himselfe from harming him, and that iustice must be rendered him equal with a Citizen. And questionles it may be truly said, that (euē at this day) ther is not any country in the world, where a stranger is more humanely entertained, lesse offended, and more defended in all right of iustice, then among the people of France.

In like manner, wee finde by probable histories, (that very often times) Princes and strange people haue referred their differences to the iustice of France, as well of the Kings, as of the Parliaments. Among other, the reputation of their Iustice in King Dagobert, was spread so farre into strange Nations, that the Hungarians, the Sclauonians, and other people neighboring about, desired him to be the Iudge in their differences. And more, the Sclauonians said, that if euē he came into their country, they would acknowledge & obey him, as if he were their King.

Furthermore, let it neuer be said or imagined, barbarism at any time had entertainment among the Gauls. Continually they were most human, hauing milde and well polished spirits by nature, & being aduantageously shaped or fashioned for the study of arts & Sciences: especially they studied eloquence in such sort, that the elder Cato in his originals cited by Charissus hath rendered this testimony of them. That they were quick conceited & industrious principally in two things; in the Art military, & in well speaking. The proof hereof appeared in that Hercules of Gauls, so much renowned by our forfathers, figured in such fashion, that from his mouth hung dangling downe at his tongue, manie small chaines of fine gold, wherewith he tied & bound the people by the eares, leading them whether so euē he pleased, & with their their owne good wills, free from al constraint. Declaring by this figure, what precious account they made of well speaking, and what power wordes had: no lesse (but rather greater) then that of Armes, to subdue people, & cause them become obedient willingly.

Vnder the Romane Emperors, there was a combate of eloquence in the City of Lyons, fought in Greeke and Latine; wherein, such as were vanquished, gaue the prizes to their victors, and were constrained (besides) to write in their commendation. And as for such as performed no matter worth the esteeming, they were bound (by necessity) to wipe out what they had done with a Spunge, or with their owne tongues, except they better affected, to be either beaten with rods, or throwne headlong into the River. VVherto may be referred that which Iuuenal saith.

Pallent ut nudis pressit qui calibus anguem, Aut Lugdunensem Rhetor dicturus ad arā.

And the same Author makes mention also, concerning the Eloquence of the Gauls, which they instructed vnto other people.

Gallia cauidicos; docuit sacunda Britannos.

I am enforced to extend my selfe somewhat further in this discourse, by making report of a few more testimonies; to overthrow the false conceited opinion of some, who haue esteemed, that the people of France (in their first times) were not addicted to Sciences, erudition, nor the study of Letters, wherein they are very greatly deceived. For on the contrary, it is plain to be proued, that (as in all other things) so therein also they haue most singularly excelled, and taught this same to the Romans. He that first instructed the Art of eloquence or well speaking in Rome, was one Lucius Plautius; a Gaul born; vnder whom Cicero (being then but young) was some yeares with his Brother Quintus also. And about the same time, or not long after, another Gaul was highly renowned in Rome; named M. Antonius Gnipho, being endued with a mighty spirit of singular memory, and infinitely skilfull and eloquent, as wel in Greeke as in Latine, and verie liberal (wherefoeuer he came) to teach what he knew. So that for these goodly and commendable qualities, hee bare such sway in those times as his house was much frequented by the very greatest Romaine Lords.

It cannot be denied also, but that the great Orator Cicero went often thither when he was Praetor. But that which (above all other) may make him most Famous, was, in being Teacher to the great Dictator Caesar himself. Surely, not without some especial providence therein, to the end, that this Prince might hold wholly from Gaul (not only the encreasing and establishing of his Greatnesse) but also this honor, wherein (not a jot lesse) hee excelled, then in actions of armes. Gaul hath euē since kept her selfe in this reputation. Quintilian, vvho was a Spaniard, made great reckoning of the eloquence which was taught in Gaul, and about the declination of the Roman Empire, Symmachus Gouernour of Rome at that time, in one of his Epistles, sayeth: That if he would performe any worke worthy of memory, he must go of necessity, and dreine it out of the Gaulish knowledge and elegance. The same man also acknowledged, That whatsoeuer was in him, either of eloquent or polished speaking, ought the due thereof to the aire of France, where hee had learned them. And in another place hee saith, That Mount Helicon, sacred vnto the Muses, was transported from her owne place, into France.

Saint Hierome writing to a certayne Father, who was very carefull for the institution of his sonne in well speaking, saith; Post studia Galliarum que vellest, summa sunt, misit Romanos non parces iunipibus, ut roboratem Gallici morem, sermonis grauitas Romana condicit. After (saith he) he hath performed his studies among the Gauls, where they are most flourishing, for sending him vnto Rome, make no spare of experiences, to the end, that the abundance, delicacy, and luster of the Gaulish language, may be seasoned with the Roman gravity. The same author sayeth in another place, That France is fertile in Orators. In another place also he saith: That hee hath alwayes abounded in most eloquent men. As illustrating vnder that title, Attianus in the time of Augustus, afterward relega-relegated or exiled into the Islands Baleares. Domitius Afer of Nismes, who came with great charges to Rome, being generally renowned for the chiefeft Orator of his time, and esteemed so highly by Quintilian, that he acknowledged him for his Master. Next, the father of Trogus Pompeius the historian, of the house of the Vocantians: who kept in his hand the ring of the Emperor Caligula, as being the keeper of his seales. Then Gabinianus, M. Afer, Julius Florus, Julius Secundus, verie famous Oratours vnder Vespasian, and many more whom I omit, to come to more moderne times, wherein Aquitanie only hath more furnished Rome with Senators and Orators, then all the rest of the world beside.

A testimony hereof was the Learned Nazarius, Author of some Panegyrics, yet remaining with vs. And that which is more admirable, was the daughter of this Nazarius, named Eumonia, the miracle of her age, who was not a lot inferior to the very worthiest Orators. Beside an infinite number of others, mentioned by the authors of those severall times, too troublesome for vs to rehearse but one halfe of them. Heere to appertaineth the writing of Claudian: That Gaul with her Learned Citizens, did ordinarily guard the Emperor, and served him in the most part of his affairs. Moreover the greater part of the Roman Senate, and a number of the Magistrates being great and famous persons of that age, are especially noted to bee Gauls. So that wee may very well avenge that, which Aulus sung in his Mosella: It is no longer Rome, that once made shew of her Catoes, in regard that Gaul did euer vnder equal her.

Other Sciences also have carried as full faile there. In the first times thee had her Druides, Vates or Eubages, & Bardes, of whose learning we have yet lesse some remains and memories. The Bards composed in Verses, and conserved to all posterities, the names and commendable actions of virtuous men, as pure sufficient to animate the very dullest corages. The Eubages, called also Vates by Strabo, applied their studies to the contemplation of celestiall things; as also vnto Naturall Philosophy. As for the Druides, they are sufficiently famous, and although wee have spoken to good purpose of them in the former booke of the ancient Gauls; yet some especiall things there omitted; may the better in this place be remembered in larger manner.

They instructed and taught about all things else, that mens soules wer immortal: which is the foundation of all religion, and the very strongest bond of human society. They discoursed also on the stars, and of their course and motion: also of the greatness of the world, the earth, the nature of things, the power of God; & gave instruction in all these to their youth. This is avouched by Ammianus Marcellinus, Mela, and Strabo, who say, That the most of them held the world to be immortal. An opinion surely (after many great disputes and alterations) found to be most true by the verie best Philosophers and Diuines, framing a distinction thus.

Assuredly, the world is of eternal and incorruptible matter, in regard of the celestiall part, which receiveth no alteration, neither shall receive any at their consumption: but by a conjunction of light and whole perfection. But what is vnder the caue of the Moone, composed and mixed with Elements for the vse of man, shall perish by fire, and returne into their first essence and Elementary quality. The course of heauen shall stay, and by consequence, all motion and corruption cease; according as it was held by Peter Lombard long since Bishop of Paris; & called Master of the Sentences; and with him all the Theological Scholasticks, and the Angelical Doctor, Thomas Aquinas.

They beleued also, that (one day hereafter) the water and fire shall haue Dominion; whereby we may perceiue that they had notions comming neere to truth and our beleefe, albeit altered and confuted. For that which they conceived of the water, they faide was alreadye come, and for the matter of fire we doe credite the like, & expect the consummation of the world thereby. Why then it is no matter of matter, if having imparted their knowledge to other people; Aristotle should confesse, That Philosophy received her originall from the learned Gauls, whom hee calleth Semnotheans, and avoucheth France to bee the Mistresse of Greece. All the Gaulish Philosophers were in such reputation: that the people conceived the goodnesse of the yeare, the happinesse and honor of their their times, to consist in the multiplicitie of them.

This shall suffice to shew, that such men were not well informed, as haue written, that the French did not adiect themselves to Sciences; considering, that they haue alwayes continued in the exercise of Letters and Learning. And for that purpose they had (from time to time) many famous Schooles, established for the instruction of youth. Marcellinus equalled Athens in learning; so that very oftentimes the Romaines sent their Sonnes to that Academy, rather then to Athens, as it is reported by Strabo, who wrote in the time of the Emperor Tiberius. We reade moreover, that the Emperour Augustus, sent thither Julius Antonius; the youngest sonne of his Sister, to study there. And Tacitus reporteth, that the probity, integrity, and knowledge of Julius Agricola, his Father in Law, came by the nouriture & instruction, which he receiued at Marcellinus in France.

About the same time, Aulus also became famous for the study of letters and liberal Arts, whereof wee haue the testimony in Tacitus. And againe, after these publike schools, who were established by the Emperor Constantine, father to Constantine, who to that purpose sent thither the Orator Eumenius. There is a Law in the Code Theodosian, of the Emperours Valens, Gratian, and Valentinian, wherein is declared, that there were a great number of Townes in France, which florished by the excellency of Masters, Oratours, and Grammmarians, in the learning both of Greeke and Latine. Among which towns also, were them of Bordeaux, Tholouse, Narbona, and many other. Aulus likewise speaking of that of Bordeaux, sayth; That then issued from the hand of one only Doctor, Nector or Minervius, a thousand Famous Advocates or Councellers at Law, twice as many Senators or graue State-men.

These Fountaines of all erudition, haue not dried vp in France vnder the reignes of their Kings, but rather haue encreased and abounded more and more, by multiplicity of Schooles, publicly established in many other Cities; wherto they since haue given the right of an incorporated body or vniuersity. And by this occasion, such Vniuersities, in fauour of the studie of Letters and Sciences so founded and erected, haue bene endowed and adorned by diuers Kings, with goodly great priuileges and particular fauours. Among which, that of Paris hath extraordinarily surpassed all other in the world. To her, as to the Queene of Learning, resortes the affluence of people from strange Nations, there to learne the Sciences, and especially holy Diuinity. This is as the Faire, Mart, or Market of the whole world; for the liberal Arts, and for instruction in all Languages. This is as a Nurling Orchard of good plants and ingenious spirits, in all verue and faire erudition; from whence hath bene selected (like swarmes of Bees) learned men in infinite numbers, that haue dispersed themselves, and meerey peopled most parts of the earth. Also it hath bene the module and originall, whereby all other haue taken example, not onely for France it self, but likewise for all Europe.

Pope Innocent the third, made such estimation thereof, that from thence he selected all those men, whom hee intended to aduance to the Bishopricks of Christendome, and other dignities in the Church. Beside, it appeareth by good & sufficient testimonies of other Vniuersities, for more then three hundred yeares since, that the studies of Paris haue bene the Foundation (in great measure) of the Church. Stadium Parisense esse fundamentum Ecclesie. And euermore it hath bene the chiefeft in opposition against heresies, to combat and ouercome them, euen so soone as (at any time) they began to grow. Infinite victories and triumphs hath the crowned her selfe withal, in so famous a contention; whereof I spare to make any report; because they are no lesse carefully then elegantly set downe by the Lord Loyell, in his Tract of the Vniuersity of Paris. Wherein also hee hath most learnedly obserued, the true institution of that Vniuersity, against the vulgar Fables which haue bene noyed thereof. There are likewise many other Vniuersities, founded, and established in diuers Cities and Townes of France, as in Tholouse, Bourges, Orleans, Angiers, Poitiers, Cahors, Mont-pellier, Nismes, Caen, Nantes, Rheims, &c.

Also from France, and all her Schooles, haue proceeded men as learned and excellent in all kindes of Sciences, as in piety and

There haue beene many wife & learned Bythoppes canonized for their sanctity of life, who haue established Christian religion in many Countreies, and suppressed monstrous heresies; dispersed in many parts of the world. As S. Hillarie Bythop of Poitiers, the true confounder of the Arrian heresie; where-with the Church was too much tormented, euen at the beginning of her increasing. Saint Sulpitius Seuerus, whose learned writings lets vs yet sufficiently see his piety, and painfull endeuours together, as the Arch bythop of Bourges, that liued vnder the reigne of King Contran, and also a more ancient Priest of Aquitaine, of equal standing with S. Therom and S. Martin, with whom he was very familiar, & who wrote his life.

Pontius Paulinus, who being a Senator, defended of a great family, and infinitely rich, gaue all his goods to the poore, & becoming an Ecclesiasticall person, was afterward elected bythop of Nola in Italy. Of the same country of Aquitaine, were also S. Ruficius, S. Phobadius, and Profer, Alethius the Priest, so much commended by S. Therom, for his sanctity, eloquence, and learning. Ecditius, Auitus, and Mamertus, instituter of the Rogations, Arch bythops of Vienna: S. Sidonius Apollonaris Bythop of Auuergne; S. Lupus bythop of Troyes; and S. Germaine bythop of Auxerre, who settled and assured Christian religion in England. Eucherius Archbishop of Lyons, Salutianus and Gennadius, priests of Marfeilles, and S. Vincetius Monke of S. Honoratus, in the Isle of Lerins. And since the Monarchy of some later Kings, S. Rhemigius, and S. Gregory Florentius, Archbythop of Tours: who is compared by Fortunatus, an ancient Christian Poet, to S. Gregory Nazianzene, as given to the East, and by Gregory the Great, Pope, given to the South, as he for France was to the West. It was at the same time, when Pope Gregory (having scene at Rome) not only admired him, but did him so much honor as could bee deuised, Arnold, Bythop of Metz, Hincmar Archbythop of Rheims, Lupus Abbot of Ferriers in Gaslinois, Arnold de Liffens, Fulbert & Tues, Bythops of Chartres, Sugerus Abbot of

Also Peter Lombard, bythop of Paris, so admirable in the verie day of Diuinitie, that (euen to this very day) all Christendome acknowledgeth him for her Maister.

Hee should neuer make an end, that would take on him to recite all the great men of France; not only such as haue preceded them of these times, but infinit numbers beside; whereby may bee iustly said, that Learning and the Sciences, not only receiued their ancient flourishing splendor in France; but also haue imparted themselves (as before) to all other regions of the earth. There hath bin heretofore (beside all them formerly named) one Eumenides of Marfeilles, a most wise Philosopher, who (among manie other things) made a very ferious inquisition, & learnedly wrote on the originall of Nilus. P. Terentius Varro (surnamed Atacinus, of his Countrey in Narbone Gaul, on the riuer of Atax, now called Auda, which belcheth it self into the sea at Narbona) much renowned among the Roman Poets, for making foure bookes of the Argonautes affaires, diuers Epigrams, and the Sequanes warres, recited by Pliny in many places, as also by the Grammarian Priscian.

Heere we may not forget the Philosopher Phanorinus, so highly renowned vnder the Emperor Adrians reigne: a native of Arles as Philostrophus reporteth in the discourse of his life. Nazarius the Orator, and Latinius Pacatus, Author of the excellnt Panegyricke of Theodosius. About the same time flourished Rutilius Numatianus a Poet, and Ausonius of Burdeaux, most worthy the name of a Poet, since the dayes of Augustus: diuers namelesse workes of his haue bene found, and (for their especiall deserving) haue bene attributed to be Virgils. test Lords of the Romane Empire, they were secht fro France, as we read in many places of the works of Symmachus, then Gouernour of Rome, & who sucked (himself) the milke of the Mules of France.

I forbear to speake of those strangers, who by becoming there learned, haue honored their owne countreies; though inspiring first the sweet ayre of France, and borrowed a beame from her bright splendour, to giue some lustre thereof to their places of birth. In breefe to speake truly, it is as difficult a thing, to name all the famous persons that haue flourished in France, as it is easie for other people to make a shew of all such as they haue had, which would rise to a far inferior number. Moreover, many great persons (being strangers there) hauing diligently suruayed the spirits of the French, haue found them by experienced iudgment, to be full of life, subtiltie, proper & prompt to all occasions, cleare sighted, and piercing into the Sciences; thinking it very conuenient that whereas some haue esteemed the ancient Gauls to be light and mutable, they should rather say, & very iustly, that they were tractable, apt and ready to performe any thing imposed on them whatsoeuer.

Of this minde was Julius Cesar Scaliger, an Italian, a man most learned and iudicious, who speaketh in this manner. Ilud est comprimis aduertendum, non esse cum animorum mobilitate coniuncta fidei iacturam. Gallo enim videtur ad omnia momenta vel euentuum vel disciplinarum promptos, paratos, versatiles: ut semel quicquam vel usum vel audacum, illico apud eorum ingenia & deponat & amittat nonitatem, in eo ipso penitus extemplo videtur nati atque educati. Qui animorum vigor igneus, mutuaque celerritas nulli alij nationi data est a natura. Quod incubere felicitate sese dant, optime proficiunt gnaviter exercent: mercaturam, artes, arma, litteras, eruditione, subtilitatem, candorem, eloquentiam. Omnia tamen gentium atque nationum, fide sunt maxime integra & constantia. It is a matter that well deserueth to be noted or considered, that the defect of faith is not alwayes conioyned with the mobility and lightnesse of spirit. That it must needs be so, I see that the French are prompt, ready, and tractable at all moments and occasions, be it eyther for the diuersity of accidents, or be it for the Sciences: and that in such sort, as so soone as they haue scene or heard any thing, immediately it lefeth all novelty with them, and carrieth no such matter of newes in their mindes, for it seemeth as instantly bred and borne with them. This hot and fiery vigor of understanding, and this promptitude with maturity & iudgement, hath not bin given by nature to any other Nation. On what neuer they purpose a resolution, they apply the felmes thereto very happily, profite therein most speedily, and exercise it carefully: either Merchants, Artes, Armes, Letters, erudition, subtilty, affability, freedom, and eloquence, or any thing else. And yet notwithstanding, among all nations, they are the most upright, & iustly constant of their faith and word.

Moreover, as there is nothing that doth so much civilize and sweeten manners, the study of good letters, & to win knowledge in the Sciences, which do beget in our soules all humanity and courtesie, and expelleth all rudenesse in carriage: euen so it is very true, that there are none more gracious and humane, then the French, especially towards strangers. The mildnes that is inwardly, and lodged vp in a french mans heart, makes please outward fiew and appearance in his countenance. In his forehead he carrieth a naturall franchise, and freedom in life and ciuill conuersation: all laid downe evidently, without dissembling any thing, or vying any cunning or flattery. Good iudgement was made hereof by the emperor Julian, who said; He thought himselfe most happy to meet with such good natured men, so facile & fellowsly, & yes (newer the less) without flattery.

It is a world of time since the Gauls had no mean reputation, for entertaining curteously, and liberally welcoming strangers among them. Diodorus the Sicilian highly commended the courtesie of the Gauls in this point. And Tacitus hath written particularly of the Germans, that came from the Gauls, and had merely learned it of them. And when the French name began first to appeare, Salutianus of Marfeilles gaue them the vertue, to be kinde to strangers. About all, this people hath alwayes helde Religion in singular recommendation, as being a foundation of vertue; & they haue continually bin deuoted to diuinity, euen when they had no true knowledge thereof. Cesar saith, Gallia admodum dedita religionibus. And Zinzus describing the siege of the Gauls at the Capitole, saith, that a man of the house of the Fabij, being cast down fro the

the top of the Cittadell: without dreading any thing, went to Mount * Aventine, to make an annuall and solemne sacrifice in his family, and returned to the Capitole thorough the midst of the enemies. They looked vpon him, without any violence or assailing, & suffered him to passe on; Being astonished at such resolution, as at a miracle: were it through respect and reverence to Religion, whereas (saith hee) that Nation is very carefull.

But after that the bright beames of the Gospell began to shew their splendour, it is hardly to be credited: with what fervor of soule this people embraced it, with what veneration, and (euen vpon heapes) voluntarily presented themselves to death, to testifie the zeale of their affection to Christian Religion, and seale with their blood the sincerity of their faith. On the other side, saith S. Ierom, Spaine sometime brought forth Geryon the dreadful monster. Heresies haue swarmed in most part of the earths quarters: Gaule onely hath conserved her selfe in the truth, without denouncing herselfe. But hath abounded aboate in great personages, learned, and holy in life together. Arrianisme had infected all Christendome, only France hath continued pure: for her Bishops carefully employed their paines, quickly to stifle those heresies & schismes which grew too troublesome to the church.

Whē it came so to passe, that the schisme of the Donatists exalted it selfe, and many partialities, quarrels, and hatreds by particular persons were intermingled: the Bishops that were in the faction with Donatus, required of the Emperor Constantinus, that Iudges might be sent from the Gauls, onely for their piety and learning. Wherevpon the Emperor granted vnto them 3 Bishops, Rhetimus of Autun, Maternus of Cologne, and Marianus of Arles: who went to Rome, and together with Pope Miltiades, hauing exactly lookt into the matter, decided the cause, and condemned (by their sentence) the error of the Donatists, as it is reported by Opiatus, one of the Orthodox Bishops of Africa, who hath left vs in writing the history of this schisme, & gaue his helpe to the suppression thereof.

In the year VCCCLVIII. Pope Stephen the third, entreated Pepin King of France, by his expresse Nuncio, that he would send him the very learnedst Bishops of France, to the ende, that by their authority, hee might reforme & re-establish the church, which he performed accordingly. Whereby is plainly discovered, in what esteeme and account, the learning & piety of the Prelates of France hath alwayes bene.

According to this purpose of ours, it may be very truly maintained, that Gaul, among the Prouinces most towards the West, did first receiue the Christian faith, next vnto Italy; being brought thither in the first birth and infancy of the Church. For ouer & beside the Apostle of France, S. Dionysius Areopagita, who is said to bee sent thither by S. Paul: it is certaine, that one named Crescentius, the schooller of S. Paul, did first of all preach the christian faith in Gaul, and there performed the office of a Bishop and Pastor: as is to be gathered from S. Paul himselfe, from Epiphanius, S. Clemens, S. Ierome, & Eusebius, who report, that he was sent thither by S. Peter, and that there he dyed. I set aside what our Annallists haue recounted of S. Peter and S. Phillip, that they came thither. But I may not omit what is said by Epiphanius, that S. Luke came into France, and there declared the faith of Iesus Christ.

All that can be imputed to the ancient Gauls, concerning the acte of religion, is, that they sacrificed men. But this manner of sacrifice was not particularly to the Gauls, they hauing dealt no otherwise therein, then was vsed (well neere) by all other people. The like is reported of the Scythians in general, and Mela nameth this to be the Effedones. The Carthaginians, whē there hapned among the any plague or famine, or any other publike affliction, they made their recourse to this superstition, & ordinarily bloodied the Altars of their Hercules with humane sacrifices, yea they would sacrifice their owne children to Saturne. Strabo saith, that the Lusitanians, a people of Spaine, would offer vpon their prisoners in war. And Seuerus declareth, that the Masilians, a people of Greece, & well educated, would feed a man very immeasurably for some space of time, then they would conduct him through their city, charging him with accursed execrations & imprecations; and in the end they would sacrifice him, to expiate their publike offences, and to lay on him the penalty of all their sins. Among the Grecians it was very common, not onely during the Trojan warre, of Iphigenia, sacrificed at the

the gate of Anlia; but likewise of Polexens, in the Land of Troye. Long time after, Themistocles (a little before the day of Salamina) by command of his diuinators, caused three noble Persians to be sacrificed. And about the same time, Xerxes, King of Persia, offered twelue men in sacrifice. Many examples more are there of the Grecians, declared more at large by Plutarche. What thinke ye then of the Romanes? Were not they addicted to the same superstition, and vsed the like sacrifices of humane oblations? Wee finde it faithfully set downe, that they sacrificed two Gauls, a man and a woman, to their Tutelary or household God. I cannot imagine what should be the reason, why they chose their offerings to be of that people, rather then of any other; if it were not in this respect, that they supposed they shold present a more acceptable sacrifice (in so doing) to the God of their City, then to offer any other people, whereby he might be offended, because once they had consumed Rome in cinders, and therefore they might bee iudged the more able, (afterward) to overthrow the whole Empire.

Plutarche reporteth, that they caused some of the Gauls to be buried alive, during the Consulship of Marcellus: by reason of a Gaulish warre which had happened to them, and whereof they stood in fearful doubt. And that afterward, euen till his time, they would haue celebrated the like bloody anniuersaries; which might not be permitted (it may bee for the inhumanity) and all the world to see it.

The like was put in practise at Rome, soone after the dismal day at Cannas: & the Emperor Domitian likewise sacrificed two: They had a Iupiter, signamed Lutalis, to whom they made offerings of humane blood, and of the liues of men. This Tertullian, saith was ordinarily done in his time: and Constantinus and Eusebius, who liued soone after vnder the first Christian Emperours, do affirme as much.

The often & frequent spectacles, among the Gladiators or Fencers, were they. any thing else, but euē a cruel and bloody sacrifice of many men. Nay, which was most detestable, to cause them kill one another for other mens pleasure? They were not any small number of one or two, but ordinarily five hundred, a thousand, two thousand, and three thousand, and it hath bin observed, that at such times, ten thousand haue bin thereto exposed. Let Cicero then and Plutarche cease to reprove the Gauls with this custome, seeing that they themselves, both Grecs & Romans, haue observed the same. Nay, the Grecs did far worse, for not contenting themselves with such sacrifices, they would needs know what good meate it was to feede on humane flesh, and as Pliny hath left written, to taste of all the parts of a man. If it was ill done to sacrifice a man, how much more detestable was it then, to serue in his flesh for food to the table? As for Cicero, I pardon him very willingly, for that which he said in one of his pleadings of the Gauls: because it was to serue his own cause, and for the reproofe of witnesses, which made whatsoever he saide the lesse considerable. Contrariwise also, as himselfe hath written. He may some deuide him selfe, that thinks out of mine Orations and Pleadings, to deriue any available authority of my opinion, or else a forme of testimony, by that which I haue said: Because (saith he) it was the cause that spake and not I. And yet if wee oblige more neerely, what Cesar hath said concerning this case, wee shall perceiue that the Gauls made glad sacrifices of malefactors, as thinking such an offering to be most agreeable to the gods, as (indeede) there could bee none more proper, then the iust punishment of wicked persons. And yet notwithstanding, sometimes they were contrayned to goe so farre as innocent folke, merely for the defect of other: because this opinion was noted in the, that the Gods could not be pleased, for the life and safety of one man, but by offering to them the life of another.

Howsoeuer, they deferred herein no imputation of blame, because what they did was by superstition, the excoesse of true religion, not holding it for any error, to offer to God what might bee most acceptable: which made them to present him with no noble a creature, the only perfect of all other, and so consecrated to him the most precious oblation of all oblations: wherein they are the lesse taxable for their custome (though indeed cruell) yet not proceeding so farre as other, as the Grecians, who fell voluntarily into Atheisme. Among Gods people, we see that reprob fel- lous, the sons of error, vnder the shadow of a yow & deuotion: albeit I know very well that the Hebrew Text hath no other carriage, but that he offered to God, no more but the virginity of his daughter only, & that this is the opinion and interpretation of the most learned Rabines. I passe over the abominable idolatries of the Jewes, to the Idoll Moloch, who practised the very same. Yet what hath bene said, might (perhaps) favour of some signale and sensible apprehension, or preface, that man could not be faued, but by a man himselfe: And that one day, man should bee redeemed, and brought into his former condition, by the blood and passion of a man. This haue I set downe in their excuse, it being a zeale proceeding from religion, when as then they walked in darkness, destitute of any knowledge of the true God.

Now, so far as much as I haue heretofore indifferently vsed these words, Gauls and France, Frenchmen and Gauls, as being no other then one and the same thing, whereof some may conceit very strangely; I hold it conuenient, & futable to our purpose, to deliuer a sufficient reason therefore. That which our Ancients had named Gauls or Celtica, was afterward designed by the name of France. Likewise, the Kings of France haue long time commanded in all those parts which were tearmed the ancient bounds of Gauls, betweene the Rhine, the Alpes, the Pyreneans, and the Mediterranean and Ocean Seas. These were the ancient limits of France, which also by seasons, and vnder certaine Kings, haue extended themselves a great deal further. But if any parcell thereof be at this day dismembered or cut off, that may not change the true appellation of things. Considering, that such distraction is nothing but the acte, the right alwaies remains in his perfect integrity: And as for the French, it will be auouched, that they are one selfe same people with the Gauls, on whatsoever side search be made, and the truth set downe of their originall.

I may not stay my selfe heere, to fight with the false opinion of such, who thinking to make the Gauls the more honourable, would haue them to be defended from the Troyans, because it hath bin already done by others. But it is a point so cleare and apparant, that there is no man (now adayes) so silly versed in letters; but plainly knoweth, that they are altogether meere fables and fictions. There hath bin another opinion, and pursued by many, who imagineth the French to bee come forth of Allemagne or Germany. And according to this conceit, there shall be no place of distinguishing the French with the Gauls: because it is most true to say, that Germany hath bene peopled by her neighbor Gauls. So in making the French to come from thence into Gauls, is to returne them backe to the place where they receiued their originall. For it is to be credited, that Provinces which are the most temperate, haue bin the first inhabited, & after that men are increased in multitude, they then make their recourse to more remote places, which are of ruder quality, and more subiect to cold. Beside, Cæsar himselfe (long since) testified, that the Germanes or Allemaigns, called the Gauls their Brethren: for the similitude of their manners, and the customes of both these people, reported by our ancestors, may instantly make faith for this their fraternity.

Others would fetch them from the Pannoniæ, as it is reported by S. Gregory of Tours. Now it is very certaine, that the Gauls did sometimes people both the Pannoniæ: especially at that time, as Brutus made warre in Macedon, and throughout all Greece. And the Geographers, as Stephanus, Arrianus, and Strabo, do nominate the Celtes among the people of Pannonia. There is yet another opinion, the truest and most certaine, and yet notwithstanding little enough knowne. For oftentimes (saith an ancient Writer) it cometh to passe, that the originall of great people is as much unknowne, as that of our greatest Rivers. This is that which hath bin observed by diuers passages of Sidonius Apollinaris, S. Gregory of Tours, and other neighbouring Authors, concerning the beginning of this Monarchy: that the French came from Sicambria, and that the Sicambrians are many times taken for the French.

Now we are to note, this Sicambria is not that Sicambria, which some haue vitiually seated in Francia: but it is described by ancient Geographers toward the North, wholly ioyning to the riuaiges of Rhine, as well on the one side, as the other. But more principally towards the place, where that goodly streame falleth into the Sea: a place of very difficult access, by reason of the great Marishes thereabout. Suetonius maketh mention that the Em-perour Augustus caused those valiant Sicambrians to passe on further into the firme land of the Gauls, and namely, that he gaue them * Bataua to dwell in. This he did, some way to content them, and to hinder their courses: as also to serue his owne turne with this warlike Nation, being upon the extremities or vtmost parts of Gauls. And beside, we reade in Tacitus, that there was daily at the Emperors seruice, a Sicambrian band or Cohort, highly esteemed for their valiancy.

Heereby we may know, that they are descended of the same country with the Gauls, and it is to bee credited, that these were the people onely, which neuer came into subiection of the Romane Empire, in the time of Cæsar: in regard of the difficult places, and badnesse of the country which then they held. This Sicambrian people, knowne & renowned by the name of French onely, in the time of Gallien, vnder Posthumus, one of the thirty tyrants, about the yeare of our Lord, CCLXIX. could not keepe themselves alwayes in their Northerly corner or angle of Gauls, (such as (at this day) Holland and part of Friesland are: but they made their exten-dure into neighboring countries, & continually there tormented the Romans in Gauls, after whose liberty they longed from time to time. And part of them passing into Gauls among the Romans, were there highly esteemed, and came to vnder-take the cheefest charges, as we may reade of many of them, in Ammianus Marcellinus.

Part of this people also, namely they that were transported by Augustus, continued (for long time) in obedience to the Empire, as appeareth by many examples, and Histories set downe by diuers Historians, which I may not heere recite, because (for the most part) they haue bene diligently collected by the Lord Fauhet, in his French Antiquities, where this true opinion is approved, by the passages of Zozimus, Ammianus Marcellinus, Procopius and Zonarus. At the fall of that great Empire, those inuincible Sicambrians, Francs, or French, accustomed to make ordinary courses into Gauls, perceiving the inuasion of Northerly people, as the Alans, Vandals, Bourguignons, & Goths, they could not endure, that their ancient country should remaine any longer so subiect, neither by the tyranny of Romane

Magistrates, nor by the inuasions of barbarous people. Hereupon, taking occasion, they proceeded on further into the midst of the Gauls; where they were receiued (in open armes) by their olde mother, and by the other Gauls, who ioyning with them, shooke off the yoke of the Romans, & expelled also the strange Nations, which had so insolently intruded on the.

From thence forward, both one & other named them Frenchmen, as being but one people by originall. Nor can it be conceiued, that the Sicambrian people should be enemies to the Gauls, but rather called by the as their fellowly brethren, to helpe in their enfranchizing, being receiued with the liking of euery one: as these places of S. Gregory of Tours do sufficiently shew. Inter cunctum iam terror Francorum resonaret in partibus, & omnes eos, amore desiderabili cuperent imperare, &c. Also in another place: Multi ex Gallijs habere Francos dominos sumo desiderio cupiebant. Moreover, it is to be seen in many places of the histories, written by the same S. Gregory, that the Gauls were neuer trod downe by the French; but administered in publique charges, & took part in their honors; not as a conquered people, but as companions, friends, and associates, and as making but one people. In regard whereof, a man may vfe the names of French and Gauls, & France and Gauls, being but one and the same thing. And the country euermore inhabited by the same people originallly, being neuer thence expelled, nor subiected.

A country the most happy, the most fertile, the most abounding in all things, and the most agreeable with the world, & least incommodious. The people dwelling therein, the most martiall, & warriors at all times, that the Sunne neuer beheld better. By others also commended, for all those good and vertuous qualities, wherewith any humane spirit can be adorned, quick, apt, & ready to whatsoever they apply themselves, with moderation, curtesie, and humanity, as none greater can be desired. The happiness & felicity of this Land, together with so many commendable qualities of the people, haue bene published (in some measure) by the Poet Buchanan of Scotland, when at their returne from Portugal, coming backe into France, he made these verses, which I thought fit here to insert, to serue for a conclusion of this discourse.

CHAP. III.

Of the Maieity, Dignity, and high Eminency of the Kings of France: And what infinite actions of Honour they have done from time to time, to renew the glory of that kingdom.

IT is not yet sufficient, neyther maketh it vp a perfect felicity, that France should bee filled with so much wealth and commodities,
as the earth can any way yeeld: also that the people are so generous, endued with so many commendable qualities, beside,
most humane and acceptable conversation.
If all do not correspond to this prof-perity, and that the forme of her estate & good government, is not the main height of all this happinesse. Wherein it may well be said, that France hath bene as gra-tiously fauoured by heauen, as in al other things whatsoever. There hath neuer beeene scene so many ciuill warres and factions, for change and alteration of the State, as hath often happened in many other Prouinces. After he had once tasted the Monarchall Government of one only naturall Prince (which all the greatest Philosophers, such as were brought vp in free cities, haue confessed to be the best) she neuer found any change, neyther did it euer make offer of it selfe, nor any way propofed.

France well may boast this in common, with a great part of the people of the world, that she is a Monarchall estate:
but yet this is more particular to her, that she hath suffered no mutation for so many Ages; but hath beeene inuolubly always continued in her owne Royall estate and government. And it may as truly be said, that her Kings haue excelled as much aboue others in the world, as France
it selfe hath gon beyond all other Lands.
Then to come to the paint of her Kings,
and of their Greatnesse and Excellency:
it refuseth first of all, from that which hath beeene discoursed heeretofore: Because there is no man, but will tearme that king potent, rich, and redoubtable, that com-mandeth ouer a country so fertile & well furnished: and he will also vouchsafe, that Kings commanding a people so vertuous and generous together, must needs be Pa-ragons in generosity and courage, yea, & true models of all vertue. Moreover, what other Kings can make their vaunt, to haue
so goodly, so opulent, and so happy territories, and to command ouer such a people? In like manner, what Land can say, that it hath had like Kings, and so great in all respects, as they of France haue bin?
This is in general, and the touching of this point thus were sufficient, without need of any further inquisition; because it is euident to the eyes of all men, euen as what hath bin related in our former chap.

But to discourse more particularly on their other prerogatives. First, it is a matter most constant and certaine, that the Kings of France are Soueraignes in their State, holding their kingdom but of God only, and by the Sword: this needs no other profe, because it is granted without dition. Also, they haue bene in this possession, not onely for exceeding the memories of men, or for three hundred years

a tearme more then sufficient, for establishing sure and inuolubly a Soueraigne estate, as maintained septab, chiefe of the Israelites against the Ammonites, but also for twelue hundred years. There needeth no other testimony then that of Pope Innocent the third, who speaketh it expressly in his Decretall, That the King of France acknowledged not any Soueraigne, in temporal occasions.

This was it which made so superfluous impertinent, inept, and idle, the disputa-tion so much canauazed amongst the Doctors Imperialists, to witte; Whether the King of France were subiect to the Empire, or no, and whereabouts the Doctors disputing vainly, contraried themselves, and sufficiently ouerthrew their owne iudge-ments. Peter Belluga, an ancient Spanish Doctor, in his treatise of a Prince, & Oldradus an Italian Doctour (the chiefeest of his time do maintaine; That the kingdome of France acknowledgeth not, either by acte or right, any Prince of the world.

The Emperors themselves also, haue aouched as much; declaring by diuers actes, That the King of France is Soue-raigne, & that he depended not on them in any fashion whatsoever, which will be more amply handled, in a place fitter for the purpose. To as silly effect was that, which Doctor Lopez, Madera, a Spaniard hath written; That the Kings of France doe take their Title, by a concession made vnto them by the Emperor Institian, according to the receipt of Procopius. But a man can see no sure footing, on that which is faide by a subiect to the Empire. And beside, soon after, Institian himselfe could say; That he quoted whatsoever hee had pretended to the Gauls, because he held not there any thing.
And in other places, he spake not of al
the Gauls, but onely concerning them of Provence, and the neighbouring Landes, which the Gothes held before, & which he pretended appertaining vnto him, by his conquest made of them. VVhich Lands, the Gothes hauing made ouer to the Kings of France, Institian approued the concession, and on that consideration, departed with all his rights and pretensions.

The French do not ground their grants, as the same Lopez did for Spaine; on the grant which he pretended to be made by the Emperor Honorius, to the Gothe Alaricke. They deriue their title from higher place, and not from the Romaines: who had no other right, but an vnjust inuasion by Armes. For these are the Gauls, namely, such as enfranchised themselves from the Romanes, and that by means of the French, their ancient Columenes and Compatriots: And therefore it is apparantly scene, that they haue no way vltimated by nouelty, but rather haue regained their first condition and liberty, as being reduced to their primitive nature. A matter very favorable; and a reason most impertinent among the Ciuill Lawyers. In like manner, what was more iust then that which the Romanes caried away by force of Armes, and was taken again from them by the very same meanes? But this is infallible, that the Kings of France are Soueraignes, knowne to be such, at all times and euery where, without any controuersie, or finisious contradiction.

It cannot bee so sayde of many other Kings, and namely it hath called in question the King of Spaine. For Pope Gregory maintaineth in his Register, that Spaine is parcel of Saint Peters patrimony, and is to make prouision for his Lord:
hauing therefore inuested a certain Count or Earle of all that which he had conquered from the Moores. In consequence whereof, by report of their own Spanish writers, Ramirus the first, King of Arra-gon, payed a tribute to the Popes: which his son Sanecho after continued to Pope Alexander the second. And since this subiection to the Romane Church, as from feodatories, it hath beeene acknowledged by other Kings.

VVe read that Peter the second, King of Arragon, beside acknowledgement of feodality, submitted & rendred his kingdome, by ordinary censuall (to Pope Innocent the third) of two hundred and fifty peeces of Arabian Golde, which had free course then, as appeareth by the Registers in the Patience, which were extracted and ouer-written by Ciacconius a Spanish author, who wrote the liues of the Popes, &
by diuers histories of Spaine.

In like manner, the Realmes of Sardigna and Carficia doe depend vpon the holy See, and the inuestiture of them kept in the Patience, which was made by the Pope

Pope to Peter the third, King of Arragon. In consequence whereof afterward, Jaques of Arragon, did homage liege at Valencia, betweene the hands of the Legate, in the year, MCCCCLIII.

I finde also, that Ferdinand and Alphonsus, Kings of Arragon, did make faith and homage, in the year MCCCXLV. The Islands of the Canaries, and Cape du Verd, are held in the same sort, and I reade, that Lewes of Spaine was inuested, and redred faith and hominage to the Pope, in the year MCCCXLI. being charged to pay to the Apostolical Chamber, four hundred Florins of gold, whereof Petrarch also maketh mention. And as for the East Indies and Persia, it is very certaine, that Pope Alexander the sixth, in making partage of that which was newly discovered, betweene the kings of Castile and Portugal: referred expressly to himselfe, the full power and soveraignty, by consent of both the kings, whom afterward he constituted his vassals, in all acquiesce & conquests by them made, or that should be made thence forward, as the Spaniards themselves have written. In like case, pope Julius the second, gave to Ferdinand the sixth, King of Arragon and of Castile, the kingdom of Granada, which hee had conquered from the Moores: with this charge, to hold it of the Roman Church, in faith and homage.

All these feodall acknowledgements and subiections of the estate of Spaine, as well in generall as in particular, are no matters of novelty. For before them, and during the reignes of the Gothes: the kings always payed tribute to the holy See, in acknowledgement of soveraignty: untill that a tyrant named Vitiza, a little before the ruine made by the Sarrazins, refused to pay it. And afterward by the generall iurisdiction of Spaine, having bin wholly discontinued by Pope Gregory the seventh complained thereof in his Register, as is well observed by the worthy Cardinal Baronius. Which may be the cause, that each particular king, beginning to strengthen himselfe against the oppression of the Sarrazins, would returne againe to the duty of his submission, and ancient subiection.

On the other side, it is found recorded, that the kingdom of Castile is in Fief to France. For Henry the second, King of Castile, submitting himselfe to Charles the first, king of France, promised as well for himselfe, as for his successors, to be vassall, and to hold his kingdom of Castile, of the Kings of France, by a treaty in the year MCCCCLXIX. which is kept in good forme in the Treasury of France. This king of Castile, being expelled thence by his Brother Don Peter, was at length re-established there againe, by power from the king of France, vnder conduct of that valiant knight, Bertrand de Guescline, Constable of France, notwithstanding all the efforts of the English, banded to the contrary.

There is another notable quality, which is no meane advantage vnto the Realme of France, in that it is, and euermore hath beene successiue hereditary, and not elective. And like as by generall custome, in all succession in the Realme, death seizeth on the liuing: euen so this taketh place, & is observed so much the more certainly, for succession in the State. Not vnlike compared to the golden branch in Virgil, which being pluckt away, another springeth vp instantly, so that there is neuer any defallance.

Pro amulo non desit alter.

Whence arose the common saying among the French, That the King neuer dyeth. Because that there is alwayes (naturally) another of the same kinde, who (without any controuersie or difficulty) succeedeth at the same instant in the others place. And when as France happeneth to be ouer-trauailed and pressed by potent enemies, euen to the losse of her King; yet it causeth no confusion or disorder, neither giueth any advantage to the enemy, or can he (by such an accident) vsurpe vpon the State. It hath beene proued (to the cost of some) like vnto a reuiuing Hydra, not to bee firmest; or rather as a Phoenix, that reiumeth another out of herselfe. Also, that the Kings of France were truly bred of an immortal race, neuer parting from hence, to returne to the true place of their celestiall and diuine original; but they left a successour, who (in the same moment) is made King, without any other formality.

But to render their succession the more assured, & (therby) the kings immortal, it hath hath alwayes beene receyued in France, that such as are of the blood-royall, although they or hee should stand farre off by a thousand degrees: yet notwithstanding, if there be not any other that is neerer, they or hee are called to the succession of the kingdom, and possessed thereof, onely by the others decease, without any other contradiiction; which hath beene well observed by Baldus, an Italian Doctor, and hath euermore bene so continued, euen to the person of the King nowe happily reigning, to bee descended from the King, called Saint Lewes. Si in Francia moreretur toto domus Regia, extaret vnus de sanguine antiquo, puta de domo Bourbonie, & non esset alius proximior, esto quod esset millesimo gradu, tamen iure sanguinis, & perpetua consuetudinis, succederet in Regno Francorum. Item Guliel. Benedicti, in Cap. Raynuitus in ver. duos habens, Num. 78.

Agathias the Greek, who wrote in the time of Iustinian, observed the same also, saying, Amongst the French, Children take the kingdom, by succession to their Fathers. And in another place, hee saith and reciteth, That Theobert King of Metz, being deceased, his sonne Theudibaldus, or Thibault succeeded him, although hee was but an infant. But (saith hee) it was the Lawe of the Countrey that called him thereto. Assuredly a most wise institution, especially, for the representation of succession to infinite ages: to obuiate disorders, inconueniences, and ouerthrowing an Estate, which may happen during a vacancy, and when the successor is vncertaine.

Before I passe any further, I may heere tell you, that such succession in a kingdom hath not alwayes beene in Spaine. And there needeth no other proofe thereof, but the confession or acknowledgement of Spanish Authors; and particularly, of Lopez. Madaga, who wrote in the Spanish tongue, and yet but little for the dignity of the Kings of Spaine. For we find, that the Kings were ther established by election, not onely during the kingdom of the Gothes; but also, after that they were ruined, and in the invasion of the Sarrazins. Relagius, king of the Asturians, & (after him) many other his successors, came by the very same means, as is exactly approved by Molina a Spanish Authour. In a word, all that Lopez produceth, is, that the Kinges were elective: but yet, that none were at any time elected, excepting that they were of the Family and House-Royall.

The contrary appeareth, by the certaine sequels of Histories, and namely by the Councils of Toledo, who permitted, that the election should be made indefinitely of all persons; except of Slaues, strangers, and others, that were not of the race of the Gothes. Wherein (it may be) an equiuocation is made, when as Lopez sayth, Decadem gente: the interpretation beareth, Of the Family and House-Royall, and not of the Nation of the Gothes, as the Councils vnderstood it. Therein also were many constitutions, for the honour and consuetudine of such as were of the race of the precedent Kings: it being a matter necessary to assure them in that manner, because there were other Kinges of their house. For whom there needed no such provision, nor search for such assurances, if the Kings should haue bene successiue. But yet much more by the fifth Council of Toledo, there is denounced a curse and excommunication agaynst such as shall come to the kingdom of the Gothes otherwise then by election. As we read in Ritsius, one of their owne Historians, that Bamba a labouring man was made king of Spaine by Pope Leo, and approved by the election of the people.

It neuer hath bene so in France, where the right of succession hath euermore bin inuolubly kept: There, the Race-Royall which surpasseth the rest in greatness and vertue, are borne and defenyed to reigne.

Nor was it without good cause, that in Greece they made fo exact an inquisition and search for such as were of the Linage of Heracles, and of the Acades, to make them Kings, Captains in warre, and Gouernours of estates. Plato, and nexte to him Aristotle, are of opinion, that Monarchy is indeede the best forme of Government: Veret not as a dream (say they) to find a good king. As thinking it a matter impossible for a humane spirit, in fo great a fortune, affluence of so many goods and delights, and such liberty without contradiction; and in so supreme a power, to keepe in, and command ouer his owne passions. Plato addeth, Wee liue not in the Commonwealsh of Bees, where naturally one is bred much greater and better, to command over all the other. And yet the very same happeneth to the French, whose Kings come from their very birth, more great (not of body) but of courage, generosity, and understanding, then all the rest: borne and esteemed (by heaven) of another nature, then any common person to reigne.

Would we but a little consider the great difficulties and inconveniences, which are noted in an elective estate, by reason of such forme of election we should the better know, what an advantage, excellency, and prerogative France hath. In an estate elective, the death of the Prince happening, there is an interregnum, during which time, it falls into Anarchy, which causeth disorder, vnrulinesse, and confusion; whereon ensue infinite evils, murders, assassines, violences and theses. As hath beene well obserued in those elections, made for the Kings of Thunis, & the Soldanes of Egypt by the Mammelukes. Nay, and hath sometimes happened at the election of Popes, in Sede vacante.

And which is yet farre worse, the interregnum sometimes lasteth for many dayes, because, beside vnder-handed suites and made factions, there is an naturall inclination to dissention in men. As hath oft bene seene to happen in the Empire of the East, after it yielded it selfe to be elective: And in the Realmes of Hungary, Polonia, Bohemia, Denmarke, and Sweden. During these interregnums, nothing happeneth but schismes, diuisions, and many menacings of diuers persons, which ordinarily do draw on ciuill warres, every one courting to haue a Prince of his partaking, or as he would haue it.

It hath also bene obserued in the Empire of Germany, that many Emperors haue bene elected, vntill they haue had seuen or eight at a time, as after the death of the Emperour Fredericke the second. And there could no sufficient remedy be found, for the establishing of a Government, that might haue commanded in the meane while; because about the election of that Governour, there grew on still the same inconueniences. And perhaps it might haue so fallen out, that the Governour being seized on the estate, would attend no other election, as some haue done heretofore: finding but few men, that will render vp so great an engagement,

Moreover, it cometh so to passe sometimes, that such as haue the right to elect Princes, will deliuer forth some apparances of credence to themselves to haue them murdered and massacred, if they please them not, or else by corruption leaue them and elect some other. Hereof the Roman Empire can furnish vs with sufficient examples, and that it neuer was more calme, then when her Princes came to the Empire by succession. On the contrary, when the election was in the Soldiours hands, they set the Empire to sale, and filled all the State with rapines, theses, murders, cruelties, and barbarous brutishnesse. When an Emperour pleased them not, were he the most vertuous man and the best Prince in the world; they would massacre him, without any difficulty, and establish another; as it befell to the good Emperour Pertinax, after whose murder, they caused it to bee published through the City, that the Empire was to be sold to the fairest offerer.

In like manner, they murdered Alexander Severus, one of the best and most vertuous Princes that euer was. And so they dealt with Probus, Tacitus, and many more, as may bee gathered by the sequell of Histories from time to time. Yet this is not all, each Legion and each Army made his Emperour, all which (in the end) had their throates cut, after cruell ciuill waies: the poore people enduring all this while, infinite miseries, and there are obserued (in that time) well neere thirty, among whom there was two women.

These inconueniences were ordinary (inciently) in the estate of Spain. S. Gregory of Tours saith: Sumptuosa Gothorum decessibilibus consuetudinem, ut si quis de regibus non placuisset, gladio eum adpererent: Et qui libuisset animo, hunc sibi statuerunt Regni. The Gothes had taken this detestable custome, that if any one of their Kings did not please them, they would murder him, and establish whosoever falleth into their fantasie, to be their King. This he wrote concerning Thendos, Thendogiles, and Agilas. And in Germany, after that this order of election got footing there, there were eight or nine Emperors slain; as William of Holland, Raoull, Albert, Henry the VVith these wee could ranke many equall, and equally worthy, growing one ly through hatreds and discontentment: from whence haue proceeded diuisions and seditions; so that the choise and preferring of one man, hath proued the viceroy contempr of another. And questionlesse, it will be very hard for him that hath bene refused, intirely to be obedient to him with whom hee hath contested for the royall authority, as his equal in house, reputation and merit.

Happy France, and truly happy, where-to God hath giuen the grace, to breathe but one acceptable libertie, vnder the sweet command of thy naturall and successiue Kings: which hath bene thy warrant from ruine, dangers, & deadly tempests, and hath kept thy State alwaies flourishing, yea, in full strength and vigor.

Amongst other inconueniences that may be met within an elective estate, this is one: A Prince elective will neuer bee careful of the state, which he holdeth but by entreaty, or at other mens liking, but of his owne family. For knowing well, that he cannot leaue the kingdome to his children, he makes his profite of the publicke purse, deriuing and turning it to his own particulars, by venditions and other alienations. According as Rodolfe of Habsbourg did, who coming to bee elected Emperour, by the fauour of his Master Elector, the Arch-Bishop of Magunce, founded & built vp the house of Austria upon the ruines of the Empire. Euen so farre, as to sell at prices of money, her freedoms and Seigneuries to Citties of Italy; as to Florence for six thousand crowns, and to Lucara for ten thousand, and so to other in like manner. Which proued to be the end of the kingdom and command of the Emperors in Italy: in regard whereof, he was highly blamed by all the Historians of those times, and by such as haue written euer since.

I forbear to speake of many other Emperours, who practised in the same manner, and alienated the hereditary patrimony of the Empire, Citties, Townes, Territories, and Seigneuries, as well in Germany, as in Italy, and other places. And by this means, diuers Principalities established, and great cities franchised, beare now no more but the bare name of soveraignty for the Empire. Also it is to bee credited, that a Prince doing what he can, will ouerthrow all, yet not toptic turly: but will mingle as one faith/ heaven with earth, but he will make his issue to succeed, so strong and mighty is this passion. Few or none are found to follow the example of Moses, who knowing and acknowledging his finnes to bee incapable to command the people of Israel after him; rather chose to establish another, as preferring the weale publike, before affection or charity to his owne. It is recorded, that the Emperour Charles the fourth, promised an hundred thousand crowns to each one of the Princes Electours, to haue his sonne Wenceslaus elected emperour; and being vnable to pay them, hee was constrained to giue ouer to them the ordinary reuenues of the empire in payment.

The case is quite contrary in France, where the inheritance and patrimony of him that cometh to the crowne by succession, accrue and reuinteth it selfe (by the same means) to the crowne. In regard whereof, the Kings haue not two kinds of inheritances, the one particular, and the other publike for all cometh of one and the same nature, & all is made publike. Wherein is discerned the full effect, of that which the emperour Antoninus Pius said to his wife. Seeing (sayeth he) that we are come to the Empire, wee haue lost that which we had before.

But although this kingdome bee successiue in this manner, by the inuoluable custom of the country, rather then by hereditary right; yet notwithstanding, women, and the descendants of them in that kind, neuer haue bene, neither euer can be admitted, no nor in the defect of Males. VVithout reason, some enemies to the French name, and enuious (to speake truly) of this prerogative; would strue to call in doubt the Salique Law, which rejecteth women from succession in the kingdome, saying, that the original therof is doubtfull and vncertaine. As if a man can desire a better and more certain prooffe, then the successiue and possession of so many hundred yeares, since the settled led establishment of that estate. That law hath bene engraven, not in Marble or Copper, but in the hearts of Frenchmen and alwayes certainly kept.

Lopez, Madera in his Epig. lib. 3. cap. 3.
Lopez, Madera the Spaniard, seeing that the like could not be in Spaine, and that the dignity was much lesse, to cover the defect, and bring some shadow for it, labourerth to prouoe, by stretching out a long discourse, that the succession of women is very naturall. This carryeth good reason in matter of succession for Patrimony in particulars. In which case (nevertheless) we can shew, that the successions by right (well neere of all people) hath alwayes bene referred to the Males: who are as firme pillars and Anchors of assurance to great Families. But in the succession of a mighty estate or kingdom it were a mockery for the French to imagine, that the maintaining of womens succession could be the better. There is verie great difference (sayde the Emperour Adrian) betweene the search of an heire of my patrimony, and a successor in an Empire.

Moreover, it were superfluous to goe seeke for the originall of this Salique law, and enquire any further, when or how it was made; because it appeareth of a certaine vie, and that it hath alwayes bin kept by the French. Law hath no force, if it be not by custome, which is the very strongest Law of all other. And it may well be sayde, that it is a right of great authority, when it hath bene obserued so strictly: as there is no neede of reducing it to a law by writing.

It is no written Law, but borne with them, neither haue they inuented it, but suckt it from nature her selfe, who gaue it them by instinct, & so instructed them: which not only the French, but most part of the people of the world, haue likewise most religiously obserued. If we look vpon royalty and imitation of government general in the world, by the Soueraigne vinity, from the very first birth, that is to say, when the world tooke beginning, we shall find, that the first fathers of families gaue command in their houses themselves and not by their wiues, and that the male children succeeded them in the soueraignty of the Family, whereas the Daughters passed to another house, without hauing any part there.

Whence came it, that all people (in the first ages) were governed by Kinges, (not of many Prouinces) but of a Citie, or small territory only, which had bene before but the inclosure of a father of a Family? As is to be seene, as well in holy Writ, as by the ancient histories of each Countrey. That which great Aristotle so faithfully interpreted of nature, hee hath well acknowledged. In the beginning (saith hee) Townes and Citties were governed by Kinges, as now adays people and strange Nations are. For they were composed of people that liued vnder Royalty: each Family being governed by the most ancient. So women could not come to the Royaltie; neyther hold part in the succession of particulars. Contrarywise, Fathers of the family receiued commoditie by rich gifts and presents which were given them, by such as made request for their daughters: as wee read in holye Writ, of the Father, Mother, and Brethren of Rebecca, the wife to Isaac, and as (at this day) it is a common right among all strange people, as well of the East, west, and South, where it is obserued in the same sort.

Aristotle reporteth, that the ancient Greeks did buy their wiues: whereof (as yet) we haue the testimony of Homer. But since the prime simplicity & good nature of men forlooke and gaue them ouer, iustice and peace withdrawing themselves: while in this truly Iron Age) all began to grow more strong, without any right or iustice, and that ambition (a most pestilent disease) ranne currant in the hearts of men: that goodly order became peruered and ouertrowne: when the most mightie, such as the Scripture reporteth, as of Nimrod and others, of Sennacherib, Nebuchadonazar, and Cyrus, troubled the quietnes of their neighbours, and inuaded their lands. So, on the ruine of a great number of small estates, mightie Empires and Monarchies grewe to bee grounded, and gaue command both in length and largeness.

In this inuasion, confusion, & ouertrowing of kingdomes, as also particular and naturall Principalities, some also mounting vp against their Soueraignes: in stead of naturall Royalty, brought estates to popularity or Oligarchy. Afterward in regard of these disorders thus happening, the greater part of the people being not willing to liue so: became at length constrained to render themselves to their owne nature, & return to the good government of kings, to enjoy their former iustice. To the ende that the weakest might bee in as safe security as the strongest, and y which pertained to euery private person, might peaceably be possessed, and defended by their kings, against the violence of neighbors which were 2 principall functions, that incited wading people to reunite & submit themselves to kings. VVherin Aristotle also hath placed the definition of royalty, to wit: As well to render iustice, as to defend the subject from inuasion of enemies. Such were the Iudges that governed the Estate of Israel, before the establishment of kings. Wherto is referred that which Herodotus said: That the Medes would haue Deioes to bee their Kings to the end to render iustice. Be it then, that we regard the first original and naturall institution of kings, or be it the establishment of great Monarchies: yet it is doubtles, that women neither could or can be any participants. And as for the last institution of kings, for recourse of people, to the ende, they might be defended against violence, & to enjoy iustice: we plainly perceiue, this could neuer agree with the naturall disposition of women; because the vertue of pudicity reiecteth the from those functions, of iudging people, & defending them by Armes. And if in popular and Oligarchall Common-weals, women haue alwayes bin barred from government, and enterming with the publike affaires: by much stronger reason: then they ought to bee frō Royalty, in as much as that forme of State is more excellent then the other. It hath bin obserued throughout all the Monarchies, euer pursuing the right of nature. And during fabulous times, if ther be found a Semiramis among Assyrians; yet that breaketh not the rule. Considering the story it selfe saith, that to bring her purpose to passe, she disguised herselfe in the habit of a man: and was taken, not for Semiramis, but for her Son Ninus. And thereby it appeareth, that the Assyrians did not willingly endure the dominion of a woman, as Lopez Madera fondly suppoeth. Contrarywise we read, that Caused the ruine of their Monarchy, was, when Sardanapalus (their last King) imitating the manners, fashions, & behavior of women, offended men so much, that by a iust indignation, for so many men to bee subiect to such a woman, who had no more but the forme of a man; they revolted from him, and contrayned him to kill himselfe.

Women then are not capable of succeeding in the kingdome of France, as we haue already approoued, that in ancient times (ordinarily) they were not. For out of the fabulous times, there is obserued only a Queene of Saba, and a Cleopatra in Egypt, and so few beside; that their rarity declareth, how contrary a thing it is, violent, and extraordinary to nature. Since the declination of the race and Empire of Charlemaigne only, we haue seene in some parts of the West, where valour & virility hath failed or relaxed: soueraigne swords and scepters conuerted into distaffes, and by the succession of women, many the like indignities haue met together in one body. This was that which rayled the houses of Spaine and of Anitria, to the greatnes they hold: a kinde of encreasing vknown before, in any other house or souerainty, because there was no right at all.

When then the Spaniards demand of the French, the prooue and foundation of the Salique Law; it is fit for themselves to shew the original and beginning of the right for their feminine Crownes, seeing France hath kept the vie of Antiquity, & they haue falne to change among themselves. VVhich hath bin heretofore obserued and discoursed, by Seigneur LeThouffier, in his Tract of the right of Nature: where he sheweth, that by the right of nature, women stand exempted from succession in the Realm of France. I remember the answer which Licurgus made to one, who discoursed, that the government of many was the best forme of an Estate. Bring it first of all (quoth he) into thine own house. In like manner, to such as will maintain the government of women in kingdomes and great Empires, especially in France: a man may well say, let them begin that establishment in their owne houses. It is by good reason saide, that there is neyther beginning nor writing found for the Salique Law. It is a Law of nature, borne with men, and not written, as Aristotle saith: That whosoeuer is by right of nature, & by right of people, is not written at all. Wherto I may adde moreover, that it is the common right of inheritances, which ought by stronger reason to be obserued in Royalty, as being the last and most eminent title of inheritance, and whereon dependeth all the other. So then this right, so naturally, hath euermore beene exactly kept in the estate of France.

Beside, the ancient lawes of the Salians, will not permit, that any part of Salique land or inheritance (that is to say, of lands distributed to the French, in their entring to the Gauls) shall come into the hands of women: but willeth, that it bee wholly left to the males. The same is also ordained in the law of the French Ripnarians. If this then tooke place in the succession of particulars, that the lands assigned vnto the French warriors, for recompence of their cruauales, and to serue for defence of the Country, should not fall (as one faith) from the Lance to the Distaffe: by how much greater reason then ought we to esteeme, that this should be obserued, in the estate and succession of the kingdom of France, as the sequell of her owne Histories maketh knowne, that it hath bin at all times so held and practised there?

The great Louis or Chlovis had foure Sonnes, who by custome (then) receiued and diuided his Monarchies equally. Childebert the eldest, was king of Paris; Chlothaire of Saizon; Chlodamere of Orleans, and Thierry of Mets. Childebert had two Daughters, the one named Chrodeinda, and the other Chrosberga, as appeareth by the Charter of exemption, of the Abbey of S. Germaine des Prez, and by that which Fortunatus, Bishop of Poitiers hath written in his Poems, who addeth, that King Charibert was Tutor to those two daughters. Neuertheless, neither of them succeeded in the kingdom of Childebert: their Father: but without all further dispute, it was Chlothaire their Vnkle, as hath in like manner bin obserued by Agathias the Greeke. Afterward, Charibert the son of Chlovis, had three daughters also, without leauing any male-child: the one was married to a king of Denmark; the second named Berthelede, of whom Fortunatus made an Epigram; and the third, called Chrodeinda, entred Religion in the Abbey of S. Croffe in Poitiers: so that none of these daughters succeeded their Father, but Sigebert, brother to the deceased king, & that without difficulty or controuersie.

Now if there had bin any means or subiect to worke vpon, it is not to be thought, that the king of Denmark, who had married one of the daughters, could otherwise haue bin removed. Or if he had bin impeached by power, at least he would haue complained, & the authors of those times could not forget to make mention of it. But they not making any account of the daughters, do report, that Sigebert succeeded his brother Charibert, according to the custome of the Country. Gonthram, King of Bourgongne, brother to Charibert, had but one only daughter, named Chlothilda. And yet notwithstanding he inuested and inlinited his Nephew Childebert in the kingdom of Bourgongne, to enioy it after his death. It is not here to be obeyed, that hee did it for any ill will he bare to his daughter, or because hee would disinherit her: For by an acte of accord or agreement, made with his Nephew Childebert, transcribed at large by S. Gregory of Tours, who liued in those very times, he stipulated great Lands and Seigneuries for her, declaring well therein his fatherly affection; but because the law of France hindered her succeeding in the Crowne, he aduantaged her otherwise as he found the best means to do. The same may be confirmed by the testimony of many strangers, who do all agree in this point, that women are not to succeed in the kingdom of France: the names of whom, as also their authorities, haue beene (for the most part) noted, and collected by a learned man of this time, in an Epistle which he hath written concerning this subiect.

Nodgerus, Bishop of Liege, in the life of S. Landolsde, written by him in the yeare VCCCCLXXX. faith, *Francorum Regni a sui principio semper per infatigabile, &c. Maximu autem accepit incrementu & firmu sub eo sancta Dei Ecclesia statum, cum Chlotharius Rex IVSTA SPCESSIONE, Chlodowes quartus Monarchiam singulariterium regabat regnorum. The kingdom of France fro her beginning, hath euermore bin inuincible and indefatigable, &c. But the holy Church of God hath taken a great and firme encreasing in that State, when as king Chlotharius, the fourth Son of Chlovis was Monarch BY IVST SPCESSIONE of three kingdoms. He faith by iust succession, and yet notwithstanding, Childebert had left two daughters behinde him.*

linea successisse dicitur. Neuer hath any person succeeded in France by the line of women.

The Emperor Charles the fourth, Son to Iohn, king of bohemia, in his life it is thus written. Eodem Anno obiit Carolus Francorum Rex relicta uxore pregnant, quae peperit filiam. Et cum de consuetudine regni filia non succedat, prouersus est Philippus, filius Iocri mei in regem Francia. That yeare (saith he) died Charles, king of France, leauing his wife great with child, who was deliuered of a daughter. And because by the custome of the kingdom, daughters are not to succeed: Philip, Sonne of my Father in law, was made king of France.

Froissard a partaker with England writeth thus. Then after the death of K. Charles, the 12 Peeres and Barons of France, assembled themselves together at Paris, with all respect they could make and gane the kingdom (by a common consent) to Mesire Philip de Valois, and tooke it from the Queene of England her Son, who was left Sister germane to king Charles, by this respect and reason; because they said, that the Realm of France was of so great nobility, as it ought not to go by any means to a Female. And indeed, the Q. of England, and Edward her Son, would not go to the contrary: but acknowledged Philip de Valois for legitimate successour to the kingdom. And that which is more, Edward voluntarily did him homage, in regard of the Dutchy of Cuyenne, and the acte of homage was deliberated and aduised by his counsell of England.

Now as concerning that which hapned some while after, warre being moued betwene the two kings, for another cause and enmity excited among the, that Edward tooke on him the Name and Armes of France: this was only done by the inuention of the Flemings, who saide, that they could not aide him, except he would qualifie on himselfe, the name of King of France: because they stood bound by oath, not to beare Armes against the K. of France, on paine of paying two millions of Florens. So that in taking Armes for him against Philip de Valois, and to take the felues of that payment; Edward gaue them a discharge and quittance, as being K. of France. And yet notwithstanding, the K. of England made difficulty of vnderstanding it, hauing attempted war vpon another subiect, as being Vicar of the Empire, and for recouering the towne of

Cambray, which the King then held. But in the end, to haue the helpe of the Flemings, & their allies, who were most important vpon him: he was induced to take the title of king, & the Arms of France, as may more particularly be seene in the sequell of the history set down by Froissard.

Eliuan de Caribuy y Gamaillon, a Spaniard, speaketh of the very same, saying. Porque Philip Conde de Valoes descendida de la corona Real por linea masculina: fue coronado por Rey di Francia por virtud de la Ley Salica. Al key Eduardo por descender de linea de muger, exluyeron de la successon Real, &c. Aunque todas ellas razones de Eduardo, quando y se cielen los Francieses con Leys Salica, que en ellos dize y a comendo grande rigor y fuerca para los siglos futuros. Because Philip, Count of Valois, descended of the Crowne Royall by the masculine line: he was crowned King of France by vertue of the Salique law. For king Edward, being descended by the Mothers line, he stood excluded from the Royall succession, &c. And all the reason alledged by Edward, were euaded & excluded for the French by the Salique Law, which in those daies was in great force, and continueth also for future times.

Doctor Baldus on the Pandecks faith. Filia Regis Francorum non succedit in regno, ex rationabili consuetudine Francorum. The Daughter to the K. of France, succeedeth not as all in the kingdom, by a reasonable custome among the French. Which is also confirmed by Doctor Petrus Iacobi, on the booke of Fiefs or Inheritances, & many other Doctors. This may (by good right) bee registered among the honors, dignities & preeminences of France. And such as contend against it, as willing to impugn such a Law, or call it in doubtfull question; do slenderly conceiue, that the state of their owne Country could neuer pretend, nor attribute vnto it selfe such a prerogative.

The King of France hath also this great aduantage about others, that he is not on ly Soueraigne, but likewise absolute, with full power & authority truly Royall; which is not common to all Princes, although they be Soueraignes. There are very few or none, but are restrained, eyther by lawes, or by assemblies of the generall Estates: who therefore cannot reame themselves absolute, being so subiected, & their power limited. The perfection & height of a royall estate, is, when the Prince ordaineth daineth all by his owne will, doth what he would, without any restriction, and being no way answerable for any of his actions. This was the reason, that Aristotle elegantly named such an estate, by the name of tyranny, as one would say, Full and perfect Royalty. And wife Salomon speaking of a true king indeed, faith; He will do what he neuer pleaseth him. Where the word of the king is, there is power; and who shall say unto him, What dost thou? This is also of no meane importance for the good government of an estate; be it to resolve more certainly on the affaires; be it to keepe counsels & designs secret; be it for facility, promptitude, and speedines of execution. He that hath such power, especially in actions of war, as the two great warriors Alexander and Cesar had, may sway the Empire of the world. One of them being demanded, how in so short a time, hee had made so many famous conquests: It was (quoth he) by neuer deferring occasion, or using remissnesse. And the other was so prompt & ready, as many times he was at his iournies end with his Army, before any newes was heard of his comming. Yea, and in such sort, as enemies felt his fingers, before they tooke aduice for his comming. Nor can this be done, if a man depend vpon another, in any manner whatsoever, & the his power is not absolute. The Romanes tooke good acknowledgement hereof, being wont in their very greatestt affaires, & dangers of the estate, were it in peace or war, to create a Magistrate, whom they called Dictatour, with such full power & absolute authority. In breefe, for the government of great estates, and likewise of great affaires, the account can neuer be well rendered, except it be to one man only. Otherwise, a Prince, although a Soueraigne, can neuer say, as Metellus Numidicus, and as it was after vied by king Lewes the 11. That if he thought his thirt knew his counsell, he would tear it from his backe and burne it. He that is truly an absolute king, may well vte the aduice of his counsell, in such affaires as present themselves: but in an arrest and resolve, what seems good to himselfe. The excellency of that kingdom, as also of her kings, refuteth yet from two other considerations. One is the long continuance of the estate: a certain prooffe, as well of her good government, as of the supreme and celestiall fauor. The other, is the antiquity of her race of kings: for to speake truly, there is not any more worthy, no nor more generous blood in the world. Who can in all the kingdoms through the Vniuers, shew another the like estate, as firm and stable, as hath continued for 1200. yeares? Who can nominate such a nobility & ancientnes of race, so fairly approued, and in so long succession of so many kings. Since the year 440. according to most certaine History, Meroneur planted the foundation of that Monarchy, and established it to the Gauls: & euen to this instant, the estate hath bin alwaies maintained, and valiantly stood against all violent assaults. In such sort, as the more it hath bin attempted, yea, in very dangerous extremities, then found the her selfe strongest, and more flourishing then before. There is not any thing comparable to such a succession of kings, in all other Realmes, as it will be easily verified.

Moreover, the noblenesse, dignity, and greatnes of that royall race, hath received no diminution by those two changes, which historians haue there observed. Let not Lopez Madera alledge then, that such changes hapned, because France would not admit the regiment of women. For if we regard the side & line feminine, though the succession be not therein; three races finde themselves all vnited with the other. The second of Pepin with the first, as some Chronicles of those times do proue. And that of the Capets which is the third, and reigneth at this present happily with the second, as M. Guillaume de Nangis hath deduced the Genealogy. The which Pope Innocent the 4. in his Decretale, speaking of king Philip Augustus, full well acknowledged, when he aouched that king to be descended of the race of Charlemaigne.

But beside this, there are other faithfull Authors, who do declare, that the second race is ioynd to the first, by the males side, prouing from father to sonne, that Pepin was descended in direct line by the males, of Chlodion, K. of the French, before Meroneur, as issued from Albericus, one of the sonnes of Chlodion. And as for the third race, the true originall thereof, was in that noble and so ancient house of Saxony, & of great Fritichind, king of the Saxons, who made himselfe Christian with his people, & came to dwell in France, in the time of Charlemaigne. He was descended of Sigwardus,

Since which time, the kingdom hath alwaies bene in the hand of that generous and flourishing Lineage, excelling still more and more, and reigning to perpetuity.

Next hereunto, there cometh also to our consideration, the admirable and heroyicall virtues of the kings of France, which hath mounted their glory vp vnto heauen, & made them known through all the Cantons of the earth. But to forbear the most ancient warriors, the affright & terrout of the Romanes, Afcariens, Gaisio, Marcomir, Sunno, Mellauboder, and Chlodion: what a warrior was Meroneur, the founder of that Monarchy in Gaule? This was the man, who (in despite of the Romanes, and such a mingle-mangle of barbarous people, scattered and dispersed by the Gauls) planted there his Standards, and made himselfe absolute Lord of one part. And as for Attila, king of the Hunnes, that caused himself to be cald, The scourge of God: he came to rauage France, as hee had done all other Prouinces where hee had past. The wife Aetius, Gouvernour to what then remained of the Romanes in Gaule, was perswaded, that he was not able, nor all the barbarous people releaged with him, so endure the furious and tearfull shock, of that huge thunderbolt of war. But made his recourse to the verue of the French, and to their great Meroneur, to fight against the furious entrance of the Huns. Wherein he had good success, for the pride of Attila was soone reba-ted on the Cathalanian plaines, by great Meroneur, who put to the edge of the sword, that dreaded masse and number of enemies.

Alas, there is no roome here, in a work of no larger circumference, to recount the goodly deeds, and actes heroyically, well deseruing eternall memory, of all the kings that haue reigned in France: for many great volumes can hardly containe them. So high an ascending lubiect, deferred to meete with such Writers, as can as worthily set down in writing, what these kings did boldly and virtuously performe. Beside, the abundance of matter, and dignity of the subiect, would afford them scarcity of ground, and trouble them with a thousand difficulties. It is a subiect much more great, then the wars and encounters of petty Townes and Villages in Greece, banded the one against the other: which neuertheless, by the learning & eloquence of such, as haue attempted to write thereof, are become so much celebrated, and thought worthy of immortality. But Frenchmen, who haue established this Monarchy, contending themselves with the glory and honour of well doing, care little for any pride of the Pen, adding themselves rather, to execute high & hardy enterprizes, then to set down in writing those of others, much lesse of themselves.

Neuertheless, though destitute of such exquisite meanes, whereby to mount to immortality: yet it hath so well falne out, that all their faire actions haue not bin vterly buried, nor forgotten. But in stead of a worthy Historiā, admiration hath thrust into the mouths of all people, to know and speake of them; deliuering it so from hand to hand, euen to such as dwell in the remotest Climates, familiarly acquainting them with their manners. And indeede, there are to be found more testimonies of French vertue, in the Histories, Memories, and Annals of strangers, then in their owne. I will therefore leane that labour to others, that can better acquit themselves thereof, if I touch any thing, it shall bee but in my passage along, and onely to make a light demonstration.

It hath bin observed for an ancient saying, That all the good kings might be enclosed within the Beasall or Colles of a small king. But this saying cannot hold in France, & hath euermore met with good kings, most excellent and most vertuous: having bin always happy therein, as in all other things. I will call then vnto you diuine spirits, & generous soules, who haue sometime swayd that Monarchy; to the ende, that being put on by your inspiration, I may, if not worthily sing your merits, yet (at least) figure forth to life some part of them.

Next to Great Meroneus, who first established himselfe in France, repulsed the Hunnes, and ouercame King Attila, the horrour and the whippe of the world, account is to be made of that Chlouis or Louis, who possessed himselfe thoroughly of the Gauls, and vterly exterminated the Romanes name. This was the quayer of the Romanes and Germanes, and he that expulled so quickly the Goths beyond the Pyrenean Mountaines, and made them thinke, that hardly could they get ground enough to flie away vpon, or where to hide themselves from his victorious arm. The Goths hauing offended him many times, and broken all agreements made: this Prince vnderooke war against them, to chastise them, and purge the Gauls of such a people, as eagerly followed the error of Arrius, and laboured to plant it euery yeare.

Chlouis or Louis that drove the Romanes quite out of Gaule, & made the Gothes to flie beyond the Pyrenean Mountain.

When as the two Armies were met together, somewhat neere to Poitiers, the battaile was giuen, wherein the Goths were wholly ruined, and driuen away in rout. Historians do adde heere to, that the King of the Goths, being named Alarick, was met withall in the fight by King Chlouis, and fighting hand to hand, hee smote him downe dead to the ground. This is the selfe-same Prince, who (first of all the French) embraced Christian Religion, whereof both he and his successors were alwaies afterward true protectors and defenders. He was the most redoubted of all the kings in the world, and of whom the Emperour Anastasiu, Theodorick the Ostrogothe, and the Visigoths of Spaine made no meane account, were it in admiration of his vertue, or were it for feare, they thought themselves vey happy, to haue peace and friendship with him, seeking it by diuersity of Ambassadors, & by plenty of most exquisite gifts.

His Sonnes Childebert, Chlothaire, Chlodamire, and Thierry, as heires to his crowne, and likewise to his valour and piety, made themselves admirable & dreadfull to strangers. Childebert, induced thereto, by horrible persecutions inflicted on the Orthodox Christians, as also by the bad and vnworthy vsage offered to his Sister, by Almarick her husband, King of the Visigoths in Spaine, who seuerly maintained the Arian heresie: passed with his Army into Spaine, quailed & ouercame the powers of the Goths, wonne diuers Citties by assault, and at length took Tolledo, cheefe of all, ruinating it in ranged battaile, where also was slaine Almarick their king; returning triumphantly into France, hauing added to his Empire, the very greatest part of Spaine. Afterward the three Brethren together, wholly ouerthrew the estate of the Bourguignons. And loone after, the emperour Iustinian, making warre on the Goths of Italy, the Goths made recourse to Theodebert, king of Mets, and youngest Sonne to Chlouis, who defended them for a good space of time, giuing such prooffe to the Greekes, of vertue in the French, that Iustinian was constrained to compound with the french, as Historians (on his own side) do testifie.

In this first race, there was also Chlothaire, who by his victorious arms, wholly subdued Germany, and vanquished the vnconquerable Saxons. On a day, the two Armies being somewhat neere each to other, and the River Wurgis running betwene them, this Chlothaire being on horse-backe and well armed; espied Bertoldus, Duke of the Saxons, in like furnishment on the Riuer's other side. Alone & without attending for any other troops, suddenly he crossed over the Riuer, to encounter and fight with his enemy, who betaking himselfe to flight, he pursued after with all possible speed, and hauing ouertooke him, fought with him, and left him dead on the ground. So returning victorious backe againe, bearing his enemies head in his hand, he found his people much offended, because they had neglected to follow him. He left Dagobert his Sonne to be his Successor, a worthy heire both to his estate and valour, as also excelling in piety and deuotion, as many Churches richly founded and builded by him can well testifie.

Hauing finished the first race, wee come to the second, wherein let vs consider first of all, the cheefe man thereof, Charles

Charles Martell, Prince of the French; whose name remaineth engrauen (perpetually) in memorie of all the people of Europe, for being their conseruator, in warranting them from the certaine yoke and seruitude of the Sarazins. It was then when the Arabian Sarazens (holding all Affrica) passed into Spaine with very final troops; where finding but slender resistance, the Spaniards and Goths bequeathing themselves, as ingulged in all pleasures and delights, and no way addicted to the exercise of Armes, became immediately Masters of all Spaine. This victory and conquest drew on thither Millions of Moores and Sarrazins, and in so great number, that Spaine being no longer able of comprehending them, they made account of passing further on, euen to run throw all Europe, and quite to exterminate Christian Religion.

Into France they entred with a most dreadfull Army, lacking and spoyling all that they met with, and passed on so farre as Tours, seeming, as if there were no force or power great enough, that could resist or stay the course of their conquests. All people and Christian Princes, were full of feare and terror, and (in a worde) Europe had vterly bene vndone: if this Charles Martell had not then bene present neere or before the City of Tours, making there a barre of his body and French forces. Hauing giuen them battell with few French as then were with him: hee ouercame and meerey hewed them in pieces, to the number of three hundred, threecore, and sixtene thousand Sarrazins. After this, being aduerted that there were yet other great troops, towards Narbona and Auignon; hee went thither to finde them, & in another daies good successe, wholly ouercame them; & left not a man liuing. So that it appeareth by iust records, that there were slaine in all, seven or eight hundred thousand: in regard whereof, the fir-name of Martell was giuen him. Thus did he dissipate this dangerous tempest, wherewith all Christendome was threatened, and ready to be confounded.

This also gaue good ease to the Spaniards, who were scattered in Spaine; fled & hidden in the Asurian mountaines. So that he might wel be named, & in good right, the Buckler, Hammer, (sharp sword) and Rampier of Christendome. But for him, Europe had now bin the feare of Cathays and Atramelines. In stead of adoration giuen to the true God, the name of prophane Asahemet, and his execrable Alcoran (should haue bene here preached. In Italy there were but the Lombards, who in the space of almost two hundred yeares, could not become Masters of all Italy, neyther conquer any more but a part, whoe their first king Alboin obtained at a clap, euen when they first entred. The rest was so miserably tormented, by the courtes and piracies of the Sarrazins: as the poore inhabitants knew not where to hide themselves. The Empire of Constantinople remained, hauing worke enough to do, to keepe herselfe within her owne small bounds and limits: being pursued by the Arabes and Mahometanes of the East. Question. Ife, the Christian name had bene extinct, had it not pleased God to serue himselfe with the victorious arme, and courage inuincible of this French Prince, to conferre his faithfull seruants to glorify his name.

This was the same Prince, of whom it was said; That hee affected rather to command Kings, then to bee a King himselfe; which was engrauen on his Toombe in these tearmes.

Non vult Regnare, sed Regibus imperare ipse.

Thus imitated by the Virgil of France.

This was Great Martel, Prince of the Frēch; Not King in name, but a Master of Kings.

Much more to be esteemed heerein, then he that saide, Hee affected rather to command them that had Gold, then to haue any himselfe. Because the passion and feruour which is borne to libor, and which searcheth itselfe willingly in the souls of the most generous, is much more quaint, tickling and violent, then is the desire and thirst after riches. Pepin, King of France, son to Charles Martell, wonne not a iot lesse glory by his haughty deeds of Armes. This was hee that danted the Aquitaniens, and them of Bavaria, ouercomming them in diuers battailes, and likewise the revolted Saxons. Soone after, being called for succor by Pope Stephen, to defend the Romane Church (vexed more then euer) and oppressed by Attilpho, King of the Lombards, he went with all diligence, & constrained Attilpho (who felt his power not equal to his) to flye, and shut himselfe vp in Paulia his Capitall City, where hee besieged him, and could not raise his siege vntill hee hadde made an aduantageable composition for the Pope, with whom he left many French souldiers for his further assurance. This composition being afterward broken by the perfidie of Attilpho, Pepin returned thither againe, and besieged him the second time; compelling him to surrender the Exarquate of Ravenna, and many other places, which he gaue vp to the Romane Church. And returning home into France, hee found there the Ambassadors of Constantine, Emperor of Constantinople, who bringing him many goodly presents, came onely to request his alliance.

Charlemaign
or Charls
the Great, sonne
to King Pepin

But what can we speake of more admiration, then his sonne Charles, to whom (by good right, and for his high deserts) the whole Vniuers, by one consent, gaue the fir-name of Great? Hee attempted, maintained, conducted, and brought to end, ten or twelue feuerall warres, all of most great importance & difficulties in all kindes; as well in regard of the places, as for the great multitude and strength of the enemies, against whom hee was to deale. First, against the Aquitaniens and Basques or Gascogons, a meruailous strong people; yet after many overthrowes, hee ranged them vnder his obedience.

Next, another warre against the Lombards, who hauing violated the Articles of peace, which had bene councounated with them by King Pepin, Father to this Charles; they infested and tormented the Romane Church, without the least breathing or respite. Which was the reason that this Prince, as pious and iust, as valiant, vnderooke (according to the ordinary vse of the French Kings) the defence of the holy See, ouercomming & ruinating the Lombards from the toppes to the bottomes. He also besieged Didier their king, tooke, and led him captive into France, where ended the kingdome of the Lombards in Italy; and whereby he augmented and enlarged his owne estate. Thus hee purchased rest to the Pope, and beside enriched the Romane Church, giuing it no meane part of his Conquests, and encreasing the patrimony of S. Peter.

Hee attempted warre also against the Sarrazins, passed into Spain to fight with them, where hee foyled them in many encounters, enforcing them to hide themselves in Towns, which hee besieged and wonne away from them, so that hee conquered a great part of Spain, chasing the Sarrazins thence, and continued warre alwayes ther afterward against them, which gaue no small ease vnto the Spaniards, who were mightily oppressed and ouerburdened before.

Then he made an expedition into Italy, against the revolted Lombards and Italians. Many the like into Germany, against the Bavarians, the Danes, Bohemians, Sclauonians, and Fuinides, all warlike people, and whom hee conquered. Also against the Hunnies, an vndaunted people, after they had gotten habitation in Pannonia; vnder the conduct of Attila their King; yet he vanquished them, and hewed them in peeces in many fougher battailes, plucking out of their throats the spoiles of Europe, which they had enioyed and triumphed ouer for so many yeares. And there hee found such wealth and abundance of riches, as the very simplest fouldiour in the Camp, was wonderfully rich for euer after.

Furthermore, hee had no meane meddling with the Saxons, against whom hee had warre for the space of three and thirty yeares: they being a people that could neuer neuer liue nor abide in quiet, reuolting incessantly, especially when they knew this Prince to be farre off from them, & troubled in some other places. Hee added to his owne estate Gascogny, a great part of spaine, Saxony, and the Pannoniaes; restraining so powerfully the ordinary courses of the Sarrazins, as all Europe lyued quietly vnder his reigne. Beside, hee was so redoubted, loued, and admired altogether by forraigne Kings, that Aaron, Califfe of the East, who held (well-neere) all Asia, and was feared by all the greatest Kings; sought for his friendship, and sent him rare presents at diuers times, auouching him to be the most woorthy King in the whole world. And although this Califfe was rude and harsh vnto Christians, that dwelt in his countries; yet notwithstanding, he forbore to persecute them, in consideration of Charlemaigne, to whom he gaue the City of Ierusalem, by sending him the keyes thereof, as also them of the holy Sepulcher.

Eginhard in
an. lib. 4. cap. 9

The Emperours of Constantinople also did so esteeme, loue, and honor him, that oftentimes they sent him rich giftes by their Ambassadors, dreading nothing more, then to haue any contending in warre against him. In like manner, Alphonfus King of Gallicia, and of the Asturians, would call himselfe no other, but with this qualification towards Great Charles, His humble and faithfull Subiect, who by him; Proprius sum in Latine, as Eginhard hath recorded.

But what can be thought more admirable, or tearmed to bee a matter more rare, then in a Prince that was so stout a warrior, all other ciuill vertues and most humane, should haue an equall meeting together? Singular clemency did euermore accompany his victorious arme. The same Eginhard reporteth, that hee could not be enforced to choller, by any occasion whatsoeuer. Nay, he would neuer yeeld, that one of them which had attempted against his life and State, should be put to death, but onely was contented with their safe keeping. In his victory against the Lombards, hee did not onely pardon Paulus Warnefridus, Deacon of Aquila; but also kept him neere about his person, greatly honouring and gratifying him, for the esteeme of his erudition and knowledge.

This Lombard was vnwoorthy of so great grace, in conspiring afterward with other Rebels, and vling treason against his King and Benefactor. VVho neuertheless, after he had discovered the conspiracy, & surmoued all that the reuolts could do, againe he pardoned this Paulus Warnefridus, being no way willing, that he should be punished for his perfidie and rebellion. Onely he commanded his retirement, and banished him (for a while) to a certaine place. Afterward hee brake the bounds of his banishment, and fledde to Ragaisus, Duke of Beneuento, to excite him also to reuolt. An occasion, whereby the king was counselled, greediously to punish both the one and other for this double treason. Yet the good Prince would lend no eare thereto, but saued & pardoned both their liues: onely he charged Paulus Warnefridus, to write the History of the Lombards, the continuation of Europe, and some other works.

This was not only a light punishment, but honourable also to him that had the charge thereof: wherein, beside a most singular example of clemency, appeared an admirable affection vnto learning, for that onely respect, to loue and honor the man, who had so often falne into treason. Such was the loue & great account which he made of learning; and himselfe, albeit liuing in an age vngracious enough, & full of barbarisme, yet did hee speake Latine elegantly, and his mother tongue so readily, euen with naturall eloquence and admirable perswasion: hee vnderstoode Greeke also, but spake it hardly. Beside, he was well scene in all the Sciences, hauing Alecinus to bee his Schoole-master. All dinner while, hee caused one to discourse, or read ancient Historiies: wherein he tooke no meane pleasure, but moulded thereafter the forme of his owne life.

No lesse was he to bee commended for his iustice, careful for rendering it to his subiects with all sincerity: himselfe taking knowledge of such causes as concerned any difficulty, vndertaking the defence and protection of VVidowes, Orphanes, and other miserable people, to warrant them against all oppressions of the mighty. Hauing also established many good Lawes and Ordinances, for the rooting vp of vices, and furtherance of iustice.

stice. In regard of his piety and singular deuotion, hee made sufficient apparance thereof, as remaineth witnessed to this day in strange Countreys, by his weakly foundation of Churches and Monasteries. He was ordinarily present at solemn prayers in the Church, and at all Canonically houres, euen in the night time. Great care had hee, that diuine seruice should be honourably celebrated, & the Churches well serued, despending great summes of money, to haue them fitted and furnished with all convenient rich Ornaments, and matters to them belonging.

Hee caused five Councells to be called for the good of the Church.

Moreover, he was somewhat proud and curious, that the church should be beautified and shining, by the probity, integritie, and sanctitie, expressed in the liues of the Ministers, and Ecclesiasticall persons to them appertaining. Being alwayes herein so careful, and for establishment of the better order, that hee caused five Councelles to be called and holden, and collecting the Decrees of them, made the to be published & obserued: holding nothing in more great recommendation, then to see the Church honoured, and flourishing in all holines. He was liberrall vnto all men, especially to the poore, as well of his owne Kingdome, whom hee mercifully releued: as also in strange countreys, whereto hee sent rich Almes; alwayes coueting friendship with the Easterne Kinges, to aswage the persecutions of poore Christians.

Charlemaign
could neuer
be tempted
by a thought of Ambition.

But aboue all the rest, one thing seemeth very strange, that Ambition could neuer gette footing in the soule of this Prince, although it had bene, and it, a frequent and ordinary disease, in the very greatest courages, and most generous spirits. For, although hee was crowned Emperor of the East at Rome, by Pope Leo the third, vpon the cries and acclamations of the Roman people, who both desired and elected him: yet let mee tell ye, it was so farre from any search or proceeding thereto in him, as hee knew nothing thereof, neither euer gaue his consent thereto. For Leginhard assureth, hauing heard himselfe to confirme it, that if hee had knowen the purpose of the Pope and people; he would not haue gone in to the Church on Christmasse day, in the year VCCC. when that acclamation, election, and coronation was performed. It was a thing so much against his minde, and whereof hee made such slender reckoning. Hee dyed at the age of threescore and eleuen yeares, hauing reigned seuen and forty yeares. And, at his height of humane felicity, hee left his Sonne Lewes his successor, and heyre to his vertues, who for his exceeding great mildenesse and meekenesse, deserved the sur-name of Pious, or the Debonnaire.

In his young yeares, his Father made him King of Aquitaine, where he carried himselfe in such sort, governing so wisely and with such discretion, that such prudence and vertue was highly admyred, especially in those tender yeeres. Himselfe rendered iustice to his subiectes, attending thereon three dayes in euery weeke. Hee vsed great iudgement for well choosung men of worth and merite, to vndergoe places of important charge, as Officers and Magistrats. Hee eased the people so much as possibly hee could, in taking away harde Tributes and Subsidyes, and moderating others, euen in the mildest manner.

And yet notwithstanding, hee was a good Warrior, not onely in defending & safe keeping his owne Frontiers: but also proceeding very farre into Spain, to make warre vpon the inuading Sarazins, whom hee foyled in many battels, encounters, & besiedgings of Citties conquered by him, hauing maintained and enlarged the lads of his Father Charlemaigne, which hee had wonne in Spaine. So that by his Vertues, wife carriage and deportment, hee gaue a wonderfull contentment to his Father. Hee succeeded him in the kingdome of France, and in the Empire of the East. He continued warre against the Sarrazins in Spaine, & weakened them in such sort, that he gaue good means to the Spanish Christians, to defend themselves against them and to extend their territories farther off. Marineus Siculus, who wrote the historie of Spain, declareth the expeditions of this French Emperour, reporting moreover, that he imposed a tribute on the people, which were conquered and subiected by him in Spaine: where he was cald in the dayes of this Author Romanus.

of the West towards Germany, and valiantly imbarred the courses of the Northerly people, from their manifold inuasions. And neuer could any defect or vice be noted in him: but that he was too good, too humane and debonnaire. His piety, zeale, and deuotion towards God and his Church was such, as neuer in any man was obserued greater. Forty dayes before his decease, hee tooke no other soode, but the blessed Communion onely, which hee receiued with wonderful humility, and extraordinary contrition: continuing alwayes in prayer, or causing to be sung in his presence and hearing the Ecclesiasticall offices.

The 5. race of

Hugh Capet,
of Saxony.

Come we now to the third race, the cheefe whereof was Hugh Capet, yssued from the house of Saxony; who happily reigned, and wisely governed his Kingdome, with much piety and iustice. His Sonne Robert, with like piety and integrity of life, loued Learning, and was so earnestly addicted thereto, that hee himselfe composed sundry Books: and among the rest, he wrote many goodly & pious Hymns, which were receiued, and are yet (at this present) sung in the Church. Of him it is thus credibly reported, & being (at a certain time) mockt by an ignorant Duke, because hee sung in the Church among Ecclesiasticall persons, hee made him this answer: That he better affected to see a King learned, then an Assc Crowned, making his allusion vnto the Duke, who wore his Dukall Crowne on that solemn day.

A worthy answer of a iudicious King.

His loue and charity to the poore, and extension of Churches.

Hee was very pittifull, and a great Almoner on the poores behalfe; so that when hee tooke his owne repast, great troopes of poore people were admitted to be about him, whom hee would suffer freely to come neere him, and gaue vnto them that soode which was set there before him, & many other things that they stood in need of. Nor was hee a iorte lesse liberrall to Churches, in causing many to be builded, founded, and endowing them bountifullly, as also re-establishing and enriching others. There was no want in him likewise of all other royall vertues, maintaining and conseruing his estate very well, and making the people happy, that were vnder his obedience.

I am feigne to passe ouer others, to come to King Lewes the sixt, surnamed Le

Gras, a true imitator of his Auincestours vertues. He employed all his life time, to containe his people in peace and quietnesse, and (according to the dutie of a good King) to shield them from oppression of the greatest & most potent Earles and Barons of France, who stood then vpon very peremptory termes. Which made him to attempt diuers wayes against them vpon that occasion, and oftentimes expose his life to dangers, preferring the well-fare of his people, before all other considerations whatsoeuer, and so he well witnessed from time to time.

After hee had chafuled and raunged all such as had revolted, flying from him vpon the like occasions, and was become feared, respected, and obeyed of all the Rebels, as also beloued of all his subiects, the Emperor Henry the first, being departed from Germany with a mighty & dreadful Army, to ouer-run him and his country, he went to meet him nere to Ribemont, hauing but a handfull of men with him. But he so affrighted the Emperor Henry, and all the potent Army with him, that fearing the valour and inuincible arme of the French, whose courage will giue way to nothing whatsoeuer: he thought it farre better for him to quit the place, & get him gone, then to hazard his estate against so valiant a King, though hee vvas attended but with so small a troope. And so this Emperor made his retreat, at the very noyle of the Kings coming, whose name (indeed) was very dreadful.

This Prince also excelled in Piety and Religion, vertues proper to the Kinges of France: being the true props, supports, and Bulwarkes to the Church. For we reade, that in his time, Pope Paschall the second came into France for refuge, and to consult with the Gallicane church, concerning those differences which hee hadde with the Emperor. And afterwards, the Popes Calixtus the second, Honorius the second, and Innocentius the second, being tormented and expelled by the Emperors of Germany, and brought to great misery, yet succoured in that kingdome, their ordinary retreat and refuge. Hee entertained them honourably, assisting them with riches, respecting them worthily & royally. In the end, hauing succoured them to his utmost power, hee tooke pains to pacify those discords and contentions. Some-

Grifo.

Something more I may adde concerning his death, as it is set downe by Suzgerus, Abbot of Saint Denis, his principall friend, and an eye-witnesse thereof. Feeling the end of his life approaching, & the holy Eucharist being brought to him, he arose out of his bed to meete it, falling downe on his knees, and receiuing it with great deuotion. Hauing before taken order for al his affaires, and made both profession of his faith, and confession of his sinnes, in the hearing of all there present. Afterward, being taken forth of his bed againe, & laid vpon ahes disperfed abroad he gaue vp the ghost.

His Sonne Lewes the feuenth, called, The Touthfull, was a true remeber of his Father, hauing ioyned piety and valiancy together. By the counsell of S. Bernard, he made a voyage into Palestine to helpe it with a puissant Army, against the inuasion of the Turkes. And hauing obtained many great victories against the enemies of the Christian Faith, he returned home to his Kingdome, pressed by the discomforts of Famine, where-with his Armie was very fore afflicted, thorough the disloyalty of the Emperour of Constantinople.

V Who can sufficiently admire the valor and good guidance of Philip Augustus, who (by good right) also carried the surname of Conqueror? At the age of fourteene yeares, he tooke into his hand the reines of the State, and in that tender age performed all exploits and actions, not onely of valiancy, but also of a great and perfect Captaine; watching & spending whole nights, to execute and accomplish his enterprizes. By which meanes, hee out-lept his enemies, tooke Towns and strong places, where himselfe would be scene in person at the scalado, yea, and at the assault at the breake of day, instead of adding himselfe to pleasures, whereto his youth might rather haue induced him. He fo vanquished his enemies, and chastised rebels in so tender yeares, as if hee had bin another Alexander.

The English

armes, against Philip Augustus.

Afterwards, the English being prouoked against him, gaue the better and more worthy subiect to his victories: for he conquered and tooke from them all that they held in France, weakening them in diuers battailes, and famous encounters. Also this Conqueror, incited by the same piety of his Ancestors, made a voyage to the Holy Land; where he fought diuers times against the Turkes and Sarazins, and carried many triumphes from them. Being returned home to France, he wonne that great day of Bouines, neere vnto Tournay, which I will touch a little more largely in this place, it being fearfully known, though (indeed) it was most signale and famous. For this king fought in that battell, against the forces of the Emperour Otho the fift, the King of England, the Earles of Flanders, Hennault, and Bologne, all conured against his estate.

The great

Tournay.

Those Earles being reuolted and leagued with the King of England, had likewise caused the emperor Otho the fift, to come into France, with a very great and puissant army of Germanes and Saxons. VVith them were ioyned the Forces of Flanders, Hennault, and other French subiects and vassals, associated with the Earl of Bologne. The King went on before with his Army, and met the enemy somewhat neere to Tournay, where he had Lodged him aloft in a place for his best aduantage, which the King hauing well perceiued, & that he was frustrate of all meanes for coming at them on that side, resolved to fetch a further course about, and to assaile them on the other side.

King of France.

Being withdrawne to effect this intent, the Emperour Otho taking it for a sight, did cause his army to march on with speed to ouertake the King, who was encamped in a village called Bouines. There he had intelligence how the enemy was come very neere, and the noyse of their armes gaue apparance, that they would fall in hande presently with them, and charge the rearguard: all which notwithstanding, before hee would doe any thing else, hee entred first into a Church, and there sayde his Prayers.

Afterward, being armed, hee mounted on horse-backe, giuing order for the Armes readinesse, riding thorough the ranks, for the better disposition of his people; yet nothing at all was done that day. On the morrow morning, hauing againe ranged his Army in battaile array, hee gaue his people a Kingly encouragement, by breely acquainting them with these circumstances: That they were to fight with one, who was an enemy vnto God and Men, come to lend a strong hand hand to Rebels, leading an army that had no other wages then sacriledges, spoiles of the Churches goods, and the blood & teares of the poore. Therefore they were to consider, that God had brought them thither, to punish their iust defenings, & had chosen the French for the instrument of his iustice. Hee further aduised his soldiers, that they should not labor to buckle the bodies one of another: but euery man to do for himselfe the best he could, without any eye or respect to his friend and companion.

Hauing animated them with such or the like speeches, hee caused his Army first to march on, assailling and sharply setting on that of the enemy. The French Chieualiers, after they had broken their Lances, came to handy blowes, fighting with all the heate and valour could be deuised: throwing themselves into the midst of the maine battell, piercing and passing through the thickest battalions, hewing in peeces, and overthrowing all that durst meete them. Great was the resistance, & wonderfull deeds of Armes performed on either side. The King was alwaies the most forward man, rushing into the greatest throngs, and where the fight was fiercest, to succour his people. Hee found himselfe enuironed with a huge battallion of enemies, where hee sharply layed about him on all sides, and cleared his passage still as hee rode on. But in the end, his horse being slaine between his legges fell downe vpon him; yet he was quickly remounted againe by a French knight, called Sir Peter de Tristram, who gaue him his owne horse.

Now charged hee the enemy more fiercely then before, his strength & courage being redoubled at the indignation of his fall, nor ceased he with his French Lords, who neerely followed him, vntill he came to the very midst, where the Emperour Otho was, he being then very luely affayed.

The Emperour

Heere did he meet with many French Knights, who being on foot, some tooke hold on his bridle, others hung about the neck and maine of his horse to stay him, which compelled him to turne his backe. But the Count Reignald de Bologne, hee would not budge a foote from the field of battell, but continued there & his followers valiantly fighting, euen to all extremities, willing (by no means) to yeeld himselfe, till in the end, his horse beeing slaine vnder him, and hee fore wounded, his throate threatned to be cut by a Villaine, hee yeelded himselfe to Lorde Guarin, a Knight of Saint Johns of Ierusalem, and elected byshop of Sens, one of the principall Captains for the King, saying, I had rather yeeld my selfe, and be iudged by the King and his Peeres, then to dye unworthily by the hand of a slaue.

So the field of battaile remained vnto the King, as also the victorie full & wholly, all the enemies being broken and scattered, a great part of them slaine, and very many taken prisoners, euen of the chieftest men. The King would permit none to pursue the Emperour, who fledde with the Count of Brabant, and many Germanis further off then two or three Leagues. Among the prisoners, was Ferrand Earle of Hennault, Nephew to the Queen, Countesse of Flanders, and Daughter vnto the King of Portugall. Shee being a medler with Magicall Sciences, would needes consult with her Diuiners, concerning the successe of this Battaile, and it was tolde her, That the King should be layde on the ground, without any Sepulcher: And that Ferrand Earle of Hennault, her Cousin, should enter Paris in Triumph. All which was true, but farre off from her interpretation.

tesse of Flan-

It is also faithfully reported, that the King, before the fight, in presence of all his Earles, Barons, and Lords (knowing full well that some were tottering and vncertaine, as beeing not thorowly affected to him) tooke the Crowne from off his head, and set it vpon an Altar, standing by him, saying in this manner. If there bee any man heere amongst yee, that shinkes more capably and worthily of himselfe, then this day to fight for libertie, being in such danger, both to the Honour and Renouue of France: let him willingly leaue and forsake this Crowne, and that man (what soeuer bee) let him boldly put this Crowne vpon his head. VVhereat all of them standing amazed, and being moued with admiration and enflamed affections, threw them selues before his feete, saying; That they were all his humble seruants, and that they would euery one of them dye with him that day, rather then be commanded by any other.

Most honorable murder
the King, before hee went to the fight.

The selfe same day of this great victory, Monfieur Lewes de France, eldest Son to the King; wonne another against the English, in the Countrey of Amou, at La Roche du Mayne, against the King, called John without Land. For this double victory, obtained both in one day, the King rendred thanks to God: and desiring that some marke might remayn for a Trophie thereof to all posterity, hee caused an Abbey to be builded neere to Senlis, which (in that respect) he named, The Abbey of Victory, and endowd it with great revenues.

I can hardly stay at Lewes the eight, Son to this King, and Succesor in his vertues, wherein he seconded him living, and partaked in many of his expeditions and enterprizes. But reigning so short a time after his Father; I must come to the King, called S. Lewes, whose piety, religion, and sanctity of life, hath sufficiently commended him to all men, & acknowledged him by quality, worthy the name of Saint. But that which is to be reckoned as a matter most rare is, that he excelled no lesse in all other vertues, both Military & Politique. He brought about many warres, wherein still he had a finger, and performed worthy exploits of Armes: beeing most valiant of his person, & a very wile Captaine.

Hee toyled and droue in disorder a great Army, wherein was the King of England, and the Counts de la Marche, and de Lussignan, at Taillebourg, on the River Charante in Poitou. Where having gotten before, with very fewe people, to winne a Bridge, long time he endured all the stratagems of the enemies Army, which was in number a hundred to one: yet hee performed so much by his valiancy, that his Army had leysure for their passage, whereby the enemies were defeated, a great number slaine, many taken prisoners, some say foure thousand, and the rest were disperfed and driuen to flight.

No where can be found more famous deeds of Armes, or any actions more generous, then his kingly expeditions against the Turkes and Sarrazines, where hee wonne the best in many foughten battailes, hazarding his owne person, and exposing himselfe to all dangers, even in the cheefest heate of fight, running where hee saw the enemy strongest, and his owne followers in any distresse. So that wherefoeuer he went, hee made all to giue him way, none being able to withstand him; but gaue place to the greatnesse of his courage, and strength of his powerful arme. The Lord of Joynville, an eye-witnesse thereof, speaking of one day among others, vied these very words.

And bee you very certaine, that that day the King performed most high deedes of Armes, more then euer I saw in all the Battails whereto I haue bene present. And one side after the Battaille, that if it had not bene for his person, wee had all bene utterly lost and slaine that day. And surely, I can no otherwise imagine, but at the very instant, his vertue and strength was doubled on him by the grace of God. For hee feared not to vote to thrust himselfe into the dangers and perils of the battaille: and where hee saw his people in any distresse, there hee laide most about him to helpe them, deliuering so many blowes with his Sword and Battle-Axe, as none of the Turkes durst come neere him. The Lord of Courtinay, and Messire John de Salony reported to me, that they saw fixe Turkes (about him) preparing towards the King, and hadde forcibly laide hold on the bridle of his Horse, intending to leaue him away. But the vertuous Prince, seeing the danger wherein hee was, strove with all his might, and (in meere height of courage) laide such loading strokes upon the Turkes which ledde him, so that hee alone freed himselfe from them.

In another place the same Lord relateth, that the king vnderstanding how the Earl of Amou his Brother was engirt & hemd in with enemies, yea, and in such extremity, as hee had no meanes to get out from them; hee gallowed immediately to rescue him. And (saith he) without tarrying for any man, gave the Spurs to his horse, his Sword in his hand, & rushed mainly into the battaille, charging the Turkes and Sarrazines heavily, untill hee came to the place where his Brother was. But at his arrivall, God knows what paines hee tooke, and how many worthy deedes of Armes hee did: for it is most certaine, that where hee saw the greatest danger and prease, there hee bestowed himselfe without any feare. So that by his admirable proffesse, he brought his Brother out of danger, and droue the Sarrazines to flight, chasing them quite out of their owne Host or Army.

Another day, speaking how the King was ready to assaile the enemy, & exhorted his followers to all forwardnesse; His Helmets (saith he) was richly gilded, and in his hand he held a sword of Germanie, readily drawne. But let me tell you, that I neuer saw a more goodly man then hee was, for hee appeared above all the rest, by the height of his head and shoulder: and it is a thing hardly to be credited, how chearefully all the Soldiours were encouraged to the battaille, when they but looked on the King in that manner. So that many Knights, without attending for the King, mingled themselves amongst the Turkes, and there assailed them courageously. The King would alwayes be the foremost, and when he came neere to the Turkes, the battaille beganne so fiercely, as it was a matter marvellous to behold. And that verie day, there were far more woorthy actions of Armes performed, as well on the one side, as the other, as neuer had bene observed in all the voyages beyond the Seas. For no man drew a Dart, an Arrow, nor other Artillery: but all of them fought manfully, hand to hand, allpel-mell, one with another, onely by strokes of Swords and Battle Axes. Further hee addeth; That the King did more then merwayes in fighting, and would alwayes be in the verie strongest of the Battaille.

After the rout and flight of the Turks, at his descent and taking of Damieta, and after the three great battailes in Egypt, betwene the Channels of Nilus, where hee obtained full victory: if famine, and a certaine strange disease (extraordinarily contagious) had, not falne amongst his people: it had bene Doomesday vnto the Turkes and Sarrazines, and doubtles, they had bene quite exterminated, both out of Egypt, and the Holy Land. The Infidels so admired the vertue of this Prince, that although hee was contrary to them in Religion, and their very seuer persecutor, yet after the death of their Soldan, it was offered to him, and they would haue elected him to be their Lord. And they had done it, as beeing a matter already resolved on among themselves: but that some labored to alter this deliberation, by alledging him to be the fiercest, fiercest, and most determinate Christian that euer they did know. And they said among themselves; That if their Mahames had suffered them to doe so many mischiefes, as his God hadde let him (being a King) to taste: they would neuer more haue adored or beleueed in him. And yet (neuertheless) some amongst them, onely by the example, and good Life of this holy King, received the Christian Faith.

Moreover, he ordained so well for the state and policy of his Kingdome: that his subiects (beeing before mightily oppressed) lived in perfect peace and quietnes. He vied great wisdom and prouidence in all his affaires, having thorby quenched and qualified many troubles and commotions in his kingdome: and by taking away the causes thereof, constrained the Duke of Bretaigne to acknowledge him, and tender such satisfaction as himselfe desired. With very much iudgement also he pacified the differences with the English, and induced the king of England to such friendlinesse, that he became his Liegeman by faith, and one of the Barons of France: so that hee left not any way to his successors, which caused them to enioy so long a peace.

About all other things, hee loured Iustice especially, and was verie carefull thereof in himselfe; correcting (by his owne example, and holy Ordinances) such Vices and Abuses as reigned among his Subiects. Hee was such a Lover of trueth, that (as the Lord of Joynville saith) He was neuer knowne to falsify his Word. For, it was reported vnto him, That the Sarrazines, in receyuing his Ransome, were discontented with tenne thousand pounds, hee caused more to bee giuen to them.

Neuer could any feare or misfortune disfigure him of reason; but evermore hee was thankfull to God in all his aduersities. When hee saw his army in danger, by no meanes in the world, or for safetie of his owne person, would hee part from it; but would alwayes abide by his people, and endure (with them) the latest hazards and euents of fortune. Neuer should hee make an end, I would recoune the deeds (well deserving immortality) of this good King. It shall suffice then to say, as the same Lord of Joynville reports of his time. The common people called him true Father, the Nobility, iust Prince, and preseruer of the Lawes of France, her King of Trueth, and the Church, her Tutor and defender from oppression.

A King carefull for his kingdome, as well in his absence, as presence.

Philip the 3 succeeded his father S. Leopold who deceased in Africa at the city of Thunis.

In the same Schoole was bred and no-rished Philip the third, to whom the good ly examples, and profitable instructions of this good King his Father, served as an absolute pattern and excellent institution, which he understood so well, and made profit of in such sort, as, although he got not so great a name, yet notwithstanding, he was the most worthy heire of his Fathers vertues. And albeit S. Leopold died at the siege of Thunis in Africa, making warre the second time against the Infidels; yet this young Prince gave so good assurance to the Armie, much danted by the death of the King; that hee bare away many famous victories from his enemies, although they exceeded his strength in huge multitudes. In the end, he constrained the king of Thunis, to come humbly, and entreat for peace: rendering himselfe, and his Vnckle Charles king of Sicily tributaries to him.

Afterwards, returning home towards France, he passed thorow Italy, where he was entertained with such fauour and ap-plauses by all the inhabitants, as the most part came and entreated him, that hee would take the command oner them, desiring (about all things else) to be governed by so good a King, so loving and re-spectiue of his people. Being returned into his owne kingdom, he maineyned
it in peace a long time; vntill being mollest by the King of Arragon, and the Count de Foix, hee undertooke Armes.
Heereupon he entred into Spaine, where having made war very happily, by assault
he tooke many places reputed impregnable, conquered a great part of the kingdome of Arragon, ouerthrow the Arragonians in diuers encounters, and slew their King, so returning home ward with Triumphall victory, he died at Pampun.

But one thing may not be omitted,
that this king most oftentimes did weare sackcloth, and a shirt of haire, liuing so holly, and vying such abstinence, that the Authors of those times were enforced to confesse, that he rather resembled a good Religious man, then a King. Yet was hee a great Prince, & knew well enough how to gouerne his kingdom.

Charles the first, descended also to be set in this ranke of choyse men, being furnamed of his time, the Wise. Onely by his councell and good aduice, without fust-ring from his Chamber, he reconquered what ouer his Predecessors had lost, by the Armies of the English. His prouident and well tempered wisdom, did di-uers times rebate the keene edged sword of valiant Edward the Prince of Wales, and disappointed many of his forwaide purposes; so that, notwithstanding his high spirit, and well ordered Armies, he gained very little from him, nor yet the King of England his Father, but what they wonne one day, they lost againe in another.

Heere also I cannot omit Charles the seuenth, who coming to the Crowne, his kingdom (for the most part) was in the power of the English: but yet recou-ered it miraculously, as not onely he regained what he had lost, but also (as some say) all that the Englishmen did hold in France, wishing them to rest contented with their owne Island: And heere methinkes it is very strange; what all Historians haue reported of those times, that this king, being toyled & wearied by the long warres of the English, to him much vn-profitable, and lesse pleasing: should yet be excited by a poore Maide, dwelling in a village of Lorraine, named Joane d'Arc.
For the being brought before him, & beieving of great resolution, made him man-saire remonstrences, whereby to entice and kindle his courage, for the recouerie of his kingdom, and expulsion of his enimies, which surely could not bee but by miracle. And it cannot be denied but that there was a Genius in this Maide, far surpassing the natural and ordinary condition of her sexe. And so much the more strange, because she served as a Capitaine, conducted the Armies, and fought verie valiantly, when as occasion served.

Non hac sine numine diuina veniunt.

Consider we also Charles the eight, his youngest son, who hauing past into Italy, to reconquer that which the Arragonians vsuered from his predecessours, filled all the Citties and Townes of Italy (at his ar-riual, with no meane terror of his armies, none being found that durst make heade against him. Every City submitted to him, and set open their gates, in meeet affection and respect, both to the vertue of the French, and dread of their name; Others for feare, not being able to contest with them. So that in lesse then five mo-neths, he made himselfe Master of all Italy, Geneway, Florence, Pisa, Sienna, and Li-burna being all in his power. He recon-quered the whole kingdom of Naples, and expelled them of Arragon, who had vniustly usurped there.

The Great Turke Bajazeth the second, feared nothing more then to meddle with him, & questionles, he would haue gon to assault him in Constantinople, wherein hee had shut vp himselfe in meeke teare, if vrgent occasions had not called him backe to France, making full account to returne thither againe afterward, to attempt that great and honourable expedition against the Turkes, whereunto hee was induced and called on all sides, & for diuers good considerations. At his coming back for France, two maine impediments presented themselves to him, as well in regarde of difficult waies and mountaines, where (of necessity) hee was to passe his Artillery: as for daunger of enemies in such places, where they might worke vpon aduan-tage many wayes; his army being also much afflicted with famine.

Beside all this, a league was made against him, by the Venetians, the Duke of Aul-laine, and other Potentates, who had leuied an army of 40000. men, to cut him off quite: but yet hee surmounted all these difficulties, and passed through the dangers without any losse. The Arme of 40000. men was encamped on the Plaine of Fornace, where it was most requisite for the King to passe, they purposing to look him vpe in this passage, to the end, that they might consume his army, with Famine, necessity, and miserie, amongst the Mountaines where he was. The king with 7000 able fighting men onely, affronted
this great army, gaue them battell, passed ouer the bellies of all them that hindered his way, and there was slaine about foure thousand of them, the rest being driuen to rout, or seized with feare, he sustaining
but very little losse, about thirtie French slaine, and some threecore Varlets. So not onely he renewed his army, which hee led in safety with all his traine, baggage, Artilletry, and carriages; but also fought succesfully, and hadde the victory ouer his enemies, which was a much more honourable Retreat, then that of tenne thousand, so highly renowned by the Greekes.

An example of rare vertue is recorded of him. At the surprisall of a certaine place in Italy, a young Maide (of most exquisite beauty) flying from his Soldiours, who would haue violated her honour:
came and threw her selfe at his feete, desiring him earnestly, to defend her from the force and outrage of his soldiours. As indeed he did; but yet himselfe fel into an amorous affection toward her, & hauing her priuate in his Chamber, with full intent to accomplish his pleasure, the Maide
all drowned in tears, humbly desired him on our knees, supplicating and adiuiring him in the name of the blessed Virgin, the vntoucht mother of the worlds Saviour, whose picture she saw hanging by his bed that hee would take pity on her, and not compell her to that, for safety whereof she had escaped from his ranshing Soldiours, and put her selfe wholly into his handes.
The King became moued in such sort,
that being transported with loue and passion, and in the braue gallantry of his youth, he made a Kingly conquest of him
selfe, and bedewed his cheeks with tears,
as being much ashamed at his immodest offer, he would not touch her in any vnciuill or vnchaste fashion, but gaue her most honourable freedome, with a verie liberal Dowrie to her marriage, setting
also at liberty both her Parents and Kindred, that were then at that instant his prisoners.

Surely, this was an acte verie strange and almost miraculous, if we consider him to bee a King, in the very vigour & flower of his youth, victorious: yet nearly touched with the loue of a May-den, excelling, and no way inferior vnto any in Beautie, and hauing her wholelie in his priuate power. His great wise-dome, singular iudgement, and infinite goodnesse herein appeared; and being a familiar Prince, hee would oftentimes say to his Favourites; That hee had made choyse of them, and loved them more then any other, because he was perswaded of their honestie, and might safely trust them. Only, he still feared one fault in them, that they would suffer him to bee taxed with Auarice, in being easily solicited, and tempted for accepte: in regard of the creature they badde with him; and his owne facility, in granting

The same King also vsed to say, I could wish, that my Court were a Mirror for all my other Subiectes, to maintaine and continue them in doing well. The sweete smelling fauour of this renown, attracted the souls of strangers vnto his loue and liking. So that by very iust reason, the surname might bee accommodated to this good Prince, of The louer and delight of Men: as it was attributed vnto the Emperor Titus.

Lewes the 12. succeeded Charles in the kingdom of France.

His successor Lewes the twelfth, made himselfe likewise as famous, by his Conquests of Italy. In the beginning of his reigne, he attempted warre against Lodouico Sforza, who vlturped the Dukedome of Milaine, which belonged to him. In lesse space then a Moneth, he conquered all Lombardie, and expelled Sforza, who making a re-entry afterward, and causing the people to revolt: the King went thither in person; where, after hee had vanquished Sforza (whom hee sent prisoner into France) he reconquered Milaine, and receyued the most part of the Potentates Cities, and Common-weales of Italy, which ran (on heapes) to yeelde their obedience to him.

The successe of his wars in Italy, and the kingdom of Naples.

From thence he sent an Armie to the kingdom of Naples, which had revolted after the departure of King Charles the 8. Then Fredericke, King of Arragon, seeing he could not resist him, and being offended at the perfidie of the Spaniards, who he had called to his ayde, and who (neuertheless) would possesse themselves of all: he submitted himselfe into the hands of the King, who vsed him royally, and gratified him with the Dukedome of Anjou, beside thirty thousand Crownes of rent. Heere (me thinks) I should not endure the malignity of Paulus Iouius, who hath set downe, that the King gaue nothing to Fredericke, and that he dyed miserably in France. Afterward, war was alwaies continued at Naples against the Spaniards, where were performed many goodly exploits, famous combates of enemy to enemy, charges, skirmishes, encounters, af-faults, and fallies: and where the French had many victories, & the issue of all had succeeded happily, if the enemy had not diuers times abused the King, vnder colour of treaties of peace, appointments, and arrefts. He beleeuing their plighted faith and slender assurances, was sometime the more slacke in succouring his people; so that their perfidious dealing, rayled a Million of enemies, leagued and conspired against this King, who found himselfe assayed on all sides. And yet notwithstanding, he went away with honour, hauing astonished and filled with terror, all them that were thus banded against him.

He made war vpon the Venetians, in regard of that which they had detained & vsurped, during those wars. He entered into their countries, and with a small troop, & in a place of no aduantage, in the Giaradada neere to Agnadell, he gaue battell to Barbolmeu d'Aluana, Generall for the Venetians, and wonne the victory: there being slaine aboue eight thousand of the enemy, many taken prisoners, & the very cheefest Commander himselfe.

The warre made against the Venetian.

Concerning that dayes seruice, two memorable sayings of his are recorded. The one was at his arriuall there, when it had bin told him, that the enemy had taken vp Agnadell, and he came too late to haue any lodging there, hee returned this reply, I will lodge vpon their belly, or they shall lodge on mine. The other, was at his being so neere the enemies Artillery, as it might very easily play vpon the place, he was aduised to walke wanderingly, for feare he should thereby be offended, hee made answer Neuer was King of France smitten by a Cannons bullet: And he that is afraid (quoth hee) let him come and stand behinde me.

Two memorable sayings of the King on the day of battell.

Vpon the successe of this victory, those places in Lombardie, which appertained to the Venetians, were seized and made vse of by this King: but afterwards, they were manfully recouered by the Confederates, with whom Ferdinand, King of Castile, was a partaker, quite contrary to the contractes (not long before) passed by him vnto the French King. But the Lordes of Trimouille, of Chaumont, Tiroultes, and other worthy French Capitaines, rescued them backe againe so powerfully, that they continued alwayes Warriors. In the end, was giuen the battaile of Raucenna, where the French vanquished a puissant Army of Italians and Spaniards ioyned together. And an entire victory had ensued on the taking of Raucenna; but that they lost their cheefe Capitaine Gaston de Foix, Duke of Nemours, & Nephew to the king, who was slaine by pursuing (ouer-earnestly) the enemies, broken and flying in confusion.

The great battell at Raucenna, whereot we shall haue occasion to speake more heereafter.

The excellency of this good king consisted not onely in greatnesse of courage and valiancy; but likewise in all other vertues. Aboue all, he was most highly commendable, for loue to his people, to who (notwithstanding all his other serious affaires) he was a Royall ease and comfort: so that this famous name was deservfully giuen him: Father of his people, and a good King.

France the first, succeeded Lewis the twelfth.

He had as his Successor, Great Frances the first, a Prince as valiant as euer the other had bin, and who in his very youth, and at the beginning of his reigne, ouercame the vnconquerable Nation of the Switzers, on the hot and dreadfull day at Maringano, an enterprize, which had neuer before, or at any time since, succeeded to any other King. A most remarkable thing in this battaille, was, that so young a Prince continued seuen & twenty houres in Armes, without receiuing any sustenance, and spent one whole night in the fildes of battaille, without lying downe or a nod of sleepe.

Of this battell also we will speake heereafter.

He contended with the Emperour Charles the 5.

This was the man that made head against the great Emperour Charles the 5. who neuer met with a keener enemy, nor that more disappointed his designs, or euer way more hundred him. And yet notwithstanding, it is hardly to be credited, with what honor, magnificence publicly, and courtesie in particular, hee entertained in his kingdom this Emperour, his principall aduersary. And although he with-held some of his estate vnusually, yet would hee not demand any reason for it, when he might well haue done it, hauing him in his owne power: but kept inuolubly the faith he had giuen him; and moreover, gaue him all the contentment he could desire.

An admirable disposition in a king.

To speake no more then truth, hee was naturally generous & Royall, which evidently declared, that hee had no other ambition, then to excell all other men in vertue and well doing. He shall (for e-uer) liue commended to posterity, for the loue which he bore to Learning, and to learned men: whom hee fought for euerly where, entertained, honoured, and gratified in all kinds. By which means, he filled France with learning and erudition in all Sciences: but especially the Vniuersity of Paris, which neuer was so flourishing, as in his reigne. So that (by good right) he was fir-named, The Father of Learning.

King Frances an enter lover of learning.

Wee may confesse as much of his Sonne Henry the second, a Prince truly generous and valiant: who continued warre against the Emperour Charles the 5. hauing sustained all his efforts, and stood continually opposite to his greatest enterprizes. But not long after, Charles the fifth drew himselfe into a Monastery, fearing (as some supposed) the vertue and fortune of this young Prince, leaving the reignes of his Germane Empire, to Ferdinand of Austria, being his brother, and the kingdom of Spain to Philip the second: who soone after made warre vpon the Pope, Paul the fourth, and then this King sent succour to his Holinesse, defended him, & reconquered the places which the King of Spain had taken from him. And in the end, by his entremise, the Pope and the King of Spain were accorded & reconciled.

Henry the second, Sonne & Successor to King Frances.

Charles the fifth, Emperour entred into a Monastery.

Occasion now carrieth me, to speake of Great Henry the fourth, miracle of the world: who gaue place (in nothing) to the vertue of his Predecessours, nor to the glory of all the greatest Princes and Monarches that euer were, if he did not surpass them. But my Pen is too feeble, to take to high a flight, it is a subiect ouerworthy, which ought to be reserved for the choysiest spirits of this age, or of posterity, if any man conceiue themselves capable to undertake it. For there hath bin some, the very best and skillfullest writers, who being thereto zealously affected, began to attempt the labour: but were constrained to giue ouer and leaue it, beeing overcome with the immense greatnesse of so many high and admirable actions, acknowledging and confessing, that they could not set downe any thing, to equal or come neere so famous merit.

one) for many fights and diuersity of encounters? Who can figure him, shining in his glittering Armes, in the fiercest and hottest brunts of so many sharpe onsets, combates, ranged batailles, affautes, sieges, and surprisals, making himselfe way wheresoever he went? A true Commander and Capitaine, for counsell and conduct; a most valiant Souldiour, to giue example for effect and execution. Finding all France troubled, the people moued and diuided in parts, by the deuices and factions of strangers, all Europe (to speake truly) banded & coniu'd against him, in very deplorable affayres; he yet gotte the vpper hand of all, dissipated all storms and tempests, saued and preserued France fro that ruine, which euery one supposed certaine. All the enterprises of his enemies, serued but as matter for his Troopes. Look how many enemies, see so many Triumphs, and as many Laurels in his Helmet, to make his vertue the more illustrious, and fill the soules of his owne people and strangers, with terror, amazement, and admiration, such as cannot be sufficiently spoken off.

He guided all his intentions with such wisdom, and executed them with so high a courage, that they could have no other issue but happiness: and it plainly appeared, that his vertued Fortune by the hand: making truly knowne the ancient saying; That the wiseman disposeth of Fortune, and on the contrary; It is slender purpose, to impute that to accident, which proves to be a mans owne error. Neuer did any Prince finde an estate so confuted and hurried; and neuer could any reduce it to more peaceable calmines, thē he did meere by his vertue, he not only damed his enemies, but (of enemies) they became his principal friends: A fouraign degree, & the sole perfections of a great Statesman, according to Plato. His valiancy, height of courage, and address to adions of Armes were such, as admitted no comparison therewith: matchlesse clemency euen towards such as were his most determinate enemies. No acte of cruelty, neyther of reuenge in the very fiercest fury of warre: neuer was his sword scene vnflaunted, but in the hot extremity of fights. His singular prudence, appeared not onely in the managing of war, and when leue was therin very seriously employed; but also in affaires of peace, whē he gaue him selfe wholly for the good and quiet of his people, shewing at all times, and in all places, that he was an admirable, good and wife king, exquisitely enabled with all perfections. Qualities in such sort incompatible by nature, as since the beginning of the world; they could hardly meet in any one man: in regard whereof, it hath bene sometime said & desired, that two should be taken to make one of,

In breefe, all things were so great and gracefull in him, as scarcely could any one spirit comprehend them: so that (to speak truly) the best that men could do, was to sit downe, and admire them with silence. This was the man, whom not only France acknowledged, & adored as her Conseruator: but likewise on whom the whole world cast an eye, as the true Arbitrator, Author, and Moderator of her quiermes. His right to the crown yielded him to be the cheefest king: but his owne vertues made him confessed, to be the most worthy among all other Princes.

In that then which is said to be the dignity of the French kings, for their rare vertues and great merits; no other people are thought to equal or come neere the. There are certaine vertues, which are termed heroycall or diuine, because they surpass that which is common in men, or of humane vnderstanding, euen as an excessse and hyperbole of vertue. So in Hommer, Priamus being desirous to commend the vertue of his Son Heiſtor said, He seemed to be issued not of a mortall man, but rather of some God. In like manner the Lacedæmonians, when they admired any rare or excellent vertue in any one, they would say, That he was a diuine man. Such great personages haue bene noted among our Ancients, whose vertues were so extraordinary: that their extraction was attributed to the Gods, as Alexander the great, and Scipio Affricanus: and the very Iane heroycall vertues haue bene carraied in the soules of French Kings, euen as being proper and particular to them.

It is a matter as common, as naturall, for a man to take Armes in his owne defence, or for his owne priuate profite, and to reuenge his vniust wrongs and iniuries. But a man to arme himselfe for another that is offended, to reuenge his cause in zeale of Iustice, without any other hope, and to re-establish him where he had bin formerly expelled; questionleſſe is a character of vertue truly heroicall, and sweetly favouring of the divinity; which evermore hath bene naturall to the French. Strabo ſaith; That they would willingly grow into choller, and undertake Armes; for ſuch as they ſaw to be unjuſtly wronged, and manifeſt ſhames done unto them.

The Kings of France haue bene accounted admirable for Iustice, and by an extraordinary affection in them thereto they haue taken care and paines, to exercise and render it in their owne persons, declaring themselves alwayes equitable Iudges, not onely betweene particulars, but also in their owne proper causes, whē in a doubtfull case, they haue layde the iudgement on themselves, rather then to injury any other. The Kings of Francee erred did so, as well when they rendered Iustice in their owne person, as by their Soueraigne Courts, and commendation of very ancient Iustice.

This report and praise of their Iustice is very ancient; for Aeschines the Greeke Historian admireth them herein, and seemed to fay with great judgment, or rather by a Prophetical spirit: That living so, & carrying themselves in the like behaviour to their actions; here as not able to connecture otherwise, but that their Estate would be always stable invincible, & impregnable from enemies; being sustained with so sound bases and foundations, as Iustice and the desire of Honour are. Among them most recent, haldus, a famous Italian Doctor, about the yeare MCCCXL. maketh especially reckoning of the Kings of France: which (for most certaine) long time they deliverted in their own person.

But the multitude of affairs encreasing, and they unable to be absent from rendering Justice to particular persons, except the State should receive some enlargement, disputes either by the war, or other important charges of the kingdom; they were faine to establish Parliaments to that effect, and therefore appointed ordinary and sedentary Officers. Before that time, the Estates made their meeting but four times every year, retained in the ancient Annals; Commentus Generales; wherein assisted the principal Lords of France, and Officers of the Crowne, as well to discerne and aduise, in what was to be done for the generall Estate, as to decide the greatest and most notable differences, happening between the particulars.

Having then decreed and resolved on their ordinary Parliament at Paris, there was the appointed place for rendering judicial Justice: so that the arrests and indemnities there concluded were as if they had been pronounced by the Kings own mouth, and thereupon inferred & enrolled in his Name. They were likewise verified and published, as also Registered by Letters of special provision, in the Offices and Dignities of the Crown, with solemn & public reception of the greater part.

It would notouched, (that oftentimes) Lords and Princes, being strangers, submitted their differences to the iudgment of that Court; in regard of the great opinion they held of their Justice. The Emperor Frederick the second, referred himselfe vnto the Parliament of the King of France; in the debate and cōtention betweene him, & Pope Innocent the fourth, concerning the kingdome of Naples. In the year MCCCLIII. The Barles of Nemours, in the year MCCCLII. disputed there the cause of his Barldome, against Charles de Palois, Brother to Philip le Bel, and won the day. Likewise the Prince of Taranne, in the year MCCCLXX. gained there a suite against the Duke of Bourgonne, concerning the charges & expences layde out, for the conquest and recovery of Constantinople.

In the year MCCCXIII. the Duke of Lorraine, and Guy de Chastillon debared there their parages. In like manner the Dauphine, and the Count of Savoie, having proccelle together, entered for their Judges the Court of Parliament, in the year MCCCXC. The kings of Spain made such account of Iustice in the kings of France, and integrity of theyr Parliament, that they sent their siddes to be considered there. The kings of Castile and Portugall, having made peace together in the year MCCCCIII. sent theyr difference to the Parliament, to be there verified, for the more solid and found assistance: and there it was fully confirmed at their request, and published at the open cloores.

We may also account among the favours and prerogatives of the Kings of France, as an especiall marke of their greatnesse and Maiesty: one thing which is found in few of the Kings & Monarchs of other Nations. Which is, that they themselves doe ordinarily conferre with their subjects, suffering themselves to be seene daily, not onely in publick, but also in particular, vsing privacy, granting easie access to any one: and yet notwithstanding they are not a iote the lesse reuerenced, obeyed, honoured, and respected, nay,
rather much more then some other kings,
who by artificiall trickes and mysteries, seek to haue themselves honoured of their people. Neyther doth this facility in communication, and friendly familiarity, beget any contempt towards them, or diminish the least part of their Maiesty: but rather maketh an addition thereto, causing them to bee the more esteemed, in venerable and most happy manner.

The subie-
like affection of the French
to their kings and Princes.

This is that which attracteth, & (most of all) winneth the hearts of the French, rendering themselves wholly affectionate,
yea, vowed and deuote to their Prince;
whom they loue, feare, and honour altogether, euen with an entire and cordiall affection, and nor by any force or constraint. A matter truly as admirable, as rare, and which the Lord Suriano an honourable Venetian, and other strangers hauiing well obserued, stand not a little amazed thereat, it appearing (naturally) almost impossible & incompatible. Wherein it is no easie matter to say, which is the greatest honour and aduantage, eyther to such kings, or to their subjects: but bee it howsoeuer, it is a great happinesse both to the one and other.

In this Delle
casti della grandezza della vita.

Most part of the kings in this world,
at all times haue fought many exteriour meanes, by different habites, extraordinary fashions, crafts, secrets, and diuersity of inventions, to maintaine their Maiesty, to make themselves feared and respected by their subjects, and yet notwithstanding, could not compasse it. The ancient De-iotes, being elected king by the Medes, for a particular man as hee was before, changed into all manner of behauiour. Hec would build a great magnificent Castle, enuioured with many walles, the very would he shut vpe himselfe, cloathed in garments of no vidual wearing, neuer shewing himselfe to the people, but very seldome and rarely: deliuering Iustice by written papers, & by interposed persons, and likewise all his answers, expeditions, and affayres, euen as if they came from an Oracle.

The kings of the Persians did vially weare a Tiaras on their heads, a Diadem or royall Head-band, all glistering with Pearles and precious stones, causing the selves to bee adored by such as shall see them. And now adayes, most part of the Kings and Lords in diuers countreyes, ob-serue the very same order. The great Duke of Moscovia will neuer be seene, but cloathed with a rich Sacerdottall habite, vnder a precious Paullian, accompanied with a small choyse number of his Do-mestiques, so sumptuously apparelled, as one would say, they were an assembly of Gods. The great king of the Abyssinians, or Aethiopi, is neuer seene at all, he speaketh to Ambassadors, with a Curtaine drawne betweene them, no other sight haue they of him. But when he pleaseth to shew himselfe, hee weares a Crowne richly fashioned, exalted or rayed very curiously, a garment all of beaten gold, thickly beautified with precious stones;
hauiing his face couered with a veyle of Taffata, for feare lest any should see his face. It is also a rare, and no accustomed fauour, when he lifts the Taffata neuer so little, that any part of his visage may bee seene.

The king of China neuer cometh abroad, but keeps himselfe continually enclosed in a Pallace, round engirt with very strong fortifications, and causeth his very Pictures to be adored. The great Seigneur of the Turkes is neuer seene, but in a habite wholly different from any other,
both for the fashion, as also the vnspakable riches on him: he dazeleth the eyes of all such as looke on him, in regard of the glorious stones shining on his head, and causeth himselfe to bee serued with such Maiesty, respect, & ceremonies, as is most wonderfull. The king of Monomatapa, is not serued but by men on their knees.
There are other, who cause themselves to be serued with strange fashions, and very seruile submissions: shewing themselves
seldome or neuer, and speake not a word,

but it is accounted as an especiall fauour.
But the Kings of France haue no med-ling with these apparences, and exquisite cunning, whereby to support their great-nesse, authority, and Royall dignity: because they differ in nothing (for the most part) neyther in habites, food and fashions, from their subjects, maintaining the selves without any subilty. And the more they are seene, the more are they honoured, and not only honoured, but also loued of the French: as being borne to reigne, carrying Maiesty in their Fronts naturally, which maketh them venerable; rauiseth the people with obedience to them, and crowneth them with continuall respect. And although it is no matter rare or difficult for the French, to see their King, because it is so ordinary and common to them: yet as learned Athenus hath discreetly obserued, the people runne on heapes, when they heare that the King passeth to any place, reputing it as a hap-pinesse, to haue so fauourable a sight of him.

To this great and immensd loue of the French towards their naturall Prince, may well be attributed the long continuance of that Monarchy, one of her other excellences, that hath subsisted twelue hundred yeares, which few kingdomes else can say beside. And that which is most admirable of all, is, that the kings haue bin of the same race and extraction, without any change but twice, & yet in changing, still it came to proximity and kindred, as we haue already declared. One thing also maketh it commendable, that it neuer bare command of a strange Prince, nor so much as desired it; but always hath bin gouerned by her naturall Princes; origi-naries, and of the most noble blood, nor onely in Europe, but in all the rest of the world.

Learned Onuphrinus, a famous Italian, obserued it as a matter worth maruaile, saying, that in no other Estate, can be obserued the like felicity. I will see downe his owne words. *Admirum illud obseruancredendum est, ut per mille & ducentorum sepe annorum intervalum non misceat tribus familias Reges orti sint. Wee must account (saith he) that this is meruallous, albeit there hardly hath bin any other Nation, but hath receiued strange Kings, and after receipte of them, hath expelled them againe, yea, many times massacred them, through some extreme mischiefe. Yet notwithstanding, it is proper and particular to the French, to haue endured no Kings strangers, and therefore haue so loued and reuerenced their Princes, that they not onely employed all their goods and meanes, but likewise laide downe their liues,

for the defence of their Dignity and Maiesty.
And this may be thought to be the cause, that for the space of about twelue hundred yeares, there hath bene but three families, from whence haue proceeded all their Kings.

hearts: whereby they would seeme to say, that their hearts should thence-forward serve that Harpocrates, and their tongues be continually busied in celebrating his prayes. O France! wilt thou bee lesse thankfull then those people? So many choise benefits received fro the cheefest of thy Monarchs, can they well escape thy memory, or glide into the depth of bottomlesse oblivion? No, no, wee will not onely consecrate the Peach-tree vnto him, but our hearts and tongues ioynly together, because this is the best offering, remaining in our power to giue him.

Telemachus, the youngest Son of Phyer, sporting himselfe (on a day) child-like vpon the Sea-shore, by accident fell into the water: but a Dolphin happily came, who receiuing him vpon his backe, did set him safe and dry vpon the land againe. The Father, not knowing how to expresse his gratitude to the Fish, that quickly was carried farre off from him by the nimble waues; to auoyd the foule blemish of vnthankfulnesse, caused all his Gates to be painted with Dolphins, engraued them vpon his Sword, yea, hee honoured his Seale with a Dolphins Image.

Henry, great Henry, a most Christian, Potent, and Royall King, succourd France in a Sea of seditions & dreadfull tumults, and like a gracious Dolphin, receiued her on his shoulders, and fet her vp in safety, euen on the shore of a most happy peace, whereof as yet shee enioyeth the benefit. His name shall not onely bee written on our Gates and Walles, but his greatnes, his victories, his mildnesse and paternall bounties, shall bee engrauen on an euer-during Piramide of thankfull acknowledgement, neuer to depart out of our memories. Our eyes, hitherto busied in teares, granting no liberty to our sighing hearts, to let our mouthes memorize his Trophies, & tell the world his countes Tiumphs, we do now begin to open the, and now wee would breake the doores of some sad Funerall discourse, in remembrance of his great Maiesty, and excelling virtues.

If Calisthenes durst make refusal to Alexander, who commanded him to commend the Macedonians, alledging for his excuse, that their virtues were so well knowne, and their merits so great, as hee should not gaine the least honour or reputation (whatsoever) thereby. How dare I then appeare in publike, and in this common habite of mourning, to commend the eldest Sonne of the Church, the Father and Patrone of Soldiours; especially in these dull times, when that diuine fire of Eloquence, sometime stolne from the Gods by * Tantalus, seemes to haue taken her returne to heauen, from whence she came at the first.

There are now no Ciceroes, not a Demosthenes to be found, no, nor an Hortensius. And albeit they were all aliue againe, to ioyne their best abilities together in well speaking; yet could they not speake in such fort of that famous Prince, but their elegancy would fall farre short, and infinite goodly things would nere come neere them, which are no more then due to his happy memory. If then I speake, it is but by appointment, and as feeling a certaine combat within me, between bashfulnesse and nature. Bashfulnesse taxing me with shame, to be silent when the whol world cries and complaines; ashamed also, that I cannot ioyne my sighes & teares to yours. Nature likewise tells me, that by an indissoluable obligation, I ought to render this duty and seruice, to the eternall memory of my King, my Lord & my Prince. This then may serue for my discharge. The * Epizephyrian Laureles, in former times, not hauing the commodity to performe any solemne sacrifice to Hercules, according to their vow (because there were not any Oxen, Sheepe, or other Beasts for oblation left in their City, through the length of a greuous penitence, which had consumed them all) when their Elders aduised them to take Cucumbers, Mellons, and some other kindes of fruites, fitting them with short stickes in forme of feece, and then calling them Oxen, Sheepe, and such like Beasts, they threw them into the fire, & so made their sacrifices. Among their neighbours, there was not any but commended their inuention, and gaue cheerefull applause vnto this acte of theirs.

If I haue not wherewith (worthily) to answer the admirable vertues of that Monarch; let me accuse my necessity, and giue you what I can, which (I hope) will be acceptable to you. Or else (if you better affect it) I will imitate those Sauages of Florida, who reputed the Sunne to be their their God, and seeing him so highly exalted ouer their heads, as it is impossible for them to come neere him: in looking on him, they hold vp their hands at him, which bringing backe to their mouths, they kis, deliuering testimony (by this meanes) of the reuerence, honour, and respect they beare vnto him. If I cannot touch (dazzled with the beams) the Sun of so bright a Maiesty, or my tongue shall this day seeme dumbe, in the infinity of his glory: I will yet essay by signes, and shew some-what that way, when other helps faile me.

Concerning the rest, my aime hath no other end, then that of Cesar, in the Funerall Oration he made for his Daughter Julia: Ut aditantes admonerentur quanta iactura ex illa morte facta esset: That the bystanders might bee admonished, how great a losse ensued by her death. For what losse can be greater the ours? A losse which neuer had his like, a losse springing out of our iniquities, which made vs altogether vnworthy to enioy so great, so happy and so dreaded a Prince.

O desiderabilis terra Israel in excellētis tuis vulneratus est. Quomodo ceciderunt patres tui? Quomodo abiectus est Clypeus fortium? Thus did Dauid bemoane the death of Saul, King of Israel. Thus was a King extolled by a King, being filled with the spirit of Prophecie. Thus did the annoiored of God streame forth his teares, in A Funerall Oration for A Prince, slaine vpon the mountaines of Gilboa, which he wished might (for euer) continue barren like Rocks, listen the effect of his diuine maledictions, Nec ros, nec pluuia descendat super eam, quia proiectus est Clypeus fortium. Let neither dew nor raine descend vpon yee, because there the shield of the mighty is cast downe. Behold, how he would haue some sad and lamentable monument to remain there, answerable to an acte so sad & dismal. Monuments ought to agree in resemblance with the things which they signify. What thing could be more horrible then the murder of an Israelite Prince? The Monument then ought to bee euery way as yrelesome and horrible.

In Funerall pompes, we vse to goe in blacke garments. Dewes doe make the Mountaines verdant, and raine drunk vp by the Vallies, enammels the with a thousand flowers, and giues them such a garment of greene, as is both faire to see, and marquillous pleasing. Therefore Dauid would haue nothing to grow vpon Gilboa, but thornes and brambles, that so (among made Rocks) nothing might appeare but rough thorny passages: to the ende, that such places might bee condemned, as of deeds of horror and darknesse; so likewise to sterility, and wooll perpetuall desolation. But are not dewes the gift of God? Dost not raine come from the hand of him that is almighty? The, not to receiue these, is a dreadfull malediction. It should seeme then, that Dauid inuoked the wrath of heauen vpon that Gilboa, the land being subiect to many curses, for the finnes that were there committed. Let neither dew nor raine descend vpon yee, because the shield of the mighty is there cast downe.

Alasse, what greater Shield of strength, more generous and mighty, then Great Henry the fourth? Henry, the Rampier of his people, the Shield of his Souldiers, & the Buckler that defended the heads and hearts of his Princes? He couered them against all their enemies attempts and encounters. Hee serued as an Armour of prooffe to the French Monarchy, vnder which defence they continually raunged themselves, yea, the Seigneurs and Principallities of many strangers, sheltered themselves vnder that Sunny Banck. Therefore of him may now be said, as sometimes was of Dauid: The Lord sought him a man after his owne heart, and commanded him to bee a Governour ouer his people. For if Dauid declared himselfe couragious, in the great heate of Alarmes and fights, Henry, great Henry, hath not hee beene (euery where) a true Mars, and a true thunder-bolt of warre? If Dauid were still crowned with victory, because his clemency was acceptable to the God of Armies, & therefore elected him among thousands, to bee the Ruler of his people: then may we say, that (after his fights) neuer was found a kinder Prince: then great Henry the fourth, to whom this Elogium rightly appertained. Qui in actate compositis imperatus est, qui in pace nihil timuit: Euermore a Conqueror, both in warre and peace, deriuing his victories no lesse from loue, then from power. Vnder which (as Emodius spake in the Panegyrique of Thierry, King of the Gothes) pidimus enatus optimos ad aduersitate generari, to may wee say, That out of greatest extremities, we haue beheld the birth of highest and fairest fortunes.

For in conquering the Rampiers of our Cities, at the very same time he won our hearts also, and (by a foweraigne amplitude of kindnesse) sweetly insinuated himselfe into all our soules, that beheld him so brightly shining in Armes. So that saying was verified in him, which Agapetus spake to the Emperour Iustinian. Imperium exornauit superiores Imperatores, suuero praestantissime illud uultu reddidit: That which Emperours (in former times) gave to their Emperours, shew thy selfe (O great Prince) hast giuen to thine, to wit, lustre and splendour. Thou didst finde it full of quarrels, seditions, and tumults, thy vnciuill subiects made mad (by what new Circes I know not) became enemies to thy crown. But by the right hand of God, & strength of thy martiall arme, thou didst displant thy Fortresses, peopled with Spaniards, expelling both the one and other; and from the limits of thy French Empire, thou didst exterminate that proud Belshazzar, that (without all pitty) did cruelly labour to teare her in peeces, and quite deuoure her.

frica a certaine precious stone, called Liparis, which hath to faire a looke, that all eyes are at a stand to gaze vpon it. Hunters there haue no need of sculking hounds for their game, or any Arrowes to kill it, because this stone, laide open in the midst of any field, all wilde beasts (getting but a glimpse thereof) gather together about it, and as amorous of the stones beauty, doe nothing else but looke vpon it. Our Monarch, our great Monarch, was as a Liparis in the midst of his French world, the Germane, Italian, Spaniard, English, Swethen, yea, the very Turkes, were all drawne hither by the fame of his vertues, & renown of his Armes, euery one stood at gaze to behold him, not any one but wished his presence, each one loued & admired him, as a new miracle, or prodigy of valour and greatnesse in the world. In so much, that his presence setued not onely as an ornament to this State: but it was also here as an horne of abundance, out of which, all kinds of goodnesse that could flow from a sacred peace, were in a most plentiful affluence deriued from him. The paysons of diffentions could heere no more produce their Gangrenas; the high vnderstanding of the King was too present an Antidote. And as the dried body of a Basilisk, hung with a golden thred in the midst of Apollons Temple (saith Cesner) kept it alwayes cleane, restraining (by an hidden vertue) Spiders from working cobwebs along the pillars and walles: Euen so great Henry, liuing in our France, kept it cleane from all the infolences of enemies, and suffered no strange Spiders to come weaue their webs of discord within his Prouinces. So auailable to this Monarchy was his long experience & promptitude, that he held the affaires (in euer condition) both of church and commonwealth, in an vpright sway of pollicy, were it in peace or warre. And so profitable did this people finde their subiects & obedience to him, that in all & quite through the body of France, they reuerenced him as their Lord, their Pastor, and Father.

Doe you not know the great vinity which Nature hath planted betweene the Pinnothere and the Pinna? Haue yee not read of the benefite ensuing to them both, by their mutual conuord & intelligence? France hath bene as the Pinna, and the King her Pinnothere. The Pinna is that great

The Pinnothere is a little creature, in the kinde of a Crabbe or Cruise, that continually stands as a Porter, awaiting the opening of the Cockle; which he keeps still wide gaping, vntill such time as he perceiue some prey to enter, which may be beneficall to them both. For then hee pricks or bytes the Cockle, and seee shutting her shell, they then feede both friendly together. And neuer (without this admonition) doth the Naker shut her shell, nor euer (without the liking of this her Gouernour) will shee admit any strange creature to come neere her.

A strange conformity betwene the Naker or Scallop, and the Cruise or Crab.

The comparison alluded to the Realm of France.

Euen so France, referring herselfe to the managing of the King her Pinnothere, and neuer receiuing any impression but his; she liued with that foode which was apt and naturall for her, and by this reason, she neuer felt in any of her parts and members, those intemperate vild diseases, that heere tofore bred her so many warres and troubles. A great misfortune it is the, when such a precious Iewell is taken from forth the midst of our Temple, where such a Master and Gouernour is carried away from his people. O decus Israelis in excelsis tuis vulneratus est. O France, the honour of Israel, glory of the Millitant church! O Parisi, the very fairest among the Gauls, or in the world, Metropolitane of the goodliest state in Christendome: thou hast seene him wounded in thy streetes, slaine in thy bosome, and particed inhumanely in excelsis tuis, in thy places most frequented. But afterward, setting it before his doore to bee seene, hee caused foure Trumpets, to sound before the Picture, that the person might appeare the more furious and deadfull. O deare people, if I could worthily, and (according to true life) represent before your eyes, the providence, wisdom, and happiness of councell, that remained in this Prince, I should then set before you (one after another) euen all the great and serious assemblies, of the cheefest Heads and Captains of war, and of all other states wherein hee presided. Then should you see him not like a silly Nellor by Agamemnon, but Agamemnon himselfe, and (in him) a million of Nellors. If you would see his vigilancy, & the care hee had of his State affairs, I should then set before yee (in grosse) the Ambassadors of the greatest Princes, the Courtiers and Postillions flying from all parts, their packers open, their Secretaries standing by, & that magnificent King in the midst, spending many nights together, for the confirmation of them, that soundly slepe in their beds at ease. If you would haue a picture from mee, of his mildnesse & clemency, then must I paint a thousand potent enemies, not humbled at his presence, or crouding to his feete, but seated in safety by him, at one and the same Table, in one and the same Caroch, yea, in one and the same bed.

In breefe, if it were in me to shew you his valour & Non-pareil courage; I should theere instantly set before ye so ranged batailles, with their Squadrons of armed horse, and Regiments of foote, their Pikes aptly placed, the flame and smoak smouldring from Canons, the noyse of Drums, the sound of Trumpets; and at the maine of every battailon, this king encouraging his followers to the fight; and then himselfe to giue the onser, & (like a true Mars) beating downe his enemies about him. Then would you say, that you saw a God armed, the terror of the world, the honour of valiancy; then where Cassius and Alexanders might well crowd in, there to learn warlike lessons of him. But oh insignifant disaster! he being dead. Quomodo ceciderunt potentes? Proiecit us est Clypeus fortium? How are the mighty inderthrowne? And the Shield of the very strongest cast downe?

thing (in his kinde) more abject and contemptible, then to be shut vp in the Pyrenean Dens or Grottes, badly followed by his owne, threatened and pursued by extreme accidents, throwne out of his Cradle, and the armes of his Nurse, into the Forge of Mars; wrapt vp in partiality of opinions, which held a high sayle in his time, and yet doth the like in many places of this Realme. They that fed his hopes, to preuaile thereby, deceived him: others that thought (by such instruments) to overthrow him, did the higher exalt him. And perforce must I (in this case) without looking on the pointes of his conscience, commend his morall vertues.

Achilles, the sonne of Aecus, who was to conclude the Troians greatness, & to overthrow their Illium from the top to the bottome, was long time hid vnder the garment of a woman, among the daughters of Lycomedes. And our great Henry (who was to be a terror to Spain) the prop and support of our French Commonwealth, was (in his younger yeares) euen as hidden vnder the habite of a poore & disinherited Prince, in the solitude of the Bearnish Lands and Mountains. But yet notwithstanding, God had (euen then) destined him to be a subiect of his wonders, yea, to the cheefest dignities, & very greatest powers of this Land. God I say, the great God of hosts, Per quē Reges regnant, & hath his hands full of crowns, & bestoweth them where himselfe best pleaseth.

Reade what Iob speaks of the Ostrich, & there shall you see this Prince naturally, euen according as description is ther made of her. That Bird (being deprived of wisdom & loue) without couering her eggs, leaves them in the dust, and so loseth all remembrance of them. The world would be quite bereft of Ostriches, if God did not play the part of a mother, and by the beames of his bright shining Sun, make the dust warme about the eggs, and so cause the yong to be hatched, to marvellous fayre and goodly forme. In like manner, our great Henry, was not he forsaken? Left in the dust of disfaour, and neglected all the time of his childhood? God had a care of him, notwithstanding, as purposing to make him an Atlas, for the support of his Church, and defence of this State. So that by beholding him so much abased in his beginning, and afterward so highly exalted: we haue great reason to say with the same Iob, Lampas contemplant tempus fatum. A Lambe, whereof no account at all was made, yet ordained for honour, and to be honoured at the time appointed. God would bring him by the paths of aduersity, to the highest place of prosperity, and made his traualles seeme as Mallets; to harden him for such paynes as hee was to endure, for the re-establishment of peace and vnty, in all the diuided Provinces of France.

In euery estate, afflictions do make the greatest persons, where contrariwise, in the midst of highest prosperities (as standing vpon an ouer-slippy place) oftentimes they, soonest lose themselves. We may deduce an example heereof, from a Glasse, vpon whose Christall, Flies can get no footing (saith Plutarch) & yet stand firmly on the borderings about it, because they are more rough and apprehensive.

Asphodelus melleus, & asphodelus, tenet non tenet.
Smoother paths are slippery, rougher wayes haue hold.

And from the same ground, it seemeth that Homer, stretch his Moly, the rootes whereof were blacke, but it bare fruite of most fine gold. So the life of this French Atlas, did thus himselfe (every where) to be very blacke in the bud, and wholly obscured with aduersity, but the best thereof (euen to his vtmost ending) carried three Flourts of true gold in an Azure field of heavenly beauty. Afflictions in him, serued as an apt subiect to Polydorus and Airen, whereby to mould, carue & forme the true shape of Vertue; which was the very fayrest and most goodly Statue, that euer could (by Arte) be imagined.

Let vs instantly conceite that happy houre, when wee beheld heauens providence to call him from Bearne, and the Banicks of Garnas, and (with goodly Enginicks) to shew him the Loire. He being (not long before) sharply pursued, was then sought for in the Grottes, many royall Armes (euen then) trusting to his game: but sent for (soone after) by the K. his brother, Henry the third, whom hee would not forsake at a time of need. Then was it, when France couered ouer with rebellions and Armies against her selfe, was constrained (more then euer before) to approue the spirit, wisdom, and hand of him, who quickly became her Halcyon, to appease and calme those furious tempests.

The blowes began at Tours and at Blais, but within few daies the fiery fire of those Soldiers proceeded through Beauvais, vnto the omitting of Paris: where the execrable and bloody patricide committed on the person of the king, opened him the doore to the whole State. The Princes and French Nobility, both proclaimed and acknowledged him to be their king. Meane while, the troubles encreasing, and the Auribus (as it were) in many peeces, beheld him (euen then) as soote shut vpon himselfe, and like the Steele that strikes a hard Flint, to cast forth thence the fiery sparkes of fire: euen so, the neerer a warriour is pursued, the more splendour is added to his glory.

There lieth a certaine monster in the Sea, vulgarly called the Scia or Sawe of the Sea, in regard of a horn hee hath, serving him in stead of a snout, the carrying no meane resemblance with a Sawe. This creature, meeting with a Ship vnder full saile, by diuers means of attempting, doth grow angry thereat, and seeketh to make open warre against it. Hee passeth and repasseth many times vnderneath it, employing his home (with his vtmost strength) to sawe, as hee thinks, and cut in twaine the keele of the Ship. But in vaine doth hee torment himselfe, for so long hee lieth the teeth or razors of his snout, till beating himselfe out of breath in the conflict: at length hee boates on the water with his belly vpperward, remaining at the mercy and laughter of the Pilote.

And what great hast (I pray you) did so many Armies, as quite couered the plaines of France? They employed all their endebour and weapons in vaine, hoping to sawe in funder and diuide this State. After all their malicious wrangling with this Soueraigne holy Ship, did they not become enuiered and broken in peeces, by the power of this great King, her Pilote? Wherefore wee may well say, as Voluise Paternus saith of Cato. Virtuti quam simillimus, & per omnia ingenia diu quam hominibus propior, qui non recte fortis sic facere videtur, sed quia aliter facere non poterat.

It is not for any ambition, or desire of glory that that I fight (would he oftentimes say) but to maintayne the liberty of my Subjects, and preferre my Crowne. And euen so did God fauour his designs, and laide at his feete (myraculoufly) an infinite number of Trophies. Heere Arques made her most signale surrender. There Turie published his high fortune. Dion, Fontaine-Francoise, S. Helena, and the Moates engirt his browes with a thousand Laurels: And for the higher pitch of his honours, the vanquished themselves did (euen then) reioyce at his prosperity and victories. He fought not in one place only at a time but like to a second * Briarion, with an hidden hand, and by his Lieutenants, hee smote in many places together. So that posterity reading his heroycall actions, not onely will make doubt to beleue the all, but rather grossly receiue, or repute them for fables.

I will leaue them to our Histories, & to telley, that his clemency appearing aboue his other vertues, did make him vniuersally both beloued and admired. O goodd God! how ready was he alwayes in helpe and subvention to the oppressed? How diligent, in finding out for our diseases both soveraigne, peculiar, & conuenient remedies? When I caſt mine eyes on the gally Theater of our France, methinks I doe there behold that terrible fight betwene Brutus and the * Xanthians, the very cheefest Inhabitants of Lycia, when they (being beliedged, the fire getting mischeuouly into the crannies of their wallles, threatening their neighbors houses, and the whole City together with a generall deuastation) in a desperate rage and fury, threw on fresh Faggots, made of dryed Reedes, the more to nourish and augment the flame, whereas Brutus (being their enemy) employed the vertermost endeavour, both of himselfe & all his Soldiours, to slake and quench it. He ſate on horse-backe, full of compassion, effaying by all possible meanes, to take some good order, and turning him round about, hee held out his hands to the vnhappy Inhabitants, desiring them to spare their owne City, and to saue themselves.

How many of our blinded French (desperately madd in our last wars) did the very like? What intended, those Armes, and hostile preparations in the greater number, but onely the ruine of themselves, and the whole State together? And what was laboured (on the contrary part) by this great King our Brutus? Nothing else, but to preferre his people, and stille the fires, furiously flaming in the four corners of his kingdom; yea, to keepe his people from destroying themselves. This was euen (doubtlesse) the full butt and aine of all his warres, during which time, and euen in the very fiercest broyles, hee was heard to cry aloud in the thickest throngs: O Frenchmen, Frenchmen, saue your selves. And the blood of them, although they were in Armes against him, hee did value at a dearer rate then his owne. An acte truly generous, and which (afterwards) made him so much admired; that they who refused to accept him as their Lord; threw themselves at his feete, and (in endeared loue) called him their gracious Tutor and Father.

Let Paris (onely) stand as a witness of my words, which was seene (almost) without Subburbs, without Pallace, with out Vniuersity, or any other Ornament whatsoever. The Field of the Ioshull man, and the Vineyard of the mis-tyler-standng foole, described by Salomon in his Proverbs; which were all conuerged with Thornes and Nettles, and their Hedges broken downe, might be compared with it. Our buildings beautified with Porphyry and Marble; his Royall goodly places; his Loures; his Tuilleries; his new Bridges; his Arsenal; the streetes newly re-edified, and adorned with so many new deuices of Silke and Tapistry; the new foundations of publike Readings: these are so many Trumpets, to publish the loue and vigilancy of this King. Very true is it then, that his life, so obscured and trauesered in the beginning, did well resemble a fire, which in the making, and before it attaineth to any light, doth cast forth very grosse and thicke smokes: but being fully kindled, it yeeldeth a bright flame, & giueth no meane delight to the beholder. We haue seene his originall to be dimly obscured and darkened with the clouds of enuy. Afterward wee beheld him; not like to be despised Lampe, but shining as the Sunne in brightest splendor.

Euen so God, proiding (long time) the building of his Church; did not forget this Prince: but at the time appointed by his eternall preſcience, he tooke him out of the Quarrie of darknesse, to make him shine as bright day, and serue as the Master-pillar to the whole frame. Behold him then (O miracle) in midst of so many victories and fauours from heauen, prostrated at the feete of the Church, and no other cryes were among the people, but God saue the King.

Deare people, from the beginning of my Oration, I haue feared to fall short, & my feare is very iust, handling so high a subject, and so full of meruilles. Yet notwithstanding, that great goodnes of his furnished me with courage, and hath hitherto vpheld me, in the plentifull field of his flowing vertues. Wherein I felte so great a consolation, and such a boundles liberty of spirit, that my tongue (without impeachment) hath (in some weak manner) exprest those things which I conceyued of his praises. But now I feele my senses arrested by an accident, as nouell, as it strange and lamentable.

The Poets make mention of certayne trees, that sometime did grow about the Tombe of Proteſilaus, and they hauing attained to such height, that (with their tops) they could couer the ruine of olde Troy; withered in an inflame, and lost all their leaues. Euen so my discourse could entertaine it selfe vnto this point; but when I see this great Prince (alas) setting from his Laurels in his Caroch, a final traine, indeed, without traine; my whole heart is frozen, my discourse withereth; and thereto remaineth no verdure in my words. A mischeuouſ assassinat, let loose from Achoris, created of the filthy driuall falling from the soule chappes of Corberus, (to bury our whole France) followes hastily after him. I see the Caroch stayed, O Paris! haplesse City of Paris! in excelsis this, in one of thy cheefest foure cornered streets, I see the murderer likewise stay there with it.

O God! what illiue depends vpon his boldnesse? Gracious Heauen, thou didst preferre this great King (before) for many times; as against Barriere at Melune, against Chastel in his Loure, and agaynst an infinite number more of most pernicious conuincations. Thy goodnesse (O Lord) shall it sleepe at this blow? Behold (deare people) it was our sins that weighed downe the ballance of eternall Iustice, for one chastisement. Answeretur ab impijs lux sua, & brachium excelsum confringetur. The light that shined vpon those Nations, rebellious against my Edicts, shall be take from them, and the strong Arme that defended them, shall be broken. Yea, and so farre it proceedeth, that our great God seemeth weary of further aduancing the Name of the glorious French.

O Fury! O barbarous wretch! instructed in the schoole of Sathan, and enchanted with a diuellish Doctrine, that (vnder the subbanned name of a tyrant) would approoue and maintaine the Massacre of Kinges. O Deuill, and no man, thy parricide hand is not hindered, but dares boldly imploy the vse of that hellish liberty, in a most detestable sacrilege, against God, against his Anointed, and against thy natural Prince. O Sunne, thou bright day-bribery, that heretofore veiled thy golden Tresses, and didst with-hold thy heavenly looks, from the infamous house of the Pelopides, and the enraged abiding of Buphales that unworthy Romane Citizen, because thou wouldst behold no Butcherics and massacres: how couldest thou keep thy Chariot in his ordinary way, but with one touch of thy hand turned it from way effe, that this day might haue bin couered with darknesse?

Among insect or injured Creatures, Bees (sayth Pliny) do so much honor their head and King, as they will not liue after the losse of him. And among other Animals, haue we not (almost) an infinite number, that haue conſected their liues for the defence of their Masters? Quintus Curtius, as one of the fairest ornaments of his History, brings in the Elephant of K. Porus, which Elephant seeing his Master on the ground, and the bloody barrel giuen him by Alexander, with his trunk drew him softly out of the crowd (as fearing to hurt him) notwithstanding all the pikes and staves of Lances, being thrust into his breast and sides.

The Seythians also do eternize the memory of a Horse, who seeing his Master slaine, became the reuenger of his murder, neuer ceasing till (with his heeles) he had instantly beaten out the braines of the murderer. The Dog of Hesiodus is also remembered, because he attained the children of Ganius, for the murder committed on the person of his Master.

But that which our owne Fathers haue seene, is much more memorable, of a worthy Dog, belonging to a Groom of the Chamber, attending on King Frances the first. Which Dog, not satisfied with the apprehension of him that had slaine his Master, in the Forrest of Fontaine-belleau; but being present (by command of the Prince) he rent him in peeces, before the face of the whole Court, that then were gathered together, to behold this spectacle. O most strange case, that brute beasts (shall lose, respect, and reuerence their Kings and Masters, and creatures reasonable (yet without all reason) contrary to Nature, or any instinct of her, shall foyle their felonious hands, in the sacred & venerable blood of their Prince.

Tertullian, speaking of Kings; Secundis Iust post Deum (saith he) ipso quos & Deum optinimus maximum nullum est medium. They are next after God, between whom and the greatest God, there is no mean. Homer, by a name more proper, doth call them, The children of the great God; as they that do very neere participate in the beames of his diuinity. The Greekes were wont to call them, Bazilees of Bazis, which signifies a Foundation. As in the holy Scripture, one of them is called Femur, the Thigh, he being as the Thigh, base and foundation, whereupon the repose of the State and people is supported. But to what end are all these Epithites, both sublime and diuine, in comparison of The most Christian King, the eldest Sonne of the Church, which Titles our kings attained vnto by infinite merits, euen from the Cradle of Christian Religion.

If Emperours haue done any good to the Apofolicall See, what deuotion can compare with that of our Kings? Clodius, the first Crown-bearer among so many kings, offered a Diadem of inestimable value, called Regium, vpon the Altar of S. Peter: the which Diadem, according as some of our Historians haue written, ser-ued for the Tiaras to the holy Fathers presiding in the Church. What shall I say of Charles Martell, who received from Gregory the third, the keyes of the Sepulcher, and the Chaires wherewith S. Peter was bound? was not this done, as acknowledging him the Churches Protector, and yielding him an honourable summation, for defending that holy Toombe, and excellent prerogatives thereto belonging, against the fury and inuasions of the Lombards? Against whom, this Prince began to arme himselfe, when at the very first report of his preparation, the Lombard yielded, and submitted himselfe to the holy See.

I cannot let sleepe in silence, the piety of king Pepin, who went twice ouer the Alpes, to check the inuasions of the said Lombards, against Stephen, then sitting in the sacred seate. There remaineth (yet to this day) an ancient inscription, engrauen vpon one of the Towers of Rauenna; Pipinus plus primus amplificande Ecclesie viam aperuit, &c. Deliuering testimony to all Christendome, of that Princes gift and liberality to the Church. Charles-maigne, Philip Augustus, S. Lewis, many Kings among them, & many others since then, euen vnto our time, haue no way degenerated from this affection, in piety & succour answerable to the former Kings; and their enterprizes were most commendable & perillous, to maintaine the truth, and to confound the Sarracins, Mahumetists, and other sects of Infidels. VWhereof matter sufficient is giuen to our Historians, to make their volumes the more compleat; and to Innocentius the third, a worthy subiect of writing, in an Epistle which he directed Archiepiscopo & Episcopo per Galliam constitutis; Exaltatio regni Francorum est sedis Apostolice sublimitas. And if that execrable and diuelliish murderer, had not impeached the course of the great designs, and holy intentions of this King (O France, for whom thou now too iustly lamentest) he had shaken the Scepter of the Turke, and we might well haue hoped, to haue seene our faire Lillies glister in the Church of the Eastern Empire; & once more to haue made the true God worshipped in Palestine.

Then, O vnhappy Realme of France, redouble thy sorrowes, and reuiue the fource of thy teares, as often as thou shalt rememremember the death of this Prince. A Prince? yea, thy Shield, and the Shield of the mighty, proditoriously overthrowne in the Capitall of his Prouinces. Oh that I could (in this case) according to the manner of a Pegasus, strike with one foote into a fountaine of eloquence, or that the Muses and the Graces meeting together, would giue new motion, or rather new life to my languishing Oration, that I might reach to the point first propoled to my selfe, which was, either to lay open before you the praises of my King, or to let you see his life and heroycall vertues, and how much we are interested in his losse. These two attempts were very great, and if I feele my selfe to shrinke vnder the weight of the first, I must needs fall flat the with the charge of the second. Because the wretchednesse of a priuation can neuer be really vnderstood, but by knowing the excellency of the thing whereof we are deprived; so said (long agoe) a learned Philosopher.

For as a Player of Comedies, may easily bring forth vpon his Stage, a man of goodly shew, in shape of Hercules, couered with a Lyons skinne, and beating a long great Club on his shoulder, but yet made light and hollow within, and at this dreadfull appearance, comes nothing neere the vertues and incomparable strength of the true Aleides: Euen so an Orator may easily produce some grosse description of great Henry, that most invincible Prince, giuing him golden Armour, mounted on a gallant Courser, attended with Drums and Trumpets, in midst of a confusion of armed men, a thorny wood of Pikes and Lances about him, and as the last ornament of renown, writing with an Eagles quill (yet lagging weary with circling the world) to make knowne to the two Poles, the admirable batailles wonne by this Monarch, and all this nothing indeed to great Henry the 4. This were no other then a nicere phantasm, because his inward man, with his principall vertues, remained still hidden the viciacies of his spirit, the heates of his generous courage, and that true countenance of Majesty, which carried on his brow the loue of his subiects, and terror of his enemies: these are things that strike dumbe all tongues, and are not any way to be declared. The interest and the damage then, which the whole world endu-reth by his death, can neuer be sufficiently declared. Euerie man by himselfe (from the least to the greatest) may frame out his owne discourse, and finde himselfe immeasurably offended: yet all this is nothing else, but as if each man should point with his finger at his owne heart, and no judgment to be made, whose paine is the most greuous?

Synganbis, the Mother of Darius, her Nieces and other Persian Ladies wept more extremely for the death of Alexander (saith the History) then did the Greeks and other Macedonians. For he was the common bond of peace, and hee being broken, they found themselves (among all them which he had left) the very weakest, furthest off from succour, and most subiect to the iniuries of warre. Without all question, our sorrow hath bin common through the whole State, for this vnhappy accident, false vpon the common and publike head. Our Princes pierced through with griefe, haue (to the whole world) sufficiently witnessed their affections. The great men stand fast on the board, the lesser serue as poore Pawnes, & they haue the greatest cause to complaine. That great chaine or bond of peace, which vnted together so many kindes of spirits, is broken in the midst; yet peace and vnity (God be thanked for it) doth still remaine among vs.

As an Arrow shot from a good strong arme, flyeth farre through the ayre, not in regard of his owne proper or naturall wings, but by the Archers vertue who (in the loofe) gaue it the vigor of aduantage; euen so our peace as yet continueth by that strength and vertue, which the high vnderstanding and credite of our deceased king gaue vnto her. If we war against abuses, if vices may be cut off, and vertues replanted; wherefore should not this strong bond be new knit againe? But if they encrease, as they do, look then (deare people) for your danger to be neere. The mighty can daily maintaine themselves; but the weak and feeble, they altogether vndergoe the worst, especially when disorders continue.

In this case, the body of a Common-wealth, and that of a beast do carry some resemblance. For as the members (which are found) doe not finde themselves so subiect to rheumes or distillations, but to loone soone as they present themselves, do send them to the diseased parts: Euen so, in a body politike, those great overflowings that engender discords, do not so nece- rily touch the strongest in the State. Noblemen, as being more robust & power- full, know how to hurle such annoyances behinde them, and then their weight falls vpon the vulgar, who are composed of slenderest resistance. Who seeth not then that the principall interest is ours? It is vpon vs that this blow is false. That fatall knife hath ript open our breasts, and hath sluiced forth our blood, euen so farre as the very furthest Nations; who wholly a- frighted at so damnable an attempte, haue testified, that this disaster was in common to them, communicating likewise in our sighes and teares.

But now wee sacrifice ouer much vnto griefe. O France! thou must giue a brea- thing time to thy sorrowes; thy great Hen- ry yet liueth, God hath not left him after so many victories; he hath rather snatcht him from beneath the armes of a tempo- rary peace, to lodge him in his euertlasting rest, & made him change the South-east of his Lillies for an eternal Diademe, the flowers whereof are without number and value, and the glory void of any date or li- mitation. This life hath nothing in pro- priety; what any man holds here, it is but as a deposit or pawne, it is but for a short- space, and a present of slender continu- ance. Spuma grauius, quae apracella dispergi- tur, saith the wise man: Fumus qui a vento diffusus est. It is a highway common to kings & subiects alike to the haughty, and to the humble. Omne capax mouet vna no- men. Death (not withstanding he is famili- ar to vs) yet in his passage along, if he hit his foot against a shepherds cottage on- ly, or if a poore labouring man meet with his sickle, these are blowes that moue no terror. But contrariwise, when he finites the greatest into the bottom of a tomb, when he shatters Crownes in peeces, and breaks royal Scepters with a touch of his Biere, this is that which moueth astonish- ment in men, this is that wherein they see themselves, euen as in the clearest Chry- stall, best representing to the life, the de- fects of their fraille and wretched nature.

They that haue contemned God at their life time, may take example by Enlilad, lost in the loue of his owne peccall: or by Belshazzar, who afterward becoming a knight of Athens, tooke a Grasshopper in the fields of Egretum, whereby he learned and came to acknowledgment of his lifes thornes. Whereupon, he builded a house of piety, in contempt of himselfe; where- in bequeathing all his hopes to God on- ly, hee founded life and saluation for his soule. For, as a goodly Rose in rainy wea- ther (being prickt with a pinne) will send forth a marvellous pleasing saueur; euen so, the degrees of a great State, being prickt in the death of their King by the in- tolerable piercing thornes of bemoaning, do then send vp to heauen the most sweete Odors of infinite prayers, whereby they procure Diuine blessings to descend downe vpon their heads.

This is also the benefite, which (among our teares and laments) we ought to seeke for in our losse, because euen therein God himself hath giuen vs matter, whereby to comfort our selues. Set before your conceits, that great deluge of waters, which (in the time of Noah) drowned the whole world. Neuer did heauen before, or since, deliuer so great a sign of anger against the sins of men. And yet notwithstanding, a- mong all the billows and floating of dead bodies aloft on the waters: the height or top of an oliue tree did shew it self, where- of the Doue broght a presentation to the good old man, as a symbol of grace, carry- ing an assured testimony, that the over- flow should soone cease, & the Ark be deli- uered from all perils whatsoeuer.

Euen so, in the frightfull deluge of tears, which appeared to swallow vs all vp in the waues, wee haue a factt Oliue plant, a branch of that sacred tree, euery way an- swerable to that holy Doue, verily raised to this purpose by the holy ghost, to bring this aged French State a thirteenth Zeph- ir, the lively image of the great Henry; so lately taken from vs. Lewes I say, the most Oliue branch sent from heauen, to pre- sent our great mercy; vnder which we are to expect the increasing of all those choise vertues and felicities that wee felt vnder the flourishing teigne of his Father.

In behalfe of whom, I may wel (O France) address those speeches to thee, deliuered by the wise King Salomon. Beata tu terra, cum Rex: cum filius iust. & obliuiscens. Bless'd be thou (O Land) when thy King is the son of a Noble. Happy art thou O France, for thy King

CHAP. V.

The Battell of Rauenna:

Which was fought in Italy, in Anno, 1512. betweene Gailton du Foix, Duke of Nemours, General for Lewes the xij. King of Fraunce, on the one party: and Raymond de Cardonna, Viceroy of Naples, General for the King of Spaine, and Pope Iulio, on the other.

HE Generall of the French Army in Italy, being named Gailton du Foix, for Lewes K. of France, against the Pope and King of Spaine, being giuen to understand that the opposit powers for the Pope and Spaniard were marching onward (according to a former passed promise) for giuing assistance vnto Marco Antonio of Cardonna, who was besieged by him in the Cittie of Rauenna; mid-doubting some sodaine irruption in his politike enemy, brake vp the sledge, making a retreat for the space of some three miles from Rauenna; as it were to meete with the leagued army. That night they made a bridge ouer the riuer of Ra- ueno, and leuelled the highest banks equal with the Riuer, for the easier passage of the Souldiers in all places. Afterward the 11. day of April, being then Easter day, the Germane foote souldiers made their passage ouer this made Bridge of the Riuer: but the souldiers appointed for the vaward and middle battell, they went thorow the Foord. As for the rere-ward, being led by Don Iuo de Alegrre, and consisting of four hundred bolde resold men, they remained still on the riuer bank towards Rauenna, for better assisting the maine army when neede requir'd, and curbing the Garrison of Rauenna, if they should presume to fallle forth. But for keeping a Bridge (formerly made vpon Montano) hee left a valiant Gentleman, named Paris Scot, with a thousand foote vnder his charge.

All things being ordered in this manner, his battailes were ranged in this order. The vant-gard, that had the great Artillery before them, consisting of 700. horse, beside beside Germane foote, led by the Duke of Ferrara, and the Seneſhall of Normandy, this power was placed on the bank of the river, being then on the right hand, whereby the foot troopes flanked the left wing of the horse. Somewhat nere to the vanguard, the foot appointed for the mid battalion, being partly Gaſcoignes, and the rest of other Prouinces in France, tooke their charge, and Don Iuo de Alegres was their Commander. Further remote from the River banke, the reregarde had their place, being in number five thousand foot and all Italians, vnder the conduct of Federico de Bozzolo; and this battell was flanked by all the Archers mounted on horsebacke, and other light horsemen, amounting to three thousand.

These battailles were not ordered to rere one another, but in the shape of a Cressant or halfe Moon, and directly behind them were marshalled six hundred well appointed horse; conducted by Seigneur de la Palice, and the Cardinall Sauuerino, Legate for the Councell of Pisa, who bent their intentions against the Pope. He was a man of so meane constitution, full of heate and courage, armed Cap a pie in faire bright glittering Armor, and meeter (in dede) for the office of a Commander in field, then to supply the place of a Cardinall. As for Gaſton du Foix, aiming onely at honour and victory, he would not betake himselfe to any particular charge in the Campe; but selecting from thirty choise Gentlemen, such as he thought fit to share with him in his best fortune, of the day; wandered at liberty, as to bee prouident in all places, and for the readier helpe, where neede should require.

He was the man of best marke amongst them all, not onely in regard of his splendid Armes, but likewise for his sprightly countenance, dreadfull carriage, & resolution no way to be daunted. Having ranged his battalions into such due form, as nothing wanted but the signal for fight aduancing himselfe on the bay of the River, where best he might haue attention, and animate his army with boldest spirit, more eloquently then Souldier-like (as some suppose, thus he spake.

The Oration of Gaſton du Foix, before the fight, to his whole Armie.

M Fellow-Souldiers, the thing which you haue so long coveted & desired, to wit, to encounter the enemy in an open champaign ground: behold how Fortune hath this day bleit ye withall, as not forgetting her former Motherly care of ye, in many a famous and well-known victory. See what a gracious opportunity is heere presented to ye, such as precedent times, nor memory of man hath euer acknowledged, victory bowing ouer your heades, embracing ye within the very winges of her bounty, not onely for Rauenna it self, fully and meerey prostrated to your power: but likewise all the Townes and Citties of Romania, though but slender attributes of recompence to your high deserts; yet as an earnest of her further intended fauour vnto ye. For, finding Italy naked and empty, not a man left to stand or encounter with ye: what shall hinder your marching on to Rome it selfe? Seeme as if (euen now) you saw your entrance into it; and consider withall, the boundlesse wealth of that gripple and greedie Court (for many ages together) baled & violently torne, euen out of the bowelles of poore abused people, and iustly ordained now to be at your mercie as pillage and spoile. Proud Ornaments, Silver, Gold, precious Stones, all in heapes, and numberlesse summes, beside most rich and sumptuous prisoners, you may already plead full possession of the wide world standing amazed at your fortunes. And Rome thus being yours, Naples lies fairly before ye, inviting ye to com together with the same successe, and there to reuenge your manifold iniuries.

When I consider your valour, fortune, & famous victories, woe within the compass of so few dayes, when your manly looks, and more then manly actions, do quicken my memory, that there is hardly one among ye, but hath made good proofe of his courage, by apparant and pregnant testimony of his great spirit: there is not any objection whatsoever, to forestall the assured felicity of victory. What are our enemies, but the verie same Spaniards, that (meerey upon our coming) fled fled by night out of Bologna. Nay more, they are the same white-liver'd men, that (not many daies since) escaped our swordes by base running away, seeking within the wals of Imola and Faenza, or the neighbouring mountains. They are a nation that neuer durst fight with our armies in the Neapolitan Kingdom, in any place of indifferencie or easie access, but euer more upon advantages, being supplied with munitions, rivers, and ditches, as relying more on close bidambushes & treacheries, then on any sort of manhood or valor.

And yet let mee further tell ye concerning these Spaniards, that they are not those tried and ancient well-skild seruitors to the Neapolitan wars, but meere fresh-water Souldiers, utterly without skill or experience, neuer fighting against other weapons of resistance, but Bowes, Arrows, & the blunted Lances of the Moors. And yet notwithstanding, by that timorous people, weak in body, worse in spirit, wanting knowledge in armes and military actions, they were (with great shame) overthrown the last year, in the Isle of Gerba. And there this very man, Don Pedro de Nauarro, one of so great note & name among them, that by taking himselfe to his heeles, hee deliuered a notorious testimony of the difference betwene the beating downe of wals with shot and powder, & fighting with true fortitude & hardiment. See how they are shut up within a ditch, made this last night, euen in meere trembling feare, & how their foot-armes covered with a rampier, consisting of Carriages & hooked waggons, as meaning to try the battell with those childish instruments, & not with the Marrow, Muscles, and Arteries of men, or with the chearfull vivacity of spirit. Make no doubt (deare hearts) but our great Ordinance shall drive them out of their holes, and beat them to the open field: where they shall plainly perceiue, that the power of the French, the courage of the Germanes, and unconquerable resolution of the Italians, doth go far beyond the cunning subtilities of the Spaniards. The greatest obfuring of our glory, is that we overmatch them in number, being (euer) twice as many as they. Neuertheles, seeing fortune hath bin so bountifull to vs, it were indifferencie not to make use of so happy a benefit, which will rather be imputed to mercy and providence in them, then to any cowardly advantage in vs. Nor doth courage or valour incite them on, but the authority of Fabritio de Colonna, in his rash promise made to Marco Antonio, or rather the instice of heauen hath thus prouoked them, to the end, that the pride and unpresackable heynous actions of Iulio, that false and counter-fet Pope, as also the deceitfull treacheries of the King of Arragon may haue condigne and worthy punishment.

But why wait I time in so many words? Or why should this victory be so long kept from ye, by this cumbrantiall speech in a skilful Oration, utterly needlesse for Souldiers of valiant spirit? March on then my valiant fellows in armes, with full assurance, that this day I shall giue the whole Empire of Italy to my King, & the wealthy people among you all. Your Captaine and Commander, will be present with you in every place; and, as I can haue done, so this day more especially will I support my life vnto all perils, rather then a man of ye shall carry. Nay, I shall repute myself for the most fortunate Captaine that euer was, seeing that by this dayes victory, I shall not onely make my soldiers most glorious, but the richest of all other Armies, within the compass of three hundred yeares.

This Oration ended, and the aire echoling the noise of Drums & Trumpets, the Spaniards espying the French past the river in this manner they ranged their battalies. The vanguard, consisting of 800. horse, and conducted by Don Fabritio de Colonna, stood placed along the banke of the river, wherto was added 600. foot on either hand. Likewise along the River, stood the middle battell of 800. horse; being flanked with 4000. foot, the Viceroy being the Leader thereof; & with him the Marquess of Paluda, as also Don de Medici, legat to the Pope. Moreover, along the same river bank stood the rereward, conducted by Cardinall a Spaniard; & in that battell were 4000. horse, and 4000. foot. All the light horsemen (whose General was Dauales, Marques of Pescara, a very yong Gentleman, but of exceeding great hope guarded the right side of the foot behind, for succoring any part that fainted. The great Ordinance was placed in the front of the horse, & Don Pedro de Nauarro General of the Spanish foote, accompanied with 500. horse, had not any place of certainty, but had planted at the ditch in the front of the foot, 30. waggons, like to the crooked Chariots vfed in ancient time. Whereon he had placed field pieces, and very long Bowes speares, for easier sustaining the furious feaze and charge of the French.

In this order they expected the assault & charge of their enemies strong army, with in the munition of the ditch, but this counsel, as it profited nothing in the end, so in the very beginning it appeared to be pernicious. For it was the mind of Fabrizio de Colonna to invade the enemies, so soon as they began to come over the River, as thinking it more commodious to encounter with one only part of the enemies, the to abide in the camp, defended but with a single ditch. But when Don Pedro de Navarra (whose counsel the Viceroy followed) repugned this advice, it was decreed (though nothing providently) that they should be suffered to pass over the river. The French being come within 200 paces of the ditch, stayed, perceiving that their enemies, kept themselves within their camp, not stirring any further, least they should give their enemies such advantage, as themselves desired to have.

on this side.

For more then two houres, both the armies were thus at a stand, but no meane store of shot came from the great Ordnance all that while on either side, whereby the French foote endured great detriment. For Navarra had planted his artillery in such a place, as he might at his pleasure hurt them; but the Duke of Ferrara made great haile, & brought his Artillery in the rear of the army, to another wing of the French, where the archers on horseback were planted, which wing, in regard that the army stood in the form of a crescent, was (we know) on the rear of the enemies, from whence he beganne cruelly to flack their sides, especially of the horse, for the Spanish foote being brought by Navarra, into a low place along the rampier of the river, & (by his command) laid flat on the ground, could no way be injured by the shot. Fabrizio called out aloud, and urged the Viceroy by messengers, often sent to begin the battell, before they were torn in pieces by the great Ordnance. But Navarra being guided by puerile ambition would not agree thereto. For, in regard he had promised himselfe victory, only to show the valor of the Spanish foote, yea, & although at the rest of the army were slain, yet he imagined, that his glory would be the more augmented, the more y harmes were heaped on the rest of the army.

The wilfull
obstinacie of Don Pedro de Navarra.

By this time, the men of armes and light horse, had endured so great a slaughter, as it could be no longer borne, and as a most miserable & dreadful spectacle, here horses, there men from off those horses, fell down dead, and heads & arms being torn from the rest of the body, were seen flying aloft in the aire, whereat Fabrizio beganne thus to exclaime, *And must we all (quoth he) here shamefully see the wilful perishment of one Marston? Must this army be utterly left, and not one enemy slain by us? Where are our former Troopers over the French? Must the honor of Spaine and Italy perish, for one only Navarra? No sooner had he spoken these words, but without staying for the signal, or any command from the Viceroy, he drove his horsemen over the ditch whom the rest of the horse following, Navarra was forced presently to give the signal to his Regiment, & they rising with violent fury, encountered the Germanes, who were by. this time come verie neere them. So the battels being met pelmed on all sides together, it was wonderful to behold; & surely this battell was the greatest that ever Italy had scene in many yeares: because that at Terra was hardly any thing else, but a strong encounter of horse. And the battels in the kingdom of Naples were rather disorders of array, or rash attempts, the deservedly to be termed battels. And as Giavada da, the smallest part of the Pemians power had fought; but here two potent armies fought with harts firmly combined, either to vanquish or dy. Being enflamed, not only by perill, glory, and hope, but also mutuall hatred, which severall nations bare each other. In the encounter of the German foot with the Spaniards two Colonels of great fame the one named Jacob Emser, a German, & Zamudo a Spaniard, fought as if it had bin by way of challenge, before the fronts of the battails: in which fight, the Spaniard killing his enemy, became the conqueror. The horsemen of the Confederates, were not comparable to them of France; beside that day they had bene so endangered, and merely torne by the great Ordnance, that they were thereby made farre inferior. So that, after they had a while sustayned the force of their enemies, rather by shoumes of stomacke, then strength of body, and Allegres sending for Palice with the reward, and the thousand foote also left at Adonia, they were charged on all sides.*

The valiant

and his

Fabrizio de Colonna fighting very valiantly, had bin taken by the Duke of Ferrara Soldiers. Wherefore, seeing themselves no longer able to hold out against the enemies fury, & enlisted also by the example of their Captaines, turned their backs likewise. For the Viceroy and Carrual, neuer tarrying the vermouthfull trial of valour in their Souldiers, ded; leading away with the reward, almost whole and vnrquite. With them also fled Antonio de Leuca man (as then) of infinite condition; but afterward being exerted in all degrees of martiall seruices, became a very famous General.

Now all the light horsemen were querthrowne, and Pescara their Captaine, weltering in blood & wounds; was taken alive, and so was the Marquisse of Paluda, who brought the second bargail into the fight, through a field of ditches, bushes, & bryars, which much disordered the array. Beside, the field was covered wholly (as it were) with the mangled bodies of men & horses, which proved no small hindrance to them. But yet the Spanish foote being for lacke of the horsemen, fought with incredible fiercenes. And although they had big shot what is pulled, at their first encounter with the Germanes, by reason of the strong ranks of Pikosi (yet after they came to the reach of their Swords, many of the Spaniards (being covered with their Targets) got between the legs of the Germanes, wounding them in those disarmed parts with their Daggers, and so committing a very great slaughter among them, attained (almost) to the midst of the battail. Among whom the Gascoigne foot, having won the way between the River and the Rampier, had sharply charged the Italian foote, who although they had sustained great losse, by the Ordnance playing hotly upon them, yet they had utterly expelled them, if Allegres had not given a fresh and violent charge on them with his horsemen, & with greater force & good fortune. For when he saw his son Viduares slain in his fight, and almost at the very first encounter, he unwilling to furnish after a losse so great, and goddous, ranne in with his horse, even among the thicket of his enemies, and fighting like a most valiant Captaine, after hee had slain many, was slain himselfe.

The Italian foote, when they could no longer hold out against so great a multitude, began to shrink, but part of the Spaniards coming to their succor, they kept still in the battail; and the German foote, oppressed by the other part of the Spaniards, could scarcely stand up any longer. Beneath all the Spanish troops of horse being put to flight, Gaston de Foix, with a great multitude of his horsemen, set themselves to the Spaniards, and they retiring rather than dislodged out of the field, making good array, and in no part broken, took the way lying between the River & the high bank, going in advance all paces with their front very thick of men, and repelling the French with the strength thereof began to retire, and of order departed out of the field. Which Navarra beholding, was more desirous of death then life, & therefore not departing out of the battail, was taken prisoner. But slight-minded du Foix, not brooking to see the Spanish foote march thus away safely, & (Victors-like) with their whole ranks vnbroken, perceiving also, that the victory was imperfect, unless they were broken as well as the rest, a vehement fury, he charged on their rear with a troop of horse. But he being immediately enclosed in among them, and throwne off from his horse, or (as others say) oppressed with the pondering of his owne horse, was slain with a Pike thrust into his side. And doubtless, if they ought to wish for death (according as common opinion is) that have attained to the highest degree of felicity, then assuredly, the death of this noble Count de Foix was most ynfürfortunate, having gotten so glorious & eminent a victory. He dyed a very young man, having now won (among all men) immortal fame, because within the space of 5 Months, (being a General, almost before he was a Soldier) with incredible celerity & good success, he had gotten so many glorious victories. This Lord Laureach (his Cousin german) having received twenty greivous wounds lay beside him, well neere dead; but being carried to Ferrara, was cured, by the diligent care and cure of good Chyrurgions. Thus through the death of noble du Foix, the Spanish foote were suffered to march away without impeachment. The rest of the Army was put to flight, all the bag and baggage taken, together with their Ensigns & Ordnance: as also the Pedro de Navarra taken prisoner.

Popes Legate, John de Medicis, Fabricio de Colonna, Nauarro, the Marquess of Padua, Bitonto and Pescara, and manie other Princes, the cheefe of the Nobilitie, and men of best name among the Spaniards and Neapolitans. The number of them that were slaine in this battell, is altogether vncertaine, yet among the variety of many reports, most do affirme, that (on both sides) there were slaine ten thousand at the least, whereof the third part were French, and the rest made vp among their enemies. But without all controversie, the losse on the victors side was farre the greater, by reason of the death of Du Foix, Alagres, and many of the French Nobility, as also of Jacob Emser, and other the valiantest Captaines of the German foot, to whose valour and manbood this victory (bought with such a deere effusion of blood) was chiefly attributed.

Moreover, many Captains of the Gascoignes and Piccards (which Nations lost that day all their glory among the French) were slaine with Monsieur Molard: but the death of Du Foix turpassed all other losses, with whom the courage, strength, life, and fiercenes of that army was utterly extinguished. The greatest part of the vanquished, that escaped from the battell, fled to Cesena, & from thence to further places: neither did the Viceroy stay any where, untill he came to Ancona, whether he brought but very few of his followers. For, the Duke of Prine, not onely raysed vp the Countenmen against them, but also sent souldiers to doe the like in Pesaro, onely they escaped safe, that passed thorough the Florentines Dominions.

And although after this battell, the victor Army tooke and sacked Ravenna, yet within very short time after, when the courteous Treasurer of Normandie (to fauour charges) had dismissed the Italian Souldiers; and part of the men of Armes were returned for France, and the Emperor had reuoked the Germanes: they were (by a new Army of Switzers that came in the Popes ayde, and with whom also ioyned the Venetians) quite dispossessed of the whole Dukedome of Millaine, and all that euer the French King had beside in Italy.

What they were whom the world tearmed by the name of the Sibyllae; Of their Prophecies: but more principally of those things which they spake concerning Christian Religion.

The History of the Sibyll, is generally held to be very certaine, because euery one (almost) knoweth, that they foretold and prophesied many things. Neuertheless, to know when, whence and what they were, what they did, & at what times they wrote and prophesied, is most familiar to him that hath read ancient and authenticall bookes. It made me therefore the more willing, to make a Collection of their history, and so much the rather, because it is a matter of no meane marvel, to contemplate the gift of Prophecy, which God gaue to those women in diuers manners. But particularly to prophesie of the coming of Christ, of his life, of his passion, and other great mysteries of our holy faith: these we do, purpose to speake of briefly, to the end, y the Ethnick Pagan may not any way excuse himself (although he will read but his owne bookes onely) no more then the Iew in reading his, and will not accept nor beleue our faith. I write this the rather, because (by common consent) those bookes were receyued among all the Gentiles, and the Sibyllae credited, especially by the Romanes, who in all their assayres and necessities had still their recourse to the Sibylline bookes, and tooke their best and most serious counsels from them.

All Historians, both Greeke & Latine haue written of them our intent then (shal best fit it selfe, without selecting to great a number, to make choise of the cheefest, the better to auoide prolixity, & set them down in some orderly maner. Diodorus Siculus, Pliny, Solinus, Seruius, Martians Capellus, Lactantius Firmianus, Elianus, Suidas, Strabo, Marcus Varro, Virgil, with the soundest part of all the Poets. S. Augustin, Eusebius, Orosius, and the more part of all our Historians, largely writeth on them.

red by God. Seruius on the fourth of the Æneides, and Lactantius in his first Booke of Diuine Institutions, nameth them, The Council of God. Suidas termeth it Prophecie. These Authors do not agree how many there were of these women, neither consent at what times; because some determine more, and others lesse. Martianus Capellus makes mention but of two, others remember foure, as Elianus doth in his variable histories. Marcus Varro recordeth ten, whereof Lactantius Firmianus speaketh in his first booke, & him I meane to follow.

The first was of Persica, named Samber, 10, of whom Nicanor maketh great mention, euen he that wrote the actions of great Alexander. Others say, that there was of Chaldaea, & others, that she was a Iewesse, borne in a town seated neare to the red sea, called Noa. Her father was named Berosus and her mother Erimantha: she composed 24 bookes in verse, wherein she recounted wonderful things, concerning the coming of Christ, his life, and miracles. But yet they were vnder concealment, and deliuered with an artificiall obscuritie, which was not to be vnderstoode of euery one: whereto al the other Sibyllae conformed themselves. So that Lactantius Firmianus without particularizing any one of them, describeth their particular Prophecies of Christ. Saint Augustin maketh a summary of some things, which this woman and the rest said of Christ, and (among other) these very wordes.

He shall be taken by the wicked handes of rubeleeneers, and they shall giue him blows on the face with their sacrilegious hands: & spit on him with their foule polluted mouthes: And he shall giue them his shoulder, suffering to be whipped, and he holding his peace, without speaking any word, they shall thereby not know whence his words came. He shall likewise be crowned with thorns, giuing him gall to eat, & vinegar to drink. Behold what fasting they shall make for him: so that then blind and ignorant people, thou shalt not know thy God, conuersing among men. But shall crown him with thornes, providing for him vinegar & gall. Again, the peile of the Temple shall be rent, & the plaine bright day at noone, shall be like night, obscured or darkened for the space of three houres. And when he hath bin in hel, he shall returne to life, and rise againe.

These wordes are so pregnant, that they are the very proper tearmes of the Euangelistis writing on Christ, and the verie saye that the Prophets prophesied, especially Esay, wherunto our holy Church giueth absolute beleefe. Beside, these Prophecies of the Sibyllae, are deuised fro the writings of Lactantius, S. Augustine, and Cicero, from Marcus Varro, & other Authors of the Gentiles, who dyed before the birth of Christ, as Lactantius approueth. And may moreover (of these felues) that they said, That he shall raise the dead; The lame & impotent shall walke and runne soundly; the deafe shall heare; the blind shall see; the dumbe shall speake plainly. A little farther is added, With fine lawes & two fishes, hee shall feede fine thousand men in the wilderness: and that which remaineth, shal serue for satisfaction to the hope of manie. Thusfare for the first Sibylla.

The second, they say, was a Native of Libia, and therefore named Sibylla Libica. Of her is large mention by Euripides in his Prologue called Lamia.

The third named her selfe Themis, and was surnamed Delphica, in regard that she was borne at Delphos. Other speakeeth Christippus, in his booke of Diuination: & this woman (according to Pliny) the Romans made a Statue vnto, and shee liued before the destruction of Troy: so that Homar hath fet downe in his workes, manie verses concerning her. Diodorus Siculus saith, that she was called Daphne, and was daughter to Tiresias, and that the Argiues hauing subdued Thebes, they sent her to Delphos, where afterward shee became a Prophetesse in the oracle of Apollo, so that (according to his relation) in that respect she was called Delphica.

The fourth was named Cuma, or Italiana, & not Cumana. Amalethea, of whom we shall haue cause to speake anon. She was a native of Cimeria, a City of Campania, neere to Cuma. Her learned and iudicious Prophecies, are written by Varro in the Punicke Bookes, and by Pliny in his Annales, and referred by Lactantius, and by Virgil in his Eglogue, which beginneth Sicelides musa, &c.

The fifth was that so famously remembred Sibylla Erythraea, who so clearly (by Gods assistance) prophesied the greater part of our Religion. V wherefore as Lactantius saith; In times long since, those Gentiles reputed it as folly, & a defect of braine, to sake of the Sibillaes verses: because they runner it out not how it might bee, that a virgin should have a childe; and other supernatural things which they wrote, being declared in Bookes of ancient Historians and Poets. Appollodorus writeth of this Sibilla, that the Greekes going to besiege Troy, shee prophesied to them that Troy should be destroyed. Wherefore, all those that speake of her, make her more ancient then the destruction of Troy: yet Eusebius maketh her more nouell, for hee woulde haue her liue at such time as Romulus lyued in Rome. And Strabo saith, that she liued in the time of Alexander the Great. The Verses of this Sibilla Erythræa, are recited by Eusebius; the first words whereof, being traduced into our language, are thus: Iesus Christi, Son of God, the Saviour: which is a most admirable thing to think on. The consideration of those verses, and their further addition, are set downe by S. Augustine, in his 18. Booke of the City of God, deliuering it in these expresse words.

The earth shall sweate, a signe of iudgement: from heauen shall come a King, who shall be King for ever: and further, known in humane flesh, to the end, that by his presence he shall iudge the world. By which means, the incredulous, as well as the faithfull shall see God with their eyes, exalted among his Saints. And in the end of the world, the souls of men shall appeare in their owne flesh, and hee shall iudge them himselfe, when the rounditie of the incited earth, shall be full of clouds of dust and grasse. Men shall cast away Idols and Images, and all their Jewels and riches. Hee shall penetrate the inferiour parts, and breake the gates of the darkest hell. Then shall daye and cleare light be given to the Saints, & the flame of eternal fire shall burne the Wicked. All secrets shall be discovered, every man shall be knowne of his companion: and GOD shall discover the Consciences and hearts of all. There shall be weeping and gasping of teeth, and the Sunne and the Starres shall bee darkened; the beavens shall breake, and the Moone lose her light: the mountains shall be humbled, and the valleys made equal with the hills. There shall not be any thing in the world that shall be higher or lower one than another: mountaines and valleys shall be even and plain, & all things shall similitude. The earth shall be dried, and converted to dust, Wells, springs, and rivers shall burne, and with the same fire shall the earth, sea, and ayre, be burned also. Then from heauen shall sound a Trumpet, with a dreadfull and horrible sound, and the earth in opening, shall discover the darknesse and confusion of hell, and the paines & torments of the miserable damned.

These things, and many more beside, are spoken of this Sibilla in those Verses, declaring clearly Christ God incarnate, with the last iudgement, and resurrection of the dead. Now these things, before they came to passe, were no way intelligible; & that was the reason, why the Ethnickes and Gentiles might holde them to be follies and mockeries. In like manner, this Sibilla Erythræa, knowing well that which should happen, concerning her owne selfe, spake these words: They will repute me for a blind & mocking propheteesse. Neuerthelesse, when those things which I speak shall be accomplished and verified, they will remember me, and no more tearme me a lyar, but a Prophetesse of the Great God.

The Romans had great store of the verses written by this Sibilla Erythræa, whereof Fenestella speaketh more at large, and saith: That by a decree of the Senate, they sent Ambassadors unto her, in regard of her Prophetesies: and that they brought backe great store of her verses, which they laid up in the Capitoll, with them which they had before. She was borne in Erythræa in Ionia, a Prouince of the lesser Asia, and abutting vpon Caria: this I relate the rather, because there are found many other Cities to be of that name; as one in Lydia, another in Bætia, another in Loeriu, and another in the Isle of Cyprus. But that shee was of that Erythræa in Ionia, Strabo is my Author, and saith, That it hath a Port on the sea, neere to a Mountaine.

Another Sibilla, being the sixte, was borne in a place named Piton, in the Isle of Samos, which is in the Ægeum sea, neere to Thrace: or else in the other Isle of Samos in the same sea, and opposite against Ephesus, for which cause, there was called Sibilla Samia, of whom further mention is made by Eratosthenes.

The seauenth in order, is Sibilla Cumana, named Amalthæa; others call her Demophila; and Suidas tearmeth her Ephyphila. Shee was called Cumana, because shee dwelt and prophesied in the Citie of Cumæ in Italy, a Prouince of Campania, neere vnto Baia. Of this woman man writeth Dionysius Halicarnassens, Solinus, Aulus Gellius, and Seruius. This Sibilla brought to sell to Targuntius, the proud King of Rome, nine seuerall bookes; neuerthelesse, Suidas saith, that it was to Targuntius Prifcus. For which Bookes, he demanded three hundred peeces of gold, monie then of great value: but because the price seemed excessive to the king, he would not buy them. Whereupon, she burned three of them in his presence, and yet demanded the same summe for the six that remained. Then the King thought her motion to be more impertinent then the former, and seemed to mocke her: whereupon she burned three more of the sixe, and told him, that she had but three left of the nine, and yet he should giue her as much for those three, as if hee had bought them all. The King being amazed at this her confident determination, and conceiuing (by good aduice) that those Bookes must needs containe some extraordinary great mysteries; bought the three at that price, which formerly he demanded for them all, and those Bookes were placed in the Capitoll, where they were held in soueraine reuerence & veneration.

Pliny saith, that she had but 3 Bookes in all, and that she burned two of them, & yet would haue as much for that one, as for all the three. But it sufficeth, that those Bookes were kept in great reputation, with them that the Romanes had of the other Sibillaes. For as Marcus Varro reporteth from Laetantius; the Romanes bestowed great cost and paines, in searching all Cities and Townes of Greece, Asia, and Italy, and brought to Rome all the Verses & Prophetesies, that could bee recovered of the Sibillaes; especially those of Sibilla Erythræa, for the care and safe keeping of which Bookes, fifteen men were particularly appointed, and none other but they might touch them. Fenestella sayeth, that when the Capitoll was burnt, the Senate sent againe, to entreate Sibilla Erythræa, to helpe them in those Bookes. In which respect it is to be presumed, that they had not at Rome the Bookes of Sibilla Cumana onely, but likewise al the rest. And that Sibilla, whereof Virgil maketh mention in the beginning of his 6 Book, who kept herselfe at Cumæ, where (he sayeth) Æneas tooke shipping; must needs be the other Cumæa, whereof we haue already spoken. For it can be no way likely, that Virgil should suppose a Sibilla, at such time as Æneas entred into Italy, nor that she liued till the fall King of Rome. Beside, Seruius interprets the same passage, saying, Or else it must needs be, that shee who sold the Bookes, was named Cumana, although it was not her name, and yet notwithstanding, she dyed in that City.

The eight Sibilla, is said to be a native in the Territory of Troy, in a place named Marmisa, and this woman is reputed to be very ancient. For Heracleides Ponticus saith, that she liued in the time of Solon the Philosopher, and of the great King Cyrus.

The ninth Sibilla, diuers Authors doe report to be of the Country of Phrygia, and that shee prophesied in the City of Ançyra; of which name were two Cities, one in Phrygia, and the other in Galatia.

The tenth Sibilla, named herselfe Albunea, and was borne in the City of Tibur, which standing fixteene miles distant from Rome, shee therefore was tearmed Sibilla Tiburtina.

Now, all these Sibillaes left many Bookes and Verses, wherein they prophesied of things that were to come, and principally of the fortunes of Rome, were they good or bad: so that in all important affaires, the Romanes would diligently search, and turne over the leaues of the Sibilline Bookes, and order their government wholly by them. And in the same manner, as when we would haue our speeches credited, we vse to say, this is Gospell: so would they say, these are the words of Sibilla; such was their credite & account among them. And for this cause Iuuenall said, Credite me vobis est solium recitare Sibilla.

Heereupon some said, that the Sibillaes gaue their answers, written vpon leaues of Trees, as Virgil witnesseth in his first Booke. Cicero speaketh of those Sibillaes with great reuerence, saying: As wee haue formerly done, euen so from the capitall Letters of their verses, we may deriue, great, good, and gracious sentences.

Among many other things, they haue spoken much of Christian Religion, concerning the birth, life, and death of Iesus Christ, as we haue already declared. Sibillas Delphica said, The Prophet shall be borne of a Virgin, without any fleshly copulation. Another said: Hec that is to come, shall come, and shall reigne in poverty, concealing his Sovereignty, and shall come from the wombe of a Virgin. And Josephus (although he was a Jew by race and profession) speaking of the Tower of Babylon, hath these words. Sibilla well remembered it, when she said thus. At such as men having but one Language, some of them shall build a very high Tower, as if thereby they would mount up to Heavens: God shall (even then) send great windes to destroy it, and divers Languages shall happen among the workmen, and therefore is the Tower named Babylon.

The acknowledgment of the Sibillaes writings.

These things, and others such like, were written by the Sibillaes, and acknowledged both by Christians, Jewes, and Gentiles, which the Gentiles (for their sinnes) fearfully vnderstood. But it fell our well for christians afterward, into whose hands these Bookes came, as Lactantius, Ensebius, S. Augustine: the knowledge of which Bookes, or the least part of their Prophecies greatly confirmed the Christian, and quite confounded the Pagane and Gentile. There is report made of some other, who were also named Sibillaes, because they were reputed to be Divineresses and Prophetesses: as Cassandra, the daughter of King Priamus, and Campusia Colophania, the daughter of Calcas, and Mania Thessalonica, daughter to Tiresias the Thebane; nevertheless, Historians speake onely but of these ten.

CHAP. VII.

Concerning the seven Marvailles and Wonders of the World; what they were; also in what severall parts and places of the World, they are remembered to bee by greatest Writers.

Such as have read ancient Historians, Orators, and Poets, do finde, that they make mention in many of their Books, of 7 Marvailles or Wonders of the World, and that they were in divers places. All they that have written, do consent to six, but concerning the seventh, there are variable opinions, and likewise a great difference, in placing one before another. Notwithstanding, I purpose to speake first of the wallles of Babylon, which are ranked in the number of these Wonders, & vpon good reason, because the greatnesse of the place, as also the scituation thereof, seemeth incredible.

In our former Volume, and in the Chapter of the diversity of Languages, wee have sufficiently declared, that they were founded in the same place, whereas Nimrod builded the Tower of Babel, and whereof the City tooke name. Concerning those wallles, according to the founded opinions, namely Iustine, and also as Trogus Pompeius saith, they were founded by the famous Queene Semiramis, Mother to Ninus. Diadorus Siculus, Ammianus Marcellinus, and Paulus Orosius doe maintaine the same, with the greater part of our Gentile Authors. Nevertheless, S. Augustine and Josephus in his Antiquities say, that they were builded by Nimrod, assisted by the proud Gyants then living. But bee it, that the foundation or reparation of them was done by Semiramis; it is sufficient, that they were greatly ennobled by her.

The scituation of the City was with a Plain on the one side, and on the other ran the River of Euphrates. The modell & figure of this City, was in a quadrangle, and the wallles wonderfully high, as also wrought with marvailous cunning. The matter was of stone, ioyned with Lime & Ciment, growing in the Mines of that Country; but especially in the great Lake of India, where sometime stood Sodom & Gomorrah, named Alphalida, which yeldeth such a kinde of slime or mud, as bindeth like Pitch or Glue, the very strongest that is to be found. Historians do disagree about the height and largenes of the circuit, which might happen, through the diversity of the measures they then used. Pliny saith, that the circuit of those wallles was threescore thousand paces, so that one of the squares was fiftene thousand. He also saith, that they were two hundred foote in height, which foote exceeded by three fingers breadth, the measure of the Romane foote: and the thicknesse was fifty foote of the same measure, which was (indeed) a matter very admirable.

Diadorus Siculus saith, that the wals contained in all round about 360 Stades, and that imitation. These Pyramids were certaine buildings, which began beneath in quadrangle forme, and so rose vp (in a diminishing manner) a huge height, in the shape of a painted Diamond. And yet notwithstanding, they were of such greatness and taulnesse, consisting of such and so many stones, as also wrought with such perfection, as it is no easie matter to describe them, neyther to winne credible opinion of them. And yet (me-thinks) things so sufficiently authorized, by Authors both Christians and Gentiles; men well-esteem'd and approv'd; their credence is not rashly to be slighted or denied. These Pyramids then are as very high towers, finishing in a spire or sharp point, and the etimology of the word cometh of Pyr in Greeke, as much to say, as fire, because it seemeth, that the height cometh to lessen and fayle, like as a flame of fire doth.

Among all other Pyramids, Historians make particular mention of 3 which were in Egypt, betweene the City of Alempois, which is now the Cayro, and the Ile that maketh or createth Nilus, named Delta, one of which is ranked among the seven wonders. For it is said, that to the making thereof, there were continually employed three hundred and threescore thousand men, and the work lasted twenty whole yeares. Many do affirme it, and particularly Pliny in speaking more amply, alledging twelve authors for his warrant, as Wisdorus Siculus, Strabo, Pomponius Mela, Herodotus, Ammianus Marcellinus, and many more, whereof some say, that the foundation and ground-work of this Pyramid, covered and contained eight dayes journey of ground: others say less, and most agree on fixe, and as many (little more or lesse) in the height. Pliny saith, that each quadrangle or square contained 883 foote in breadth. The stones were of Marble, brought out of Arabia, and Pomponius Mela maintaineth, that the most part of them were thirty foote in largenesse. Whereby may be gathered, that so many thousand men must needs be busied, some in cutting and squaring those stones, others in bringing and carrying them, and other in laying them, beside the mighty multitudes, employed for fetching them so far off, and about other necessary occasions.

Of the other Pyramids the like is spoken, at least of the other two fore-named, one whereof was made by the vanity of the Kings of Egypt, who were the very richest in all the world: as well by the fruitfulness of the earth, as in regard also, that no man possessed anything in proper, but only the King. Besides, after such times as Joseph the Sonne of Jacob, advised Pharaoh, to preferre the Corne in seven yeares abundance, as provision for the time of famine: during which space, by means of that Corne, he had all the Lands of his people. Thus you see how the Kings became rich, and were served by their subjects; even as if they had bene their slaves. And Historians doe faithfully report, that the Kings caused those Pyramids to be builded, only to feed their people that labored about the, and because they should leave no wealth to their successors. For they affected rather, to dispense in this manner with their people, than that any of their heyres should attaine the meanes to exceed the deceased by their goods and money.

I finde it recorded also, that those Pyramids served for Sepulchers to their Kings. And whosoever doth well consider the multitude of hebrew people that served in Egypt, and by whom the Kings made their Cities and Fortresses to be builded, will not be much amazed hereat, in regard that it is very certaine, that fixe hundred thousand men on foote, beside a great multitude of women & small children; departed out of that servitude, and that all of them were employed, and served in those wonderfull works. Whereby it is no marvaile at all, that such buildings should be made, for good Authors do avouch, that in Rootes, Garlike, and Onions, to sustaine the multitude of workers, there were dispensed 18 hundred Talents, which at the rate (now adaves veld) is a million and foure-score thousand Crownes. Diodorus saith that round about it, and a large compass also some-what farre off, there was not to be seene the very smallest house, neyther apparence that any man had trodden there, nor any signe of a foundation, but only Sand, as small as the finest Salt. Whereby it is med, as if that Pyramid had bene planted there, by Gods owne hand, or to haue growne so naturally, and the top appeared red to touch heaven.

If we set aside those ancient Bookes, we shal yet finde testimonies of our owne times. Peter Martyr of Millaine, a very learned man, who was Ambassadour for the Kings Catholique, Don Ferdinand, & Dame Isabella, to the Soldane of Egypt, in the yeare 1501. wrote a Booke of what he had seene and done in his Ambassage. There he declareth, (as he did the like by word of mouth) that he had seene those Pyramids, & agreed with that which those ancient Authours had written of them. Particularly, he speaketh of two scene by him, which were of incredible height, and saith, that he measured the square of one, finding it to be 315. paces; for that it contained about thirteen hundred in circuit, and on each side very huge stones made vp the buildings. Moreover he saith, that certaine men in his company, ascended vp one of them, with very great labour, & long space of time, and they declared to him, that on the toppe of all (as we vld to say) there was one stone wholly of it selfe, so great, as thirty men might easily stand vpon it. And when they were about, and they said, they seemed as if they had lost their sight, and only with looking downward, and tooke themselves to bee in a Cloud, such was the extremity of height, their braines being much troubled, and turned vpside-downe. So that (saith hee) there neede no doubt at all be made, concerning the great number of people employed, and the expences spoken of, in doing those works.

The fourth Meruaile or VVonder, was the Manfolas. Artemisia was wife to Manfola, King of Caria, a Province in the greater Asia. This woman (according to Aulus Gellius, and other historians) so dearly affected her husband, as it was generally recorded for a most notable example. Her husband the King dying first, he lamented his death with teares and complaints, more then were of ordinary custome. Needs would the eare & a Tombe or Sepulcher for him, answerable to the extraordinary loue shee bare him; and such (indeede) it proved to be, that it was recorded among the seven wonders of the world. The stone of the whole construure, was of a most excellent Marble, consisting of foure hundred and eleven foote in circuit about, and five and twenty cubites in height: it had also about it, fixe and twenty Colombs of admirable stature, and likewise of as famous sculpture.

The building was open on all sides, with Arches of seveny three foote in widenesse; and it was framed by the hands of the most exquisite workmen then to be found. The part towards the East, was made & engraven by Scopas; that on the North, by Briaix; the South side by Timotheus; and that on the West, by Leochares. The perfection of the work was such, and that on the whole body so sumptuous & beautifull, as partly it was therefore called Manfolas, and in regard also of the King, for whom it was made: so that euen to this very daye, when any Tombe of such superficiall Arte are made, they are called Manfolas. Of these things mention is made by Pliny, Pomponius Mela, Herodotus: Strabo also remembreth them, so doth Aulus Gellius, and many other historians. It is found written, that Artemisia, after the death of her husband, lived in continual teares and mourning, and that she dyed before the worke could be fully finished: having drunke the bones of her husband, beate into powder, which she burned and buried in her owne body, that it might be the Sepulcher for his.

The fifth Edifice of these VVonders was the Temple of Diana, whom the Gentiles adored as a Goddess, and it was builded in the City of Ephesus in Asia, in the Province of Ionia. Of this Temple, great speech was made throughout the world: so that one named Demetrius, wrote a particular Booke thereof: Pliny writing of this Temple; saith that the Amazons caused it to be builded, and that it contained foure hundred and five and twenty foote in length, and two hundred and twenty in largenesse. The worke was so admirably artificiall, that it had 220 yeares to the perfecting. It was built in a Lake, to prevent the perill of earthquakes; and it is said withall, that on the foundation was laide great store of coale dust, & wooll thereupon, the better to make firm and sure the moist and marthy place. It had an hundred and seven Colombs or Pillars of most excellent Marble, & each of them was made by all the Kings of Asia.

jas: thirty seven of them were of most curious cunning and sculpture, and all the other of the choicest Marble.

The principall Masters of this worke, according to Pliny, was Dreſſophon: but belesing Strabo, it was Archippon. Notwithstanding, this diversity of opinion is sufferable, considering, what length of time the businesse lasted: and therefore there must needs be more then one Master, especially for so many performances & varieties, in the diversity of such times and intelligence. Solinus and Pomponius Mela say, that the Amazones builded & dedicated this Temple: and yet Solinus affirmeth, that when the mighty King Xerxes went to the conquest of Greece, & that he burned all the Temples; yet hee referred this onely still standing. All Historians do consent with one accord, that the Pillars of this Temple supported the planked feeling of wood, the most excellently wrought that could be devised, and that this whole covering was of Cedar, and all the doores and waincotted works were of Cipres.

Yet afterward, a villaine seeing this solemne and fouraigne building, conceiued a lewd desire to burne it, as (indeed) he did. And being taken for the fact, confessed, that he did it to no other end, but to leave a famous renowne of his deed to the world. Wherefore Valerius Maximus, in his titles of desire of renowne, and Aulus Gellius affirmeth also, that it was prohibited (vnder grieuous penalty) that any man should doe so much as write his name, because he should vterly lose the fame and renowne, which he so earnestly affected. Yet all this serued to slender purpose, for Solinus and Strabo both say, that he was named Herostatus, and that of him came vp the vsuall Prouerbe, that when any man would strive to be famous for some vicious deed; people would commonly say: This is the renowne of Herostatus.

To speake yet of some other memorable matters to this purpose, it deserueth some respect to remember, that the very same day as the Temple was burning, Alexander the Great was borne, the Conquerour of all Asia; heereof are Authors, Plutarch in the life of Alexander, and Cicero, in his second booke of the Gods nature, where he speakeeth it in two places, and likewise in his booke of diuination. Further he saith, that while the Temple burned, the Sages prognosticated the destruction of all Asia; euen as afterward it was overcome by Alexander. Some do write, that this Temple was built againe afterward, in much more great and excellent manner then before, and that the Master of the worke was named Democritus.

THE sixt Wonder, was the Idoll or Image of Iupiter Olympus, which was in his Temple in Achaia, betwene the Cities of Elis and Pisa: and the place was named Olympus, as also the Temple, in regard of Iupiter Olympus, of whom write both Strabo and Pomponius Mela. They maintaine, that this Statue or Image, which stood in the Temple, was much renowned, as well for artificial perfection and admirable workmanship, as also for the greatnesse thereof. It was made of Porphyry, some say of Iuory, and by the hand of Phidias, the most excellent Caruer and Engrauer for Imagery (in Gold or Iuory) that euer was; albeit Pliny nameth diuers other. Strabo saith, that the excellency thereof consisted in the greatnes, and yet the matter which made it more admirable, was in being wrought of Porphyry, knit and vnitied together of infinite small peeces.

Some say, that Phidias was taxed with one onely imperfection, to wit, that hee had not proportioned the Image to the capacity of the Temple, because hee had made it sitting, and so great, as when due consideration was made, what the height thereof would haue bene, if he had made him standing vpright on his feet, the temple had no way bene able to haue contained him.

Neuertheless, the renowne of this Image did most highly illustrate the place, and made the Temple more knowne, then otherwise it would haue bene, although it was formerly held in great esteeme, by reason that in the very same place, were kept the sports and wrastlings called Olympian. And thence it came, that the yeares were counted by Olympiades, which they made from five yeares to five yeares: which passimes were first instituted by Heracles, and afterward being left off, they were againe re-established by Aemilius, but (according to some Authours) by Spiron, four or five yeares after the destruction of Troy, especially according to Enchiridion, and then began the yeare of the first Olympiade.

Now concerning the seventh Wonder, some say, that it was a Tower which stood in the Isle of Pharos, neere to the City of Alexandria in Egypt. Pharos was a small Island, long and narrow, seated on the coast of Egypt, ouer against the mouth of Nilus, which in former time (according to Pomponius Mela and Pliny) was wholly (as it were) engirt with firme Land, and afterward in the times of these Authors, the Sea embraced this firme Land, excepting onely a Bridge, whereby men went from the one place to the other. In the firme land is the great City of Alexandria, builded by Alexander the Great, which City was afterward a Colony of Julius Caesar. In this Isle (named Pharos, after the name of a great Pilot, which belonged to Amenelaus, and was there buried) the Kings of Egypt erected a Tower of Marble, maruailous in height and cunning workmanship, vpon a Mountain enuironed with water: the arteificial performance of which Tower was such, that it cost 800. Talents, which value foure hundred and fourescore thousand Crownes, after the computation of Biddams. And it was builded for no other purpose, but to set vp (in the night time) a lighted fire thereon, Beacon-wise, to guide and direct such Ships as came to take landing there: and this Tower, according to the greatest opinions, was erected by King Ptolemaeus Philadelphus, and the Master Architect that made it, was named Sitratius, which is confirmed to vs by Pliny.

Caesar in his Commentaries, highly praiseth the height and workmanship of this Tower; and saith, that it was also called Pharos, as taking name of the Island. As much faith Amianus Marcellinus, declaring the history of this Tower. Also Solinus in his Polyhistor, in the end of his 34. Chapter saith, that all the Towers which were afterward made, and for the like occasion, each of them was named Pharos, after the name of this, as was the Pharos at Messina, and in other places. And I am of the minde, that the kindled fires or lights, which are ordinarily carried in Ships, as guides to other in the night, yeppon this occasion are called Pharos.

Thus this Tower is the last of the wonders, although (by diuers) it is not named in their number, but in stead thereof, the hanging gardens of Babylon are reckoned, wherof we haue already spoken. Lactantius Firmianus confirmeth it, and saith, that these gardens were vpon Arches & Towers, yet felling downward, admittable for great Trees in no meane abundance, and great store of Fountains: the forme of this building is amply described by Diodorus Siculus, Caius Rhodiginus, discoursing on the seven Wonders of the world, doth not insert this Tower of Pharos; but the Obelisque of Semiramis, which was made after the same structure and forme of a Pyramid, for it began so in a quadrangle, and finished vprward in a point, and there was no difference betwene an Obeliske and a Pyramid; but that the Obeliske was all of one entire peece, and therefore of no such height as the Pyramids. I finde it written, that some of them haue bin great, like Towers, and of a very goodly fone. There is one now at Rome, nam'd a Needle, which was brought out of Egypt; and it is admirable to see the greatnes thereof, as also to iudge how it was brought thither. Concerning the Obeliske of Semiramis, wherof Catulus reporteth, and nameth it in the number of the 7 Wonders: he findeth it credibly auouched, that it was an x. 50. foot in height, and 24. foote square in a quadrangle, so that the whole circuite was 90. foote, and this Stone was so taken whole, out of the Mountaines of Armenia, & by the command of Semiramis, brought into Chaldean Babylon. But in truth, when due consideration is made, how it should be taken out of the Quarry, brought thence, and erected vp on end: it might appeare a matter incredible, if Antiquity had not yielded things as strange, and certified to vs by Authors, well deseruing beleefe, yea, and of other great Obelisks, made by the kings of Egypt. Pliny describeth how they are fetcht forth of their Quarries. Of the Pyramids, Obelisks, Statues, & Colosses, mention is made by Polyphius, in the beginning of his Booke, call'd Hypnerotomachia. Therefore I need not to make any further relation of them, fearing I haue offended already, by presuming ouer-farre vpon your patience, in what hath bin said, concerning these 7 Wonders of the world.

CHAP. VIII. The Oration of Antipater, the Father to Herod, which he made before Cæsar, standing accused, for following Pompeies part.

THE ARGUMENT.

After that Pompey had bin vanquished by Cæsar, he was massacred in Egypt, by them whose lives he had sometime saved. Antigonus the Jew, aspiring to the Royalty, accused (before Cæsar) Antipater the Idumæan, to have served and favoured Pompey in his enterprises. And that he had done no matter of service in Egypt, which could bee interpreted for Cæsar; but rather for the succour of Mithridates, and to cover his faults committed in following Pompey. But Antipater, for the better appearance of his good services, venting off his garments, shewed what wounds he had received in the service of Cæsar, and suddenly accompanied this scarry testimony, with these words ensuing.

The effect of the accusation objected by Antigonus against Antipater.

Wounds are a Soldiers speaking witness, when himselfe is silent.

BEhold heere assured and certaine witnesses, of my hatred against Cæsar, these wounds so apparent, and which are shining marks of my soules conceptions, to speak & defend the poore accused criminal. I offer to thee (Lord Cæsar) these wounds, as pledges of that affection which lies hidden in my heart, and wherof I make you a libell present. These are the gages of my faith, and this is an obligation written in my heart, and which will remaine engraven heere all my life time. If you will not please to credite my fellowes in Armes, nor to listen to the of my Nation; let it be demanded of mine enemies, and know from them, for whose sake I have received all these wounds. And what is the reason that I am thus pursued? but because I have bin noted, loyally affected, in offering you my faithfull service.

I understand and perceiue, that mine enemy reprocheth me with friendship to Pompey, and fixeth before his owne eyes, that I have favoured his cause. I confesse (Lord Cæsar) I confesse, that I have bin a friend, not to men, but to the Roman name; and that neuer my desires were elsewhere addicted, nor my duty & diligence any way applied, but only in doing my most humble service to the Senate and people of Rome. I have then born Armes, not for a Roman, neither for his particular profit, but for the service of all. And let the case be admitted, that Pompey was acceptable to me, that I carried his cause, and maintained his quarrell; wherein am I therefore to be blamed? Hee was long time (before) my friend, that hee had war with you, or any discord grew betwene him and Cæsar. Moreouer (my Lord) he was your Kinsman, and you were his Father in law. He being in Iudea, there was not any particular affection (whatsoever) that made me follow him: for I assisted him, as being Generall of the Roman Army. And yet notwithstanding, I neuer hazarded my selfe so far for him, neither did he ever finde such kinde knowledge of affection in mee, as (for his sake) to take so many wounds, as I haue received in serving you. It is for you that I gave the pledges of death; and for whom I became an enemy to mine owne body, exposing it to the Darts, Arrows, and Weapons of your enemies.

But is it any matter of amazement, if a slave, nursed vp in servitude, do not know what wounds are, nor the hazards happening in warre? Or should it offend any man, if a disloyall fugitive should be ignorant what the worth of faith is, and what honesty remains among good minded men? Who can reprove me, but this my perpetuall enemy and yours, for saying in loue and affection to the people of Rome? I am astonished, how Antigonus should be so hardy, as daring to blame or accuse any man before the Romans, against who it is his custome to make war, and that he should be so impudent, to make complaint before them, as if his Realme were snatched or ransomed from him. If it were so, yet his power should not bee exercised for his greatest or advancement: but only to, seize on you, to assaile the Roman Legions, & to practise vengeance against you for his father and brother. It much amazeth me, that such a wretch, & so vnthankfull as he is, feareth not the throne of the Roman Emperour, but dare (euen there) oppose and pursue innocents: without remembrance, that a Kinsman of his, and a companion in the crime, hath there beene punished for felony, treason, and revolt.

THE EFFECT.

Reason appearing (in Cæsars judgement) to be upon Antipaters side, he iudged also for him, and gave him the government of Iudea. By this meanes hee opened him the way, to give the Jewish kingdome to the children of the said Antipater, and dispossessed them that were of the blood Royall, and of the true seed of Dauid.

CHAP. IX. The Oration of Herod to his Martiall troopes, being vpon the point of fighting with the Arabes.

THE ARGUMENT.

Herod seeing that his Army stood like men amazed, as fearing a disadvantageable success of the warre, through (I know not what) superstitious conceits, grounded vpon prodigies and tremblings of the earth, which at that time had happened, and in regard wherof, his Souldiers shewed themselves very unwilling to fight against the Arabes: Hee laboured by this Oration to perswade them, that all such things are naturall, exhorting them, not to leave the victory to their enemies, for any distrust in them; and these were his words.

Fond prodigies and superstitious opinions conceived in mens braines, make them cowards to waile attempts.

THE forces of the enemy hauing bin enfeebled and abated by many of our aduantageable encounters, full of fortune to vs, and transporting them with furious despaire, yea, making them to massacre our Legates and Ambassadors: I cannot chule but merruall, how you should be thus affrighted without any occasion. At leastwise, it were reasonable and dreadlesse, without some good foundation, to preferre accidentall occasions to any euident successe, when men are assured of their owne vertue and forwardnesse. We haue had some encountering with the enemy, where the Arabes did not turne their backs vpon vs, & yet dealt but fraudulently (as they can well do) not to vanquish, but to delay vs from the victory: which matters, as they ought to encourage ye to the fight, so you should withall consider, that as you haue felt (I know not what) weakning of hart, by some earthquakes hapning, they should be no terrors at all to vs, no more then to the, who stand with vs to endure this war.

And if we would but respect, on whom the damage of this persecution is false, you should perceiue, that it is vpon the Arabes, constraining them to keepe themselves in the field, because they should be still before them, that far go beyond them in courage and valiancy. For I see, that they distrust their owne strength & manhood, and yet taking heart, on the hopefull ruine of our troopes, they will needs aduenture to endure the war. But alas, that is a feeble hope, which proceedeth not from his owne proper vertue and valour, but rather dependeth vpon others misery: inso much, as there is nothing more fraile nor mutable, then are felicities and aduersities hapning to men. For the estate & condition of humane occasions, whatsoeuer overthrowes they chace to feele, relieth vpon a very little time, & as felicity is neuer durable, then so aduersity can neuer bee perpetuall, and a man continueth no longer miserable, then hee had a precedent time to be fortunate. And of all these I can give you a goodly and most manifest example.

In the first fights, wee had the victory ouer the Arabes, but war taking his course and altering the lot and fortune thereof; we were vanquished by them whom (not long before) wee surmounted and outshew. Which therefore yeeldeth reason to beleue, that we shall againe conquer them which vanquished vs. considering, that presumption is alwayes guided by indiscretion and want of fore-sight, whereas aduised feare armeth men with prouidence, to fit themselves for following success, and thereby to learne duty and diligence. It neuer is otherwise in the state of felicity, but that boldnesse and temerity are equal companions, and want of discretion in Souldiers, neuer carries for the wise aduice & counsell of their Captaines; in briefe, they rush into the warre, without their leaue or commission. But I see that you are iudiciously fearefull, which makes mee to hold the victory so much the more assured. Courage then (deare friends and companions) take hart and hardiment, by aduancing the glorious and ancient magnanimity of the Iewes your Predecessours.

The vanity of mens felicitie and aduersitie.

Presumption maketh a man impudent, but discrete care maketh him wise.

Q 3

And

Ordinary and natural occasions shold
neuer breed difmay in Soldiours.

And let not the moanings of insensible things, breed any terror in you, neither carry any conceite, that earthquakes can be any argument or preface, of any other disaster or mishap, then what hath already happened. For the Elements haue their defects as well as we, and no other harme or danger is to be doubted, then what en- sueth to themselves: considering, that neither tremblings of the earth, nor mortality of creatures are but their owne iniuries, and signifie no other perill or preiudice at all.

And yet we should not feare to suffer matter of greefe, in regard that (already) we haue endured most afflicting and insupportable grieuances: he that hath punished vs, will bee appeased, and become againe as milde vnto vs, as if hee had not chastised vs. For what can we expect from him, after this irksome peltence, but only his holy fauour and mercy, seeing for two offences, he hath bin pleased to afflict and punish vs? For the rest, as concerning that which belongeth to this war, all is, in his entire condition; because the plague hath ended them that were not in the Campe, and our victory hath taken them from the enemy, eue those men that were the cheefest for his battailes. If our Flocks or Herds of Cartell are dead, the enemy hath had a losse of much better things, being bereft both of wit and sence, when (contrary to all right and equity) he slew our Ambassadors. The Arabes haue broken the law common to all Nations: for no people are so cruell and barbarous, but Ambassadors ought to be inuolubly respected of them.

Let them therefore expect from God, a iust vengeance for such crimes, to chastise their euill doing, for the finnes of our aduersaries are of such importance, as there is not any law, be it humane or diuine, that will leaue them unpunished. Let vs go forth then, yea, let vs go to fight; not to get their spoiles, or conquer their lands, but for the glory of God, and the defence of his honour. Let not the loue of your wiues and children put ye on to the war, but only the diuine fauour, which you know to be present with you. So going on this manner to the fight, our desires shall not be thereby effected, but our obedience to God, for doing vengeance on them, whom the Law forbiddeth any man to touch. Beside, Ambassadors are they, who (among the furies of armed enemies) onely mediate peace, & such men are neuer numbered or ranked with aduersaries; because their blood being shedde, cyeth incessantly for iust vengeance in our soules. Haste wee then in going to the fight, in regard that God is hee, which offereth himselfe to reuenge our friends slaine. The very murdred Ambassadors will fight for vs more furiously, and better then our selues: and ringed round with a squadron of Angels, let vs on to the battaile, and vtter confusion of our enemies.

Ambassadors

THE EFFECT.

By these words of the Generall, the Iewish Soldiours recovered heart, and seeking occasion to affront the enemy, at length assailed them with such fury, as the Arabes were enforced to fight, and had a great losse of men. Beside, such as fled, retired into the Mountaines; except a part of them, which yielded themselves to the Iewes. The rest, affecting rather to die like brave men, then submit themselves basely, fell to handy blowes againe, where they were slaine and beheaded in peeces, yet not without leaving sufficient testimony to the Iewes, of their valor.

CHAP. X. The Oration of Herod before Augustus Caesar, who had conceiued anger against him, because he had taken part, and followed Marke Anthony.

THE ARGUMENT.

Augustus Caesar, having vanquished Marke Anthony in Egypt, it seemeth he was aduised, that except he chastised Herod also, he was not fully possessed of the victory. Herod, having the euill affection of this Prince, went to him to Rhodes, where presenting himselfe, and using the generosity of an inuincible spirit, he declared to Augustus; that if he did not helpe Anthony, it was not through want of any good will, but because he had no meanes to do it. Affecting much rather, to confesse that he had bene an enemy to Caesar, then shew himselfe ingratefull to his friend. And although he presented himselfe before him, without a kingly Crowne on his head, and clothed like a man that had no dignity; yet his words expressed the Maiesty of a great Prince, and these were they:

Dileurs had measures wet offered to Herod, which made him
rather goe to Augustus, than to send his
him.

I Confesse (O mighty Monarch Augustus) that I haue bene a loyall companion to Marke Anthony in his sayres, as to the man, from whom I receiued the kingdom of Iudea. And I will not deny, but that I was very highly beholding to him, as I would more plainly haue expressed by Armes, if the enuy of Cleopatra had not giuen mee hinderance, and if the Arabes had not broken my designs and enterprizes. For which cause, and constrained by such necessities, I came not against you (in his assistance) with weapons in my hand: because I had no desire at all to forgoe my deare friend, and much lesse was I afraid to enter battaile against you in his behalfe; but onely in this respect, that I was busied in defending mine owne Countries. And albeit that I assisted him not personally in the battaile, yet Anthony found mee not vnthankfull to him; for I furnished him with men and victuals, for the succouring and refreshing of his Army, and I am well assured (Great Augustus) that you would not haue thought me ingratefull to Marke Anthony, if you had bene in the battaile at Actium.

You see Sir, that I hide not my selfe, fearing more to be reputed ingratefull on your aduersaries behalfe, then doubting that any one should imagine me your enemy. I make more account of your iudgement, then of all the successe of warre: because before you, the merits of vertue are not in any perill, in regard you know how to purchase honor, and punish mis-behaviours and vices. Consider (gentle Prince) that as I neuer forooke Anthony, so long as Fortune spake fairly to him: euen so, all disasters, and dead as he is, cannot yet make mee to forget and leaue him. You haue vanquished (O Caesar) you haue vanquished Marke Anthony by power, and by a great number of your Legions; you haue surmounted him by the wisdom of your Councels; the strength of the Empire hath cast him downe, from which hee was farre gone, and whereof he made not any reckoning;

your vertues haue ouerthrowne him, or rather he hath bene ruined by his owne vices. For an Egyptian woman charmed and enchanted him; the delights of Egypt made him too soft and delicate, yea, he was wholly effeminately drowned in the Alexandrian luxuries. In briefe, hee hath bene conquered, because he better affected to be cast downe with Cleopatra, then to conquer without her: and so to be delected by a woman, was more grieuous and insupportable to his friends, the euer it could be to his enemies.

I aduised him, to vntwine himselfe from that wretched woman, and to bee the death of a beast so dangerous; I promised him succour in his affaires, and forsooke to preuaile by his sight; yea, I offered to beare him company in this warre. But the miserable man, was so doating on the beauties of that woman, and meerey enchanted by Cleopatra, as hee is brought to be iust nothing, by reason that hee would not beleue me. I confesse (Great Caesar) that I am also conquered with him, but yet my offence is not so great, for although Cleopatra quite quailed, and made a dishonourable prey of poore Anthony; yet he had not the like power ouer mees. And as hee would not abandon that barbarous wanton woman, euen so could not I forgoe my great friend in his aduersities. It was hee that d.d. dicte a Royall Crowne on my head, neuertheless, I would not bee so bold to appeare in your presence, with the ornaments I receiued from so loyall a friend, fearing to offend you by those fauours which he did to me: & yet, although I haue left off my known lueries of dignity, I haue not lost a jot of my gremesse in courage. You may iudge therefore as it shall seeme best to your selfe; for whatsoever sentence you pronounce on me, yet I am sure to carry this reputation with me, and to my no meane contentment; that I was good and perfect in mine affections; that I left not my friend in life nor death, and neyther good or bad fortune had power to ouerthrow me,

CHAP. XI. The magnanimous answer of Augustus to Herod, confirming him in his dignity. Whereby is demonstrated, that a Prince ought rather to assist truth spoken by his friend, then flatter, coming from the mouth of a dissembling counterfeiter. And therefore Augustus perceiving how freely Herod had spoken to him, confiding himselfe rather his enemy, then ingratefull towards Marke Anthony, and taking delight in his liberality of speech, as proceeding from a generous and royall heart, returned him this answer following.

He is a true friend indeed that continueth always one and the same in all conditions.

Herod proteſt thee Herod, and enioy at this inſtant (better then euer before) the honour of thy Kingdome. For we enuy not thy virtues, neither doth it diſpleaſe vs, that thou ſhouldest be ſuch a man as thou art: but rather it is to vs moſt high contentment. And truly, thou art well worthy to rule & command, ſeeing thou haſt ſo loyally kept thy faith giuen to a man onely, and being put in diſtreſſe, and aſſailed with aduerſities; yet thou art not aſhamed to confeſſe thy ſelfe the friend to Marke Anthony, and ſuch as thou waſt to him in his proſperity, ſuch diſdeſt thou continue ſtill to him when his fortune fell contrary. Now, albeit I haue conquered Anthony, yet I neuer thought to overcome thee: for thy friendſhip remaining ſo entire, placeth thee in ranke with them that haue wonne the victory. Which is the reaſon, that I no leſſe wiſh thee for my friend, then I praife and commend thy ſtedfaſt loyalty, becauſe no changes of Fortune, haue power to alter thy minde and deſires.

Thou neuer didſt abandon Anthony, but it was he that eſtranged himſelfe from thee: for he better affected to follow the counſels of Cleopatra, then them of ſo deare and true a friend as Herod. The ignorance of Anthony is the reaſon of my winning thee: for hee made choiſe of a pernicious and fooliſh woman, and reieſted a moſt worthy loyall friend. And yet it is no matter of meruaile, that Anthony ſhould be vanquiſhed by Cleopatra, and keep himſelfe wholly with her: ſee-

ing that being victorious, yet hee would needs become a voluntary ſlaue. Could you account it ſtrange, that Cleopatra ſhould turne Anthony from your counſels, ſeeing ſhe could ſeparate him from me, and of being my fellow-Companion in the Empire, cauſe him to become my mortall enemy? Seeing therefore, that with mee you haue loſt Marke Anthony; with mee I purpoſe you ſhall liue and raigne.

And truſt me, your commendable and inſigne enterprize deſerueth great recompence, and is worthy (by vs) to be highly guerdoned: conſidering that while wee were buſied in the late paſſed warres, you haue overcome and ſubiected the Barbarians, although they ſeemed to be vnconquerable. For we reputed them to be our enemies, and ſo we do make account of all thoſe that are aduerſe to the Iewiſh Nation, and ſuch as moleſt them, muſt know that they make warre with vs. You haue therefore fought for vs, and for vs you haue wonne the victory, in which reſpect, we permit you to reigne, and grant you the kingdome which you poſſeſſe: Commanding, that by our donation it ſhall be confirmed to you, and eſtabliſhed durable, your merite being not little, becauſe you haue made no diminution thereof. Alſo in further recompence, I will deale in ſuch fort with you, as you ſhall haue no cauſe to wiſh for the preſence of Marke Anthony: eſteeming it altogether vnbeſeeming vs, if hauing (while hee liued) overcome him in warre, being now dead, we ſhould not go beyond him in acknowledgement and friendſhip.

When men become effeminately minded, all muſt conſult with them, to ſet them.

A notable ſigne of a virtuous and well vnderſtanding Prince.

THE EFFECT.

Cæſar and Herod hauing thus diſcourſed together, Auguſtus, to ſhew what account he made of this great Warriour Herod: did ſet a Royall Crowne vpon his head, and confirmed him in his authority, with hope to enlarge the limits of his kingdome. As likewiſe hee did afterward, hauing obſerued, how Herod acknowledged the benefits of his Maieſty, when as he ſuſtained and reſrefed him with water and victualles, at ſuch time as a great dearth and ſcarſity was in the Romane Army. From whence Cæſar being returned, hee gaue Townes and Caſtles on the Sea to Herod, and accepted him as one of his beſt friends, which he had in the Eaſt.

CHAP. XII. The Oration of Herod to the Iewes, vpon the partage or diuiding of his Seigneuries, to be made to his children.

THE ARGUMENT.

Like as Herod was happy in his warlike enterprizes, ſo did bad fortune follow him in the domeſticke affaires of his houſe, for hauing children of diuers beds, the humors alſo of

When Princes encline their eares to flatterers, their Courts ſhall neuer want quarrels and contentions.

of them being as diuers: cauſed the Palace Royall to bee daily filled with quarrels and diſſenſes, according as flatterers were heard, and fauoured by Herod. Now, the matters grew ſo farre, that the King and one of his ſonnes, named Antipater (who was his eldeſt) muſt goe to Rome to declare their grieuances, where Antipater behaued himſelfe ſo well, that hee wonne the Emperor, and qualified the anger of his Father, who receiued him into grace againe. Neuertheleſſe, Cæſar ordained, that children ſhould be obedient to their fathers, ſo that it ſhould be lawfull for Fathers, to declare him for King (after his deceaſe) that ſhould beſt in his liking, becauſe Antipater had accuſed his younger brethren, being iſſued of blood Royall on all ſides, euen as well as he was borne: Herod not being as then in authority, but aſpiring to the Crowne. So ſoone as the King was returned from Rome, he cauſed an aſſembly of the people of Ieruſalem, to whom he declared what he had done in this voyage, uſing theſe very Words.

Contention, quarrell, and diſobedience in children, are no meane means of giſt to their parents.

NO T without great occaſion, and that very beneficiall to my ſelfe (you Hebrew Citizens) did I make my voyage vnto Rome, to the end that Cæſar might iudge, concerning the quarrell betwene me and my children. To him I went, becauſe my ſelfe knew not how, neither would I take vpon me to cenſure a cauſe, wherein I might eaſily ſayle, by being tranſported with choller: & therefore hee that gaue me the Kingdome, I thought fitſt to ordaine, concerning the ſucceſſion, and to beſtow it on ſuch a one of my ſonnes, whom he ſhould conceiue to be the wortheſt. Now, amongſt many benefits as I receiued from him, this he added to them, that in a great diſſiculty, he did ſo facilitate the matter, that he gaue me my ſonne againe, whom I had well-nere loſt, and accorded the brethren together, vpon the difference growing betwene them, touching ſucceſſion in the Kingdome. You ſee mee then returned, farre richer then before I went; for I haue learned to be a better Father, then formerly I haue beene; and my children alſo are tutor'd to beare themſelues in better manner to me, and all this hath happened through the grace and mildnes of Great Auguſtus. For, he hath appointed, that the appenage of my ſonnes, and their ſucceſſion in the kingdome, ſhall depend vpon mine owne will; to the end, that the prerogative and aduancement of which of them ſoeuer it be, ſhall not breed any pride or preſuming in anie one of them. Hee hath permitted me, to chooſe ſuch a ſucceſſor as I will haue, to wit, hee that ſhall be the moſt obedient to me, and giue him the greateſt honor to his Father.

Now, concerning my ſelfe (O you my louing Citizens of Ieruſalem) I will follow heerein the iudgment of Cæſar, who freeing my younger ſonnes from the accuſation laide vpon them; hath made them equall to the eldeſt in hope, that (one day) they may ſucceede after me. In which reſpect, this very day, I make and declare them Kings all three together, the eldeſt hauing the priuiledge, in regard of his age, and the other becauſe of their Nobility in blood. I would not haue you moued at the number of Princes, conſidering that the greateſtneſſe and magnificence of the kingdome, ſufficeth to maintaine and furniſh effectually a far greater number, although there were no more aduantages. Firſt of all, I make God the Iudge of this my aduice and ordinance; & next, I would haue you to be witneſſes and teſtifiers thereof; to the end, that you may honor them according to right, & equally them that Cæſar hath accorded, and whom my ſelfe (being their father) doe eſtabliſh and appoint vnto you as Princes. To whom alſo you may doe ſuch honor, as ſhall not excede the bounds of reaſon in our-much eſteeming them; and yet in no leſſe faſhion then belongeth to them. For too much honour puffes vp the heart with preſumption, and neglect or contempt cauſeth rage and choller. Wherefore, I would haue that dutie done vnto them, as appertaineth to the merits deſiuered from them: for you cannot giue ſo much content to him, who is honoured about his deſerts, as you doe harme to him, to whome dutie is denied vndeſervedly. Oftentimes, it cometh ſo to paſſe, that both the one and other are offended, in regard it is meer flattery, which occaſioneth the indiſcrete ſentence of preference.

Beſide, let me further ſay freely to you, that

Too much honouring a man, maketh him inſolent, and conceits in the meane to make him mad.

Obedience is an excellent leſſon, when it ſhall teach a man howe to haue a Kingdome.

Honor done
to children, in the greater glory to their Father.

that I am the common father to them all three, and you know well enough, that honor done to the Children, redoundeth the more to the Fathers glory. Notwithstanding, if there be any, that shall flatteringly honor my sonnes beyond reason, they make themselves guilty of treason to them: because they shall proue Authorours of the reciduation and rebellion, for the which we fell at first into difference. In making too much esteeme of our youth, is to give it too free a heart and head, and boldnesse in attempting beyond capacity: yet let no man thinke, that I am enuious of the aduancement and glorie of mine owne Children. No, heauen is my witnesse, how I rather with their power meane and stinted, whereby wee may the better liue in peace; then in growing ouer-great, to swell vp their hearts as high, and thereby spend the rest of our dayes in troubles and seditions. For, that which is established by pride and inuasion, hath but small and slender continuance, and slippeth away sodainly; but that which is possessed with loue and gracious liking, it hath as good and successfull enduring.

I will therefore bee carefull in taking order, that my Kindred and Friends may bee the pledges of peace and concord for euer hereafter, betweene mee and my Sonnes; by whose exhortations and admonitions, they will bee moued to loue and cherish one another. For, as an euill purpose makes a deep wound in the heart of him that heares it tolde him: euen so, much more are they corrupted, who are made drunke by them that daily frequent it, and whose foules are continually infected by so foule a plague; so that the contagion spreades it selfe ouer all them, that then are about, or come into their company.

Although a man be (by nature) very courteous and peaceable; yet, let a Lake or Poole be neuer so calme and still, when impetuous windes throwe their churlish blastes vpon it, it will swell, and shewe a discontented countenance. In the very same manner, are the mildest Natures of men madded, and quite peruerred by the meanes of lewd and wicked Counsellers. In breefe, it is on mee that all my Subjects must fixe their expectation, and there assuredly settle their confidence; for whatsoeuer aduancement happeneth to my Sonnes; yet so it is, that I will not lose a iote of mine authority and power. And when all is saide, there is not a Capitaine or soldier, but w^l expresse more reuerence to the father of Conductors and Generals, then to them that command ouer the whole Army.

It is my selfe alone, without any other, that will bee the discharge of al, and will onely recompence them; who hauing done their dutie vnto mee, shall acknowledge what seruices they haue done to my Sonnes. If I finde dutie perfourmed without peruerting; no doubt but deferred recompence will follow thereon; but deceit and cogging shall finde such reward, and so surely paid him, that he will vterly lose all the fruite of his labor, and that which he fawnd for by knauish flattery.

Now, as concerning you (my good and deere Sonnes) fasten your first regard vpon the common bond of nature, which vnith brute beastes together, and causeth their alliance to keepe such a mutuall agreement: as there is not any beaft so vntractable, but with the perill of his life, hee will strue and labour to defend his young ones from danger. Carry honour and reuerence to Cesar, who hath reconciled you together; and next, haue regard of mee, and of the Honour which is due vnto mee; who had much rather pray yee to doe so, then to command it to be done, albeit you know that it still remaineth in my power to Command.

Continue in the bond which you haue knit together; you are bretheren, I would not haue you breake that vnion, neyther to be the occasion of disioyning that for which ye were borne. I shall giue you Habites, Attendants, and Royal honors, but much more precious is that whereto I exhort yee, inuioleable amity, beeing vnited together in one and the same will. If you declare such mutual affection, your authoritie will bee the more acceptable vnto mee: but amity sayling, you dart your malice thorow my heart, and throw the very foule of Kingly Government.

Therefore, vntill I haue made prooffe of this your Vertue, yee shall enioy no Kingdome, but the Royall Title onely:

Deceit doth
most commonly deceiue his owne master, & flatterers are the falsest knaues that tention wound-

uer throweth.

if you loue your father, the effect of name will follow, in the meane while, approue among yourselves, how and what affection I beare vnto you. You shall enioy al that is goodly and pleasing in the dignitie Royall, as Princes of the blood: but concerning the charges of the Empire, and troublefome burthen of State-affayres, they shall lye vpon me, though it were better to cumber many, then one onely. By this meanes, it shall bee very profitable for you, to accommodate your selues to that which I haue desired: because I loue the glorie which should still shine in you, and which I truly account to be mine owne.

THE EFFECT.

Herod hauing deliuered all these speeches, and greatly comforted his sons, howsoeuer some reioyced thereat, as not discerning so far off, that which was hidden under these words: yet the better sort felt themselves offended. For they perceived, that this equality serued but for a sparke, to kindle the concealed fire in the breasts of the bretheren; who could not indure any advantages, how little soeuer, especially hauing all but one and the same prerogative. So that this proved to be the cause of ruine to one another, as also of distrust and extreme cruelty in King Herod.

CHAP. XIII.

The Battaille of Riotta or Nouara, which was fought in the Dukedome of Milaine, betweene Iohn Trivulzi; and the Lord of Trimouille, Generals for Lewes the xij. King of France, on the one side; and Maximilian Sforza, Duke of Milaine, accompanied with the Switzers, on the other, in the yeare 1513.

The kings for-row losse of Milaine, was the occasion
of this warre.

Lewes King of France, the twelfth of that name, ill digesting the losse of Milaine, and som other disgraces formerly received, made his election of two speciall Captaines, wel experienced in martiall affaires, and also of no meane authority; the Lords Trivulzi and Trimouille, to passe the Alps, and enter Italy. A further choise was likewise made, for the more happy successe in this attempt, of Robert de la Marche, whom hee sent for out of the Countrey of Luca, and his blacke Regiment of Germans, by some termed Allemaignes, as also the Lord Lewes Beaumont, who came from the Frontiers of Nouarre, and brought with him those feuerall bands of Gascognes, that had before serued Seigneur de la Palice at Panipelans, when they fought against the Spaniards. Some few Ensignes of foot (but of very choice men) were intermingled with them; for such Gentlemen as serued not with horse, held it no disgrace, thus to be employed on foote, and went vnto it with chearefull alacrity. At which power beeing very aptly appointed, and furnished with great Ordenance vnto their owne good liking, they hasted away with speed for Italy.

On the contrary side, the Duke of Milaine, named Maximilian Sforza, understanding this French preparation made for him, he was not negligent in his owne occasions: but moued the Switzers to reuise Lombardy, as in some former expeditions they had done, and to Friend him with their manly assistance, in which motion he purchased no deniall. The Ammians, or they that beare the Office of Maiors, in the Cantons of Vri, Sutis, and Pfederal, as lying next vnto Italy, with their warlike powers, were the first that passed ouer the Alpes: beeing seconded or followed by the like bands of Glaris, Zug, Lucerna, Schaffouse, Zurich, and Berne, and these made vp another martiall company. The third and last confort, consisted of five thousand foot, conducted by Altofaso, a most expert and forward captain. But Maximilian became somewhat discouraged, by an vnexpected reuolt of Sacranora Visconti, that did keepe a swarme of desperate fellows about him in Milaine, all errant vnthrifts, though leaning to Nobility, and others beside; and therefore ioyned with the first company of Switzers, going to Nouara, expecting there (yet free from priuy awaits and treachery) when the rest of the Switzers should come.

Before the Towne of Nouara, came the French Forces, yet hearing that the second supply of Switzers were somewhat nere, and that Altofaxo was at Galarita; they retreated to Riotta, which was about some twenty Furlonges from Nouara, hard by the River of Mara. No sooner were the second Conuoy of Switzers entred the Towne, and had theyr Mornings refection; but the Captaines called for a consultation, for concluding vpon matters fittest to be done: whereupon, Caraffe, Amman of Zurich, offering the first motion of speech, began in this manner.

The Oration of Caraffe,

Amman of Zurich.

Aliane, and inuincible spirited Brethren, let not the attempt which you haue resolutely concluded on, coole through want of courage, or corruptly lose it selfe, in needlesse attending for Altofaxo, & such as come with him. For it hath euer bene knowne, that the surest and happiest way to fortunate successe, is to stifle delay with speedy expedition; and so we shall finde it, if wee haue the prouidence to pursue it: Nor neede we, whose courage and constancy stand equally kissing each other, listen to any other recreant word, but onely braue and speedy expedition: lest the day shining now fauere for vs, cloud it selfe in our lingering, and so we lose our glorious expectation. Occasion is yet offered vs, and we may take hold on his happy fore-locke; for, it is not number, but Noblesse of minde that gives honor to the actions vs. A handfull is enow for a heaped multitude, and while hope holds them, that Altofaxo is our Load-starre, and we dare doe nothing till he shine out with vs, they may be decieued in their idle supposition, & we more then matters of so good advantage. Let therefore their erroneous conceit, lead vs the way to true discipline, for a sodaine and vnexpected onset, strikes terror in an enemies soule, and folloves him both with flight and laughter. Let their overweening pride vsber them, and take we hold on this happy and beneficial concel, which guides ye to vndoubted victory, if with dreadlesse hartes you ply & pursue it.

No sooner had Caraffe come vnto his speeches period, but all the Captaines and Ensignes consented to him, and a graue consultation grew immediately, for best proceeding in their purpose. Hereupon, refection and rest was generally commanded; and after the second watch, presented repaire vnto their Colours; where before day-dawning they should bee acquainted with other instructions. Imagine heere (as well you may) that euery minde fate musing with serious conceits, what issue the intended fight would sort vnto; & by this time the Sun was set. But now listen to a wonder, and truly no lesse in mine opinion. The Dogges which the French had brought to field with them, quite leauing their Campe, all in a troope together entred Nouara, and the Switzers Centinels, with such as walked the round, or kept the Corps du Guard; the dogs fawning on the one after another, euen as if they were already become their Masters, or shortly should, laide downe their eares, wagged their taitles in louing manner, and licked their hands.

But the Switzers, not intending to haue their priuate cogitations discouered, cunningly gaue order, that in euerie part of the City, now at one place, then at another, Drums should still be beaten; that if any scouts or spies tooke notice of them, they should the easier bee periwaded of their fodaine comming forth, as also to continue their enemies in Armour still; they hauing all the day before bin so prepared, and on horseback. Thus they shaped their outward desseignes, while they cloier determinations aimed at other ends, as to strengthen their bodies with food & rest, and to win another daies respite more for their better contestation in trial of honor. And let me tell yee, that the Lawes are so strict and seuerer among the Switzers, that if any shal dare (in publicke view of the Armie) to do any thing cowardly, or with feare, shamefull & vnfitting men of valour; he is immediately slaine by his following fellow, so that the greater feare confounds the lesse, and begets an honorable death, in stead of that which is otherwise attended on with nothing but infamy.

The

Diligenceh the conductor to happy successe.

A very bold and admirable accident

Men can be too cunning for an insidious enemy.

The Switzers were careful for losing the best opportunity.

The Army consisting of about 9000. foote, made choise of a thousand Horlle beside, men of well tryed and vndaunted valour, to take the charge of eight Faulcons, and to keepe with Maximilian and his Horlle (which indeede were but few, yet of the cheefe Nobility;) while the rest did throw themselves into two battailes, and silently, without beating any Drum, marched towards the enemy two feuerall wayes.

Now Trimouille, being reputed for a wise and well experienced Capitaine, suspected nothing lesse, then that a few tyred foore, and also before Altofaxo came; would venture out vpon a stronger power, or hazard any the least fortune of battaile. But vnderstanding that the Enemy was within sight, he calls vppon Trimouille and the other Captaines, giuing order for placing the Ordinance, the signals for fight to be giuen, and what hee knew by discipline or experience, to wait vpon the need of danger.

Such was the shortnesse of time, and the courage of the foe so mounted for fight, that the French scarcely had leifure to bridle their horses, & arm their heads: for they had stood most part of the day & night in Armes, expecting stil what hold be commanded, and at last (though very late) newes comming, that all was whist and quiet at Nouara, had got into their Cabines to rest. But the Light-horlle being sooner ready then they looked for, yssued forth in time conuenient, making a long Wing to the left handwarde, and met the thousand Switzers as they were marching on. And they, for more safely shunning the great Ordinance, which played vpon them tempestuously, fetcht a small compas about towards the River of Mara, with intent to passe a Bridge, & so let on the enemies tents in the reere. So marching in a broad way towards the River, they were hotly rent and torne with the Ordinance, and mightily pressed also with the light horlle.

But then Mottina, whose courage could not be quailed, changed his former resolution, and entreated Duke Maximilian, (being then in great daunger, by reason that the Epirotes insulced round about him) to leaue the fight, and returne to the City instantly, that so the warres mayne head might be kept, which lay open vnto

the tiranny of chances, and there to await the successe of expected victory. Maximilian made an honourable refusal; for such was the constancy of his courage, as he would endure all common accidents of Fortune, rather then be blurd with the least disgrace.

Heereupon, two vnder Captains, and two Ancients seized his horse by the bridle, and renting the Crest from off his Helmet, threw an olde cloake about him to hide his Armes, and forcing him (whether he would or no) led him out of the field with a troope of Horlle, and so conducted him to the City, to stand cleare from danger, while they endured the brunt of the day. Afterward Mottina rallied his swaying battell, which (by this time) hadde lost three of their Faulcons; then retiring the wounded into the midst of the battell, and bearing back the ouerforward Epirotes, slew there Alexio Bogisna, a noble Grecian Capitaine, and so defeated them vterly.

Then rushing into the enemies camp, where the drudges and stragglers beeing slaine, and the soldiers of that station disordered, the carriage and baggage were surprized. But some little while before Mottina had thus prevailed, another company, that tooke a longer iourney through the Corne-feldes, then growne vp, and receyuing little harme by the Ordinance, had made a fresh charge on the Enemies side.

The French forces were ordered into three battallions, Trimouille and De la March hauing the leading of the winges, and Trimouille the middle Regiment; of maine battaile. As for the Ladies quene's Battallion; they had got themselves within a ditch, and betweene the battailes of the Horlle, because their Trench, being a new and somewhat admirable kinde of Workmanship, deuised by Robert de la March, to hemme them in against the chances of warfare: vpon so fodaine a comming of the enemy, could not by any means bee set vp and pitcht. The Switzers bringing their Battalles about towards the right hand, and vpon this Squadron of the Germanes or Allemaignes, very couragiously turned to them; perceiving that victory would soone bee wonne, hauing once defeated the cheefest force of the Enemies Armie.

Which the French Captains beholding, gaue present order to discharge their great Ordnance vpon them, breaking through the ranks, with mighty laughter, the Horſe alſo comming hotely on them on the left ſide. The Ammans of Berne and Zug were ſlaine in this confuſion, which nothing diſmayed their ſouldiers courage, nor their owne vnauoydable perill, and wofull hauocke of theyr Fellowes about them; but chearfully animating themſelues, and wheeling round into a ring, propelled the Horſe very valiantly, and (as before they had concluded) ſuddenly getting ouer the ditch, ſet vpon the Allemaignes courageouſly. Now began a fierce and bloody fight, no noiſe or words ſpoken on either ſide; but only a diſmall claiſhing of VWeapons and armor, and the ſoft ſighes of ſuch as fell downe dead, giuing their lateſt adiew vnto the world.

The Allemaignes, that they might reuenge the ſlaughter of their country-men the yeare before at Pavia; and now (by new renowne) redeeme their glorie loſt ſouteene yeares paſt at Bruderholz, on the confines of Eaſle, fought very fiercely. And the Switzers that they might yet (one day) deſtroy their olde and peculiar enemies, fellowes that had runne out of Germany, and (in reproach to the Emperour) ſerued the French King; were not a ior behinde them, either in ſtrength, or feruency of courage.

Now, while the Switzers and Allemaignes fought thus at the puſh of pike, Newes came to Trivoulzi and Trimouille, that the bagge and baggage were taken; thoſe that were appointed for keeping the campe alſo ſlaine, beſide tumult and ſlaughter in euery place. Which report ſo daunted the French, that a great part of their horſe (euery man being careful for his luggage) ran (without any command) to ouercome it againe.

A ſtraagem of the Switzers to beguil
the French.

In another quarter alſo, & at the ſame inſtant almoſt the third company or battalion of the Switzers, ſhewd themſelues at the front of the French, which Battallion (while the French hadde (in vaine) diſcharged their Ordnance into a VWood ſtanding before them, in regard that the Switzers (to deſcibe the enemy) had poſitively left a few of the drudges amongſt the trees, as making a ſhew of ambuſhed armed men) had cloſely crept along by a ſide way, by little and little ſlooping downe, and trayling their Pikes vpon the ground after them.

Now, ſo great was their contempt of the bullets flying about them, and the charge ſo dreadful, that the French and Namartine foote (their Captaine Beaumont being ſlaine) two bands alſo of Geneuages and Salucians defeated, and theyr Ordnance taken, and turned vpon their backs that fled; the Allemaignes now being almoſt quite deſtroyed, their Tents taken, the enemy ouerthrowing all, and largely Lords of the field; betwene ſhame and feare turned their backs. VVhen all men were thus diſmayed, the Captaines yet continued fearleſſe (conſidering the fearfulneſſe of their preſent eſtate) and went ralliering the diſordered ranks, and turning themſelues vnto the cryes of theyr Companions, made them to abide and fight.

The vnder Officers and Ancients, entreated them for to exempt all feare, the Lancequenets bare the brunt of the battell, and the fight began to be repaired in all places. But the horſemen, nothing moued with their Captaines encouraging words, ſhamefully fled. For the Switzers although their Captaine Mottina was ſlaine by a piece of Ordnance; yet, hauing gotten the Campe, ſet fiercely and bloodily on the left ſide of the Horſe, & likewise on the right, and then on theyr backs came a greater power with terrible Pikes, to the no little terror of the diſordered horſe.

In repairing the field, there perriſhed Montſalcon, Captaine to the Duke of Albanys company of horſe, and Coriolano Trivoulzi, a young Gentleman of ſingular hope. But, the Allemaignes loſing halfe their men, two Enſignes, and their General Floranges very greuously hurt, had fought moſt conſtantly a long while together: but perceiving nowe the Horſe to forſake them, the foote in euery quarter to bee defeated, and the great Ordnance taken, accounting flight to be very ſhamefull, yet voide of ſecuritie; ſet the points of their weapons vpright, according to their viſual manner, and yielded, ſeeking mercy of the victor enemy. thorough with deadly ſorrow, beholding his two ſonnes, the Lords Floranges and Gems enſight by the enemy, and meerly in deſperate daunger of life: with a troope of Horſe, boldly brake into the middeſt of the enemies battell, and they lying among the mangled bodies halfe dead, pitifully embred with their owne blood and woundes, laying them ouerthwart the neckes of two Horſes; to his no little prayſe, both for manly proweſſe and fatherly pittie, woorthily brought them thence, preferring theyr liues for future renowne, and in a farre more fortunate field.

Thus the Switzers, fighting in three ſeueral Squadrons or Companies, within the compaſſe of an houre and a halfe, or thereabout, perfected a moſt memorable famous battaile, and vveigltie warre.

And although their enemies lay ſlaine before theyr faces, ſtored with goodlie and rich Furniture, which was able to allure them: yet would they make no ſeſure on the ſpoyle, but kept within care of their Countrey Diſcipline, which permits nor to take any armed man priſoner in the battaile, neither to follow him that flyeth.

This made them to ſtand ſtill a great part of the day; as doubting leaſt the French, prouoked cyther by pollicie in their Captaines, or their owne ſhame, ſhould retreat backe againe; and take them at aduantage in deſpoyling the dead. But this feare was much more diſcreet then needfull, becauſe the Enemy kept on ſtill in flight, and Trivoulzi galloping too and fro, confounded with extrenity of duſt and hoarſeneſſe in crying to them, was vtterly vnable, cyther by ſoule or faire perſuaſions, or the commanding Authoritie of a General, to ſtay the Enſignes or the Horſe, that throwing away their Lances, ſtroue with greateſt eagerneſſe, who ſhould bee foremoſt.

It is reported, that the whole troops of French Horſe might haue bene vtterly ouerthrowne and ſpoyled in theyr flight, if Duke Maximilian had made an oppoſition but with two hundred light Horſe: for there was not a French-man that carried a Lance beyonde Seſſithes, ſuch was their heate and haſt to bee gone.

And yet within a ſhort while after, Sid uia Sabello, and Corradino Critelly, with certaine light Horſe; purſued them vnto the Towne of Treſcato: but the Conradines and Peazzans, ſticking amaine out of the Fieldes and Hamlets to the ſpoyle, made a moſt cruell ſlaughter where anie bootie was to be had, at hedges, ditches, and all other places, that hindered the tired French in their flight.

The ſame day the Switzers, gathering together the ſlaine bodies of their countrey-men, carried them on their ſhoulders into the Cittie, to giue them the laſt honour of buriall. Amongſt them, were ſlaine a thouſand and three hundred, ſeaſen hundred being torne with the great pieces of Ordnance, and almoſt as many were wounded, but of the French were ſlaine eight thouſand of all degrees.

Duke Maximilian, not a little ioyfull of ſuch fortunate ſucceſſe, ſummoned the Souldiers together, and ioyſo confounding ſpeech, as he was ſcarſe able to utter a worde; which appeared by the teares trickling downe his cheekes, gaue them all moſt hearty thanks; and, as a gift of inſtant benefite and pleaſure, all the Vicualles then taken, beſide the Ordnance and generall ſpoyle, hee frankly beſtowed vpon them. As for the admirable Trench, wherein conſiſted ſuch vndoubted hope of Victorie, inuented by a warlike witte, brought ouer the Alpes with much labour, and great charge: that being taken from the enemy, was ſet vp in a publique place, for a future Monument of that victorie: and this deceyued the Allemaignes moſt, that they holde it vtterly needleſſe to erect their Trench that day, which lay ſtill in the VWaggons, becauſe ſucceſſe ſeemed then to ſrowne on the enemy.

Vpon Conference had afterwards with Trimouille at Bologna, concerning all theſe matters; he did not filipolouſly impute the fault vnto Trivoulzi, for not encamping on his owne grounds (as Trimouille had perſwaded him) in regard of ſpoyling the Graſſe, which then at that time was ready to bee mowne. But Trivoulzi, as a man neuer conquered before, yet diſputing on ſeueral euents happening in the battaile, threw the maine croiſe on aduerſe fate, which too much enuyed

CHAP. XIII.

Of the force of sudden Chances and unexpected Euentz, for the dissipation as well of mans power, as of his policy: And of the hazards and doubtfull euentz of Battails, and other enterprizes of Warre.

Although the successe of mens affayrs is most vncertaine, variable, & subiect to infinit chances and hazards; yet in nothing so much as in matters, wherein mans power is most seene, to wit, in matters of warre, whereof the euentz are so doubtfull and dangerous (as Isa saide to Epimondas) He is not wise that dath not feare them. And therefore it is reported of Phocion, a most excellent Capitaine of the Athenians, that although hee was chosen fue and forty times Generall of their armies; yet hee himselfe did euer perswade the to peace, as fearing the successe of warre. And Hanniball hauing bene for 16 yeares victorious in Italy, and forced at the length to defend his owne country, which was Carthage (where Scipio the Romane had already ouerthrowne two great armies of the Carthaginians, and was ready also to present him battaile) he doubted so much the euent thereof, that crauing conference with Scipio, he sought to perswade him to peace, representing vnto him the hazard of warre, and aduising him to consider in the prosperous course of his victories, not onely what had hapned to other men, but also what might ensue to himselfe, & that to make peace was in his own hands, but if he came once to the battaile, the victory should bee in the hands of God. And lastly, that Nusquam minus quam in belacuentus respondent. The euentz of things do no where lesse answer the expectation of men shen in warre.

Thus spake Hanniball, who may also well serue for an example of his owne admonitions. For though he had bin many yeares together, the scourge of the Romans, and the most famous and renowned Capitaine then liuing, yea, and was (as it were) growne old with victories in forreigne Countries, euen before the very gates of Rome; yet was hee at length vterly ouerthrowne by a Romane, a young man, inferiour to him in reputation, experience, and forces, and in that battaile which most imported him, and wherein (by the iudgement of all men) he employed all the endeuour, military arte and skill he had, or which could bee required in a most prudent and valiant Capitaine.

This change and decay of fortune in war, may be exemplified in many others, as famous Capitaines as euer were; as in the worthy Indus Machabeus; Cyrus, king of Persia; Pyrrhus, king of Epyrus; Marcellus Pompeius Magnus; Marcius Antonius, Competitor of Augustus Caesar; the Emperour Constantinus; and Heraculus Belisarius; Edward the third, King of England; our famous Countreman, John Talbot, the first Earle of Shrewsbury, whose name is yet terrible to the French; the great Earle of Warwicke, in the time of Edward the fourth; Charles, Duke of Bourgonne; Nicholo Primitico; Lewes the 12. king of France; and now lastly (in our memory) the Emperour Charles the sixt. All which (with many other whom I omit for breuities sake) hauing by many notable victories got the fame and renouwe of most famous Capitaines, were either at last disgraciously killed, or else receyued some great ouerthrowes, or had (at least) some notorious decay of their former and wonted prosperous successe.

The consideration hereof, had moued diuers most valiant Capitaines, to auoide the aduenture of battaile as much as might be, and rather seek to overcome their enemies by stratagems, practises, and delays; as Q. Fabius Maximus, who (by such meanes) distressed Hanniball, much more then others could do by main battailes. And therefore Ennius the Poet saide of him; Cunctando relictis remz, He repaired the State of the Romanes by delays. And it is also written of the valiant valiant Franciscus Sforza Duke of Milaine, that he would neuer ioyne battaile with an enemy, but when hee could not otherwise choose.

And Lewes the eleuenth, K. of France (who was no lesse valourous in war, then prudent in peace) feared nothing more, as Philip de Commines testifieth, then the hazard of warre; and especially of a battaile, which by all meanes possible hee fought to auoid. Insomuch, that when any enemy entered France; hee procured to make peace or truce with him, whatsoever it cost him. As appeared when Edward the fourth King of England was therewith a strong Armie, to whom he gaue a great summe of ready money, and granted to pay him a tribute of fiftie thousand Crownes a yeare, besides diuers pensions to his Councillors, and other hard conditions; rather then hee would hazard a battell with him, knowing the casualtie thereof, and that as Commines saith, Une battaille perdu a mannaist queste. A battaile lost hath an ill taile or consequence: For it redoubleth the hope and courage of the Victors; it astonisheth and discourageth the vanquished; it shaketh the fidelity of subiects, it ministreth matter and opportunity of conspiracie to malecontents, of reuolt to Townes, and of alienation to confederates, who commonly sway with the good successe. And for this cause, not onely King Lewes the eleuenth, but also other wise Princes haue vsed, when an enemy hath bin ready to enter their countries: to dismantle all the Townes in his way that were not tenable, and to fortifie and make strong the rest, retyzing thither all the Cattle and prouision of the country, and destroying all the Corne vpon the ground, thereby to consume him with famine, long sidges, and all kindes of delays whatsoever, rather then seek to ouerthrow it by a maine battail. This was very prudently practised by France the first, King of France, at such time as the Emperour Charles determined to enter into France, with a great and puissant army: insomuch, that when K. France vnderstoode, that the people of the Country resisted the destruction of theyr Corne, and other commodities; he straight way sent his armie to destroy it. Whereby the Emperour finding all Townes fortified, and no prouision abroad was left them, were forced (after hee had besiedged Marsailles some certaine moneths) to retire himselfe for lack of victuals.

And this I haue thought good to signify by the way, for that Phillip de Commines, and Martin du Bellay (both of them notable Historiographers, and Councillors, the first to Lewes 11. and the other to France the first) so greatly approue this manner of proceeding in these Princes, and propoie it for a rule of state to all such Kings & Princes, as, being in possession their Kingdomes and States, are invaded by Forreiners; though for those that invade and seeke to conquer, Phillip de Commines, thinketh it meete and conuenient to seeke battaile, to make short worke, by reason of the difficulty to bee succoured, and of the infinite dangers & inconueniences, which happen by delays to an armie of strangers in foraine countreys. Besides, hee that invadeth and seeketh to conquer, commonly aduentureth no more but his present armie, and that in hope to gaine a Crowne, whereas the Prince in possession, aduentureth his whole state against nothing, and a state is lost (many times) with the losse of a battaile at home, if the victory bee well followed.

But nowe let vs returne to speake of sodaine Chances, and to touch some particularities, thereby to shew very manifestly and evidently, the weaknesse of mans wit and power, and the casualty of warlike attempts.

Let vs first and formost consider, by howe many accidents the mightiest armies are many times quite disperfed and dissipated, and the greatest enterprizes ouerthrowne: as sometimes it falleth out by the death of some one man, sometimes by the dissention of Leaders and Capitaines amongst themselves, sometimes by the mutiny of souldiers, sometimes by meanes of a Tempest or vnseasonable weather; sometimes againe by plagues, or other diseases in the Campe, and sometimes againe (as Guicciardine noteth in his second Booke) by a commandement eyther not well vnderstood, or ill executed; by a little remerie or disorder, which may chaunce to happen by some vaine worde or speech, euen of the meaneest Souldiour. And last of all (saith hee) by infinite chances which happen at vnwares, vnpossible to bee foreseen and preuented, by the wit or counsell of any Capitaine.

Heere to also adde out of Comminas, that be the counsell neuer so well taken, and the plot neuer so well layed; yet it is neuer or seldome executed in the field, as it is ordaind in the Chamber. And that sometimes, by the least motions or occasions that may bee, the victorie is wonne or lost: Which (saith hee) is a great Mystery, whereby Kingdomes and States do rise or fall. And hereupon, the selfe same Authour groundeth two Conclusions, no lesse piously then wisely. The one, that no humane wit is able (of it selfe) sufficiently to gouerne an Army of men: and the other, that God reserueth to himselfe the successe of battels and disposeth of his victory at his wil and pleasure.

This will be made cleare by examples, by the which, I will first of all shewe the force of sodaine chances in battaile, and other enterprizes of Warre. And after that all victorie proceedeth from the providence and hand of God, and not from the power and policie of mortall man. As concerning the first, we see many and sundry times, that great designements are broken, and potent armies dissolved by accidents, without any force or stroke of the Enemy. When Lewes the Emperour (called Lewes of Banaria) was in Italy, with a great and puissant armie, and readie to besiege Florence, vpon the confidence hee had in the valor and assistance of Castruccio of Pisa, whom the Florentines feared more then any man liuing, it chanced that the sayde Castruccio dyed: whereupon, the Emperour broke his designement, and returned into Germanie with his armie.

Also, in the time of the great Schisme which was holden betwixt Prbane, the sixte Pope of that name, and Clement the fiftie Pope, who was called Clement the seuenth, and liued in Auignon; Lewes Duke of Aniun, Vnckle vnto Charles the sixt, King of France, went into Italy with an huge armie, wherin hee hadde aboute thirtie thousand Horfles, partly to deliuer Ioane, Queene of Naples, (who was besieged by Charles Ourazzo, Nephew vnto Lewes King of Hungaria) and partly to depose Pope Prbane, in fauour of Clement. When hee had already entered into Italy, and began to make warre in the Territorie of Bologna (which belonged to the Church) and was likely in al mens opinion (by reason of his great forces) to obtaine his desire in all he pretended; hee sodainly fell sicke and dyed; whereupon, all that mightie and inuincible army, disperfed and dissolved it selfe; and euery man returned from whence he came.

The like hath chanced diuers times, by some great plague and mortalitie in armies, as in that of the Christians, which beganne in Thunis in Affrica, vnder the conduct and commaund of Lewes, the ninth, King of France: which armie was so mollested with pestilence, that it was forced for to rise from the siege at such time, euen when the Towne was brought to extremitie, and must needs haue rendered it selfe within few daies.

Furthermore, such is the force of sodaine feares which fall vpon men, sometimes by meere chance, without anie iust cause, that the greatest armies are vtterly ouerthrowne thereby. And no maruel seeing no man is so valiant, but that hee may bee seized and transported with a sodaine feare. And therefore the Lacedemonians, before they went forth to fight, were wont to sacrifice to the Muses, to obtaine their assistance, against the fierce and furious assaults of sodaine passions. VVhich taking reason many times at vnwares, and (as it were) at an advantage, doe so oppress it, that they becom a man of all iudgement and discourse for a time, and no passion more then feare. VVhereof I my selfe saw a notable experience, in a most valiant Spanish Capitaine in France, which happened in the time of a League, who going out of his Garrison, with certaine Troopes vpon an occasion, and meeting with the Enemy by chance, where hee least suspected, tooke such a fright thereat, that he ranne home with might and maine, and tolde vs (for I was ther at the same instant time) that all the Souldiers were cut in peeces, and that hee himselfe escaped very hardly. Neuerthelesse, within fure or sixe houres after, they all returned home safe, and not so much as any one man hurt, though they came scattering one after anoanother, for they all fledde as well as he, and the rather by his example. When hee had already vtterly disgraced him, if in very many occasions (before) hee had not got the reputation of one of the most valiant men of his Nation, in which respect it was rather wondered at in him, then blamed.

But to shewe the like effect of sodaine feare in whole Armies, vpon diuers accidents. When Arnulphus the Emperour besieged Rome, it chanced, that a Hare (being started by some of the Camp) ran towards the Citie, and that a great number of the souldiers pursued her with very great rowt and cryes, which the Romans seeing from the Towne, and conceyting that the enemy meant to giue some furious and violent assault thereto, were surprized with such a feare, that they abandoned the wals and Rampiers, and the enemy espying, and taking the opportunity thereof, scaled the walles, and tooke the Towne.

Also, when Sigismund, King of Hungaria, (who was afterward Emperour) gaue battell to an Army of the Turkes, neere to Nicopolis, and was assisted with exceeding great numbers of the French, and of diuers other Nations, the French Horfles being in the vanguard, and seeing themselves (after a while) hardly oppressed, alighted from their Horfles to fight on foote. But their Horfles beeing loose, ranne all backe toward the campe, which the Hungarians and others that were in the reere perceiuing, and imagining that the Horfles-men were slaine; tooke such a fright therewith, that they ranne away, whereby the Turkes got a notable Victorie, with great slaughter of the Christians, especially of the French, who were almost all slaine.

Also at Ptolomais in Egypt, which the Christians besieged two yeares together, the Soldane, who came with an armie to succour it, gaue them an ouerthrowe by the like chance; of a Horfe, which beeing let loose, ranne backe to the Campe. For whereas diuers souldiers called one vnto another to stay him, many ranne out of their ranks (to take him) with such disorder, that they seemed to those that were behinde, and some-what farre off, to run away; whereupon, a great part of the Christian Army began to flye. And this happened at such a time, as the Soldane with his Soldiers (being put to the worke) were running out of the field: who seeing the Christians flye, called backe his men, charged them afresh, and got the Victorie.

Charles Duke of Bourgoigne, besiedging Granson, & vnderstanding that the Switzers came to succour it, went to meete them, to giue them battaile. The Souldiers of the vanguard, as they were marching, meaning for to take a better way, retired a little backe. The reeward seeing the same, imagined that they fled, and began themselves to flye, whereupon the rest also did the like; and (in conclusion) the Duke and all ran away, abandoning their artillery and Campe, to the spoile of the Switzers, who were exceedingly enriched thereby, and yet slew only but few men, for all the rest saved themselves by flight. Thus much concerning sodaine feares, whereto I will adde a few more examples of other accidents.

Gildo, Gouernor of Affricke, vnder the Emperours Arcadius and Honorius, rebelled against the Empire, and his own brother Mascezell was employed against him for General, who had not (in a certaine occasion) aboute 5000. men to fight with 70000. And the armies being foere together, that they were ready to charge one another, Mascezell beganne to make motions of peace; & receiuing some hard and crosse language of one that bare an Ensigne, stroke him vpon the same arme that heelde it, where with the Ensigne fell, and diuers others that followed, seeing it, and conceiuing that he which bare it had yielded it, went in great hast, and yielded themselves. VVhereupon, Gildo fled away with a great part of the armie, and the rest sutedrended themselves to Mascezell.

Also in the battell of Cirignola, in the Kingdome of Naples, betwixt the Spaniards and the French, a worde spoken by the Count of Nemount, (who was then General of the French) beeing misconstrued by his Souldiers, was a very great cause of their ouerthrow. For, the battell being already begonne, and the Count finding withall, that he could not passe a certain Ditch (ouer which he had thought to haue ledde some part of his Armie, to charge the Spaniards on the other side, cried vnto the Souldiers that followed him, Backe, backe; meaning to lead them another way. But they not knowing the cause, vnderstood that he had them flye, which they all began to doe: and others (seeing the same) followed their example. It chanced also at the same time, that the Count was slaine; whereupon the whole Army of the French ranne away, and lefte the field and victorie to the Spaniards.

Battell lost by a little disorder.

Againe, whosoeuer hath reade any thing of the ancient warres, or hath any experience in these our times; cannot be ignorant, what confusion may bee bred in a battaile, by a little disorder growing vpon some sodaine accident; whereby Armies (many times) are causes of their owne ouerthrow. As it chanced to Hanniball in his last battaile with Scipio, wherein his owne Elephants turning backe vpon his Horse-men, so brake & disordered them, that the Romans taking advantage thereof, did easily put them all vnto flight.

The battell of Yury in France in Anno 1590

The like to this, hath happened sometimes in this our age, and namely, a few yeares past in France, in the yeare of our Lord, 1590. in the battaile of Yury, betwene the King of France, Henrie the fourth, and the Duke of Mayne, then Generall for the League. In which Battaille, the Horsemen of the League, flying backe vpon their owne foote, brake them in such sort, that their Enemy entring withall easily defeated them.

The victory in battell dependeth sometime vpon winde & weather as well by land as sea.

Lastly, to shew evidently the force of chance in warre, is there any thing more vn certaine or vnconstant then winde and weather? And yet neuerthelesse, thereupon (many times) dependeth the successe of battailes, and other warlike attempts; especially by sea, where the winde & weather do predominate, and check al the power of men. For, who is ignorant, that be the Naue neuer so potent, it can neuer goe out of the harbour, nor arrive where it should to encounter the enemy, if winde and weather be not fauourable? Which is also as necessary and importat for obtaining victory in a conflict by sea, wherein, the first advantage that an expert Sea-man seeketh to get of his Enemy, is to winne the winde of him: which winde also changing (sometimes) during the Conflict, doth giue both the aduan-tage and victory to the enemy. As it fell out in the Battaille of Lepanto, which happened betwene the Christians and the Turkes, wherein the Winde beeing first fauourable vnto the Turkes, sodainly changed, and draue all the smoke of the Artillerie and small shot vpon them, whereby they were so blinded, that they were very easily and speedily ouerthrowne.

The battell of Lepanto, betwene the Christians & the Turkes. Sarmis in commentar. 1571.

And thus it chanceth in like manner in battailes vpon Land; and therefore wise Capitaines seeke not onely to haue the Sunne, but also the winde on theyr backs: for, it often falleth out, that a storme of Haile or Raine in the face of an enemy, or a violent winde, driuing either the dust, or the smoke of shot and Artillerie vpon it, giueth the victory to the enemy. As in the famous battaile at Cannae, when Hanniball ouerthrew the Romaines, and slew foure thousand foote, and seuen and twenty hundred horse, and tooke three thousand and three hundred prisoners. He had the winde in his fauor, which being in his backe, and withall so violent, that it draue the dust into the Romaines eyes, and did greatly facilitate his victory.

The great victory of Hanniball at Cannae. Tac. Lib. 2. 3. 4. 5.

The like, or rather a farre greater victory, got Scipio Asiaticus against Antiochus, King of Syria, whom hee put vnto flight, and slew sixe thousand foote, and foure thousand horse, with the losse only of three hundred forty nine men, by the helpe of a foggy mist, and a shewre of raine. For the mist was so thicke, that the huge Army of Antiochus could not one part of it see another: whereas it wrought no such effect in the small Army of the Romaines. And againe, the raine so weakened the Bowes and Slings of Antiochus his Souldiers, that they serued to little or no purpose: whereas the Romaines vsing onely Swordes and Darts, receyued no damage thereby. And to come neerer to our time, wee read that Adolphus the Emperour was slaine, and his whole armie cleane ouerthrowne and vanquished by Albertus, by reason that the Sun was in their faces.

The victory of Scipio Asiaticus against Antiochus. Tac. Lib. 2. 4. 1. 7.

Also, amongst some other causes of the losse of the great Battaille of Ghiaradadda, betwene the Venetians, and the French, Guicchiardine obserueth, that a certain shewre of raine; which fell euen

as

as they were fighting, made the ground so slippery vpon a sudden, that the foote of the Venetians could not hold their footing, to defend themselves against the French Horse. By which means they were easily broken, and the greater part of them slaine.

How little confidence is to be had in the policy or power of man for the good successe of a battaile.

Thus then wee see, how great a sway chance beareth in battailes and enterprizes of warre, and consequently, how little confidence is to be reposed in the witte, pollicy, power, and endeuour of men, for the good successe thereof. VVhich dependeth vpon infinit accidents, chancing so diuersly (according to the difference of persons, times, places, and circumstances) that neyther the wisdom of any Generall can foresee them, nor any diligence, dexterity, or industry of Souldiers preuent them, though all should concur in the highest degree. For be the Soldiers neuer so obedient, dexterious, & diligent, and the Capitaine neuer so wise and valiant; yet what assurance is there of good successe, when a sudden danger shall fo dismay both Capitaine and Soldiers, that neyther the one shall know what to command, nor the other how to obey; when an erroneous conceite of some few, or bad example of some one, or a word mistaken, or a blast of winde, or a shewer of raine, and innumerable other accidents, not possible to be fore-seene or remedied, shall giue the victory to the weaker, yea, to those that are (in a manner) vanquished before? Therefore I will thus conclude this Chapter, that the successe of Battailles, and all warlike attempts, dependeth wholly on the will and secret iudgements of God.

How our Ancients and reuerend Predecessors, punished such in former times, as durst do any dishonour to their Mistresse.

The Authors reason for this Chapter here set downe.

VVas as the more willing to insert this Chapter, to the ende that the youth of our times may know and vnderstand, in what veneration and regard, our Ancients held the honour of Ladies, Gentle-women, and Mistresses, and not without very great reason. For it is a notorious treason, & high point of dishonour, that he who abideth as a seruant in a house, should intermeddle in seeking to purchase the loue of his Mistresse: nay, and that which is worse, to obtaine the cheefest point of al. In the compassing or contriuing whereof, he maketh the husband infamous, doth iniurie to the wife, scandalizeth neighbourhood, and ouerthroweth himselfe.

Plutarch in lib. Matr. cap. 9.

Plutarch, in his Booke of Mariage writeth, that the Licamians had a law, that if any strangers were found to conferre in secret with the Mistresse of their lodging, they had their tongues cut out of their mouthes; and if they presumed any further, then it was the losse of their liues. Iulius Caesar caused one of his Capitaines to be beheaded, because he had dishonored the Mistresse of the house where hee was lodged: without attending any excuse he could or should make, and without any complaint vrged by the husband.

The severity of Iulius Caesar to a Capitaine.

The Emperour Aurelius, standing on a day at his window in his Pallace, & beholding a young man, who drew his Mistresse softly by the sleeve of her gowne; had them both brought before him immediately, and although the young man and his Mistresse both deposed, that it was onely done in iest; yet Aurelius commanded (neuerthelesse) the same hand to be smitten off.

Marcus Aurelius, a iust and severe Emperour.

Macrobius writeth in his Saturnales, that such persons were reputed infamous among the Romans, as should giue any commendations of the Mistresse of a Family, eyther in regard of her beauty, modest behaviour, or any other seemely quality. For such praises they reputed, to giue euident notice of more priuate knowledge, and such knowledge vrged speech, and speech being the discloser of the hart, would afterward grow to the shamefull acte. In the like manner Aulus Gellius recordeth, that the same punishment was inflicted on him that dishonored his Mistresse, as to him that corrupted a vestall virgin: which penalty was, to haue his body cut in foure parts, or else to bee stoned to death aliue.

Concerning diuers kinds of Salutation, vſed among our Ancients, when they met together.

HE manner that our Elders obſerued in their Salutations one to another, was very diuers, and each one according to their Countries vſe.

The Idumæans at their meetings, vſed to ſpeake theſe words: The Lord bee with you.

The true Hebrues, ſaluting each other, ſaid; God ſaue you my Brother.

The Philophers were wont to ſay; God in a good houre.

The Thebanes ſaid; God giue you health.

The Romans ſalutations were as if they they would ſay; God ſend or giue you good fortune.

The Sicilians ſaid; God keepe you.

The Carthaginians did not vſe any ſalutations by ſpeeches at their meetings, but as a ſigne of loue and friendlines, they would kiſſe their right hands each together, and then kiſſe one another.

The Moores likewiſe at their meetings, would kiſſe the right ſhoulder of one another: and when they tooke leaue for their departing, then they would kiſſe each others knee.

In Italy, they haue three ſeueral kinds of ſalutations for a whole day. In the morning they ſay, Dio vi dia il buono giorno; God giue you a good morrow: At midnoon, Dio vi dia ſalute; God giue you health. And at euening they ſay, Buona ſera, Good euen. They ſay alſo many times, Mi raccomando, I commend me to yee. And after two or three houres of night is paſt, then they ſay, Dio vi dia la buona notte; God giue you the goodneſſe of the night. Sometime alſo they are accuſtomed to ſay, Idio vi contenti, God content yee.

In the kingdome of Valentia in Spaine, when men meet together, they ſalute each other in this manner; Gentle ſir, you are wellcome. And at the departing, the one ſaith, God remaine with you: and the other replyeth, God in a good houre.

In Catholonia, ſuch perſons as chance to meeete together, ſalute one another thus; You are very well arrived heere ſir.

In Caſtile ſome vſe to ſay, God keepe you: others, God be with you. And when they leaue each other, the one ſaith, God conſerue you; and the other answereth, The beſſed Angels beare you company. Some alſo vſe to ſay; With your good grace and fauour. And others, Aden ſir. In the Court ſome vſe to ſay, I kiſſe the hands of your mercy. And ſome other, I kiſſe the feet of your Honour or Worſhip. Which Courting ſalutations are alſo together vaine, and (for the moſt part) deliuered with feigning and diſſimulation. For many offer to kiſſe the hands and feete of one another, that would much rather cut them off, the any way kiſſe them, deſiring indeed to ſee each others viter ruine. And certainly (me-thinks) that men of worth, authority, and reſpect, ought not to vſe any ſuch ſalutations; becauſe to kiſſe the feet, hath bin accounted a matter of great dignity, and appertaining to the Pope only. And to kiſſe the hand, is a gracious fauour affoorded by Kings and Princes, to ſuch Subiects as they thinke worthy of ſuch grace.

But without gadding after ſo many kinds of vanities, and diuerſity of idle words, it is a matter meeete and reaſonable, that wee who are Chriſtians, ſhould imitate Ieſus Chriſt our Lord and Sauour, ſaluting one another, with ſuch words as he ſaluted his Diſciples, ſaying; Peace be with you. Our Redeemer enſtricted vs alſo, to ſalute houſes at our entring into them, ſaying; Peace be in this houſe.

Epaminondas ſaid, that vntill the age of thirty yeares, we ſhould ſalute men thus: You are very wellcome hiher, for all this while it appeareth, that they are but come into the world. From thirty vp to fifty, then to ſalute thus; Well be yee; becauſe that then they know what manner of thing the world is. And from fifty defending downe againe, to ſay, God in a good and beſſed houre. For then it appeareth, that they are beginning, to take leaue of the world, and that as they had an entring into it, ſo there muſt needs be a departing from it.

What a commendable thing it is to pardon iniuries, eſpecially in Princes and great Lords.

I haue euermore bene a praiſe-worthy thing, to pardon iniuries and offences: which Princes and great Lords ſhould neuer be vnmindfull of, but continually to remember the words, which Julius Caſar ſpake to Manilius. Vvho (on a time) demanding of him, what that was which being performed by him, he therby thought to receiue the greateſt glory, and in remembrance whereof hee ought moſt to reioyce? Vvhereto he thus answered. By the immortal Gods I ſwear to thee Manilius, that I neuer thought my ſelfe to haue merited glory, for any other thing whatſoeuer in this life, nor any other elſe ſo much to reioyce me; then in pardoning ſuch as had iniured me, and rewarding them that did me ſervice. Vvords vndoubtedly worthy of praiſe, pleaſing to heare, notable to reade, and neceſſary to be followed. For althogh Julius Caſar beleeued as a Pagane, yet his works fauoured of a good Chriſtian: and we miſerable men, beleeuing all as Chriſtians, yet our works come farre ſhort of ſuch beleeſe, through the tentations of our corrupt fleſh. Becauſe humane wretchedneſſe is grown to ſuch an encreaſing in theſe caſes, that many would pardon the iniuries of their enemies; and yet notwithstanding, dare not do it for feare of men: who vnderſtanding, that ſuch a man is willing to forgiue his enemy, preſently vſe to ſay; that hee rather doth it through weakneſſe and cowardice, then in any reſpect of charity.

CHAP. XVIII.

From whence (as the firſt) came the title or name of King and alſo of Emperour.

OVR reuerend Fore-fathers, according to the diuerſity of Nations, called their Princes by diuers names. The Egyptians called their cheefeſt Lords and Rulers, Pharaohs: The Byzbians, Ptolomeis: The Parthians, Arſacides: The Albanes, Syluius: The Sicillians, Tyrants: And the Argines, Kings. Heere we are to vnderſtand, that long ſince in ſomer times, to be a King, was not any dignity, but an office only: as euen now (among vs) is a Gouernour of the Common-wealth.

Plutarch, in his Bookes of Common-wealth, ſaith, that at the beginning, alſo ſuch as gouerned, were called Tyrants: but afterward, all thoſe that gouerned badly, were termed Tyrants, and ſuch as ruled well were ſtyled Kings, as a different note from them. For as the King maintained common vility, and preferred the ſafety of the Commonwealth, before his owne reſpects and commodities; ſo the Tyrant referred his dominion to his cupidity and profite, alledging his will only, as the ſole reaſon of all his vniuſt commands. The King fed the ſtock, and the Tyrant deuoured it: the one obeyed lawes, & the other commanded about them, and alſo would breake them when himſelfe pleaſed: this man was equal, the other vniuſt; the one obtayned the kingdome by vertue, and therein conferred it; the other vſurped it by power, and ſo by power held it.

From the beginning of the foundation of Rome, the Romanes created Kings, to bee gouerned and defended by them: neuertheleſſe, they afterward found ſuch kinde of gouernment to be ſo bad, as they would endure no more but ſeuene Kings. And after they had baniſhed perpetually the Tarquins for their tyranny, cleaneſt or purged the City, and ſlaine their offerings: they made a ſolemne oath, for them, their children, and ſucceſſors, neuer more to create any Kings, eyther to gouerne Rome or them. But forasmuch as the Romane Common-wealth, had formerly receiued great benefits by their Kings, as by Numa Pompilius, and that their Kings only had the charge of ſacred things: they reſolued to keepe the name of King perpetually in their City, to the end, it ſhould not appeare, that with the expulſion of the Kings, they derogated from diuine Religion and Seruice.

And becauſe the Auguries or Diuiners had ſaide, that that name was conſecrated to the Gods: the Romanes ordained, that one man among them ſhould

CHAP. XIX.

What was the reason, and upon what occasion, Kings in ancient times were created & established: And of the Dignity Royall.

OR two principall causes, Kings were at first anciently established: One, to the end they should preserve common iustice and equity, by which bond humane society is maintained, and without which the lesser would be oppressed by the greater, all things being done by power, and no right observed. The other, because they should defend the goods and safety of their Citizens from enemies. The necessities of life assembled men among themselves, and conioyned them by a naturall society: which hath beene caused by mutual succours, support, and offices fitting mankind. The beginning of this society, was reason and speech, whereby wee are differing from all brutish creatures. Reason caused many and infinite artes to be invented, and speech (which is the interpreter of the spirit) learned, instructed, & communicated them, not onely by this mutual coniunction: but also hath stored the life of man with many commodities.

The first and cheefest, was the coniunction and coupling of man with woman, whereof was made one house, wherein all things were to the in common, & thence ensued plurality of houses. For Brothers, Sisters, and Cosins contracting marriage together at the beginning, and could not afterward (by multiplicity of their children) be contained all in one house, they went to dwell in other houses. So of one house at the first, came Boroughs and Villages, even as Colonies of kindred. Finally, from Boroughs & Villages were deriued Citties, and becoming to be peopled, were enclosed with walles, confirmed with lawes, and instructed with sciences: for without all these, they could not be preferred from the conspiracies of men, and therefore were to be ruled by some one, and couetousnesse of reigning is so great, that all would command, and none obey, or yeeld reuerence.

Eccles. 9.

The world would perish if the power of God did not governe it.

Herodotus l. 4.

The first beginning of Royall and Kingly Iustification.

Royall Maistie ought to be armed with good Lawes.

yea, & before they will set forth to Sea, foreseeing future perils, make their recourse to a good Pilot, in whom they repose their trust and safety: Euen so as requisite is it, to giue the government of a City, to such a one as may well conduct the common-wealth, and render iustice and right to every man. For where there is no Governor (saith Ecclesiastes) the people are scattered. All things which consist on a certaine order, should be referred to one head or cheefe. Which we may observe in some brutish creatures; as in Bees, who observe a forme or image of a common-wealth among them. This world it selfe (the parts whereof are conioyned among themselves, by admirable order and arteficial workmanship) would fayle and come to nothing, if it were not governed by the power of God. Therefore such as cannot endure the dominion of many, will submit themselves to the regiment of one; in whom, for opinion of wisdom and goodnesse, they may safely repose their trust. Not onely then to the Medes (saith Herodotus) but also to all other people, Kings (vervously inclined) were established for the administration of Iustice.

In elder times, kingdomes came not to the Sonnes of Kings, but was giuen to such a one, whom they thought would wisely and religiously maintaine the foundation of the Common-wealth, by concord and iustice. In those olde dayes, a King gouerned in every City, and after other Townes became annexed to the principality and dominion of one: Kings had beginning to governe ouer diuers people, and thence ensued, that according to the names of Kings, the Regions were so called, which the Romans termed Provinces. Moreover, every King should excell one another in iustice and power; to the end, that he may the better vnite his people by equitie, and defend the Common-wealth from enemies. And by good right it may be sayd, that Royall Maistie ought not only to be decorated with Armes; but ought also to be armed with lawes, that at all times, both of warre and peace, he may both manfully and vprightly governe.

Now, speaking of this Royall dignitie, doubtlesse it is so great and holy, that Kings being protectors and defenders of societies among men, do therein imitate the prouidence of God: the office and action of whom, is to rule and governe all things, & therefore by good right, they may be termed Vicars and Ministers of the almighty and soveraign Redor of the whole world, and he himselfe hath called them Gods. Plato reputed a kindome among mortall men, to be a diuine and soveraigne goodnesse; because it came neere to the diuine nature, and power celestiall. How farre then some do surpass each other in many things, so a King doth excell all other men in dignity and honor, nor humane but diuine.

Porus, a King among the Indians, being taken prisoner in battaile, when Alexander demanded of him, after what manner he would be vsed; Like a King, quoth he. Againe he vrged the same demand, & still he returned the same answer. For (quoth hee) all is comprised under the word King. The name of King was of so great veneration among Nations, that the Indians and Persians adored their Kings as a diuine image, and helde it for their highest and cheefest happinesse, to haue at any time but a sight of them. Porsus renowned Iupiter by the name of king, more than any other title. And in ancient times, Kings did not onely governe the common-wealth; but also had the charge and super-intendency of Ceremonies & Sacrifices. Kings then are sacred, considering that the Hebrewes with one and the same oyle, anointed both their Kings & high Priests.

Let vs see and obserue, how one kinde of reason, and the like of vnderstanding, do governe in man like a Queene. Let vs consider the other works of nature, which by a wonderfull kinde of concord, restrained and combined together, depend only vpon one. So that if things which imitate nature, are the most perfect and excellent, then questionlesse, Monarchy is most absolute and entire, farre above Aristocratie, Democratie, Oligarchie, or Laocratie, yea, all other kindes of government, where eyther many persons, or few, or the people themselves do rule and command. And like as it is a very hard matter, to finde many men good and honest, rather then one onely: so is it more hard, that the mannery of one man should be so soone corrupted, as of many. So that that if the whole world were governed by one man, there would not bee so many differences, manners, customes, nor diversities of religion, nor so many warres, offences, and slaughters. But when Cities are under the sway and power of many, they are then over-toyled with troubles, seditions, and dissensions, by reason of inordinate willes and affections in the greatest: who licence themselves to all euill, being partiall and discordant one towards another. Whereof God said by the mouth of his Prophet; Many Passions haue ruined my Vine.

Let me demanda one question, is it not much more seruile and slauish, to attend on the willes of many, then of one only. Nay, are not the couetous desires of one man sooner to be satisfied, then of many? you cannot chuse but grant it, and I craue no better iudgement. For as it is neyther good nor necessary, that in one house there should be many fathers of the Family: euen so is it neyther secure nor profitable, that the Common-wealth should bee governed by the authority of many. Whereof Licurgus gaue good assurance, when some one required, that Democratie should bee established in Sparta, hee returned this answer; Beginis then in thine owne house first.

Yet very true it is, that one man only, how great or small soeuer in power & prerogatiue, cannot (of himselfe) provide for all occasions, and in all places: but he may by his Lieutenants (as God by the ministry of his Angels) exercise his authority throughout all his Lands vnder his obedience, as hauing the eye of his minde euery where, for containning his Subiects in quietnesse, and causing iustice to be administred vnto them. I say then, as a conclusion to this Chapter, that wee ought to liue, in and vnder the vnity of these foure things; Of one God; Of one King; Of one faith; And of one Law.

The Preface

of the Author

Ecause amongst those Common-wealths of Freedom, governed by a certain number of Lords, many haue held opinion, that (at this present time) the Commonwealth of the Switzers is the cheefest, next vnto that of Venice: I haue many times questioned with diuers people, that were no Switzers, how, and after what manner this Common-wealth was first established & governed. For they did highly maruaile, that so many people, hauing but little, should ally and encrease themselves in so short while, euen as enclosed within a defensive wall or circuite, and continue firmly knit together in peace, for such a large and long expence of yeeres.

The Commonwealth of the Athenians, excelling all the rest in Greece, was assembled and selected of many people, and from many places, not only into one countrey, but also within one & the same city. As for the Commonwealth of the Achaians, composed of twelue towns or cities, it did not last long, nor prosper: but after it continued in some dignitie, vnder

Aratus and Philopoemen, soone afterward it was subdued by the Romaines, because she abused her owne liberty. After the death of Ioshua, the Common-wealth of Israel, exposed (thorow her owne fault) to pillage and violence of enemies, was many times protected and defended by Iudges and valiant persons, which God had raised vp for that purpose: but at the last, the twelue Tribes, as being glutted or sattetted with their own liberty, made choise of a King out of their own motion

In the time of our Ancestors, by the intermedling and solicitation of the Emperour Frederick, the Townes of Suaba v. nited themselves together, and (by that meanes) were esteemed inuincible: but hauing rashly attempted (and by badde conduct) war against the Switzers, the former confederation lost much of the latter. Which afterward, it seemed the recouered againe, when the confederates expelled the Duke of Wirtemberg, and ruined all the Castles of Suaba, detained by diuers theues and robbers. So that soon after the time of their league was expired they became so strange one to another, that they who before were their friends and allies, were reputed by them as their greatest enemies, and ioyned themselves with those that had most molested them; by which meanes, in verie few yeares this league was vtterly lost and vanished.

Now

All Switzerland is no other but one Commonwealth, & the reason thereof.

Now albeit there are many people, & a great number of Townes and Cities in Swetia, yet is it nevertheless, but euen as one City or Commonwealth. I know that learned men will hardly credite this, because they suppose vs to haue no society, nor any conjunction of government, and so (by consequent) it cannot be said, that Swetia can yeild the body of a Commonwealth; considering also, that the Townes are not tyed to the ordinances of other Cities or Townes, except with their owne good will and liking, as in the Conuentions priuate of associates. So it is, that in the same degree of Commonwealth, whatsoever hath passed by plurality of voyces, it bindeth all the Subjects of that Commonwealth. As for my self, I am not willing to contest with the learned: for I freely confesse the truth of their saying; if wee consider matters exactly. But in regard that the whole Nation of the Switzers consisteth of common estates, gouerning many Provinces in common, deliberating altogether on the affaires of peace and warre, hauing (almost) alike Lawes and Customes, and are so strictly conioyned by perpetuall Conuentions: admit that this were not one onely Commonwealth, and in such nature as hath bene formerly spoken of; yet notwithstanding, wee that write and speake of these matters some-what more popularly, do imagine, that we shall not much faile, in calling this association and league, the City and Commonwealth of the Switzers.

Thus then this Commonwealth established by perpetuall alliances, hath conferred her liberty for the space of more then two hundred yeares, with great concord, and incredible vnion of hearts of all the Switzers. For albeit that once or twice (according as it hapneth almost ordinarily in all great Commonwealths) they haue bene prouoked and stirred to ciuill warres: yet notwithstanding, those troubles were immediately pacified, and al reuinited together againe in sincere & cordiall affection; embracing the laudable desire of their predecessors, to study still for the freedom of their Countreyes maintenance. Neuerthelesse, there are some kind of men (enemies to the Switzers) so impudent, as to reproch vs, that in Heluetia, euery man is a master or commander, and that our Ancestors, hauing put to death, or troden vnder foote the awe of other Noblemen, by these meanes entered into this liberty, contrary vnto all right and reason. Others do (more truly) confesse, that our Noble-men did offer such outrage to our predecessors, both in words and deeds, that they had iust occasion to vnder take Armes, which all that while they managed very sharply, as it happeneth among people much abused and prouoked. But to satisfie the irresolution of some friends, who vnderstand not the estate of our affaires, and to rembarre the calumnies of the enuious, I thought good to employ my labour, in describing the forme of the Switzers Commonwealth, by reprobuing all vntruthes to the full, and ascending to the height of their originall.

All Heluetia or Switzerland, is at this day considered in three parts: for first of all, the thirteene Cantons haue alwayes allied and combined themselves, as into one body of a City. And these are they, Zurich, Berne, Lucerne, Vri, Suits, Vnderwald, Zug, Glaris, Basile, Fribourg, Soleurre, Schaffouse, and Appenzel. In the second place are the associates and confederates of the thirteene Cantons, to wit, first of all, the Abbot and Towne of S. Gall; next, the confedered Grifons, the Byshop of Sion, and the whole countries of Valais, Rotuile, Mulhouse, and Bienne. Consequently, the territories or Bayliwicks, which are gouerned by the 13. Cantons in common, to witte; Turgow, Bade, the Rheguises, now adayes called Rhinthal, Sargans, the free Provinces, the inhabitants of Lugano, Locarne, Mendrisse, and the Vale Madie, whereto may well be ioyned them of bellizone, who are vnder the dominion of the three lesser Cantons. The cities and townes of the Cantons & confederates, are Zurich, Berne, Lucerne, Zug, Basile, Fribourg, Soleurre, Schaffouse, S. Gall, Coire of the Grifons, Syon in Valais, Rotuile, Mulhouse, and Bienne for all the rest do dwell in villages.

Moreover, all of them abide not in Switzerland, neither within those limites proposed by Cesar in his Commentaries: for of the thirteene Cantons, Basile is as a quarter apart, which was anciently called the countrie of the Raurasians. Schaffouse is in Allemagne or Germany, on the further side side of the Rhine: and one part of them of Glaris and of Vri, do touch (as some conceiue) with the Grifons and the Alpes. As for the associates, except the Abbot and Town of S. Gall and Bienne: al the rest are out of the limits of the ancient country of Heluetia. First we consider, that the Grifons retainie still their name and olde country of the Rhauians. Next is the Palasians, who in elder times were called Viberins, Sedusians, and Veragrians. Rotuile is in Germany, and Mulhouse towards the Franche Comté. Now as concerning the Iurisdiccions or Bayliwicks, they of Rhinthal and of the Sargans, are Grifons. But they of Lugano, Locarne, Mendrisse, of the Vale Madie, and of bellizone, are Italians by originall and Language: the other Iurisdiccions remaine in Switzerland.

And heere you are to vnderstand, that these Cantons doe not hold equal authority ouer the distinct countries; but according as the associations haue bene made in diuersity of times, euerso are the authority of the Cantons diuers. They of Turgow, hold as their Lords and heads the feauen most ancient Cantons; namely, Zurich, Lucerne, Vri, Suits, Vnderwald, Zug & Glaris. Berne, Fribourg & Soleurre, do vndergoe some right in criminall causes. For the Prouostship or Precedency of the Empire (as they vsed to teame it) and iudgement of criminall proceses, was heretofore referred to them of Comstance, as their due: but among other conditions of peace, after the warre of Suaba, this authority was granted vnto the Switzers, which appertained equally to the fore-named Cantons, because they all ioyned together in the selfe-same warre. Moreover, those feuen Cantons commanding at Bada, did the like to them of Sargans, Rhinthal, and ouer the Free Provinces also. True it is, that in their gouernement of Bada, they associated the men of Berne with them, and they of Appenzel in the gouernment of Rhinthal; and all the Cantons to the foure Bayliwicks, which are on the confines of Italy. bellizone is subiect to them of Vri, Suits, and Vnderwald: and such (at this day) is the condition and estate of the Switzers Commonwealth. Now, I purpose to shew the times, the cause, and the principall Articles of the Switzers league. Also, what hath bene the estate of each Canton, before they became allied together, and what their dues and rights haue bene, and are. Lastly, what warres they haue maintained since their League was made.

CHAP. II.

Of the three first Cantons of the Switzers.

IN the yeare after the natiuity of our Lord Iesus Christ, 1307. they of Vri, Suits, and Vnderwald, were the very first that Cantoned themselves. They were tearmed Swaines or Boores of the countrey, dwelling in vallies, and in their owne Language, stiled, Die Drey Lander, also Die Drey waldstett: And, in time, Lucerne came into the fourth place. They dwelt in the Vallies of the Alpes, betwene the Grifons countrey, the Vale of Liuner, and high Valais, and were separated betwene the Canton of Zurich, and the countrie of Ergow. Some doe affirme, that they of Suits, are descended of the Cimbrians; they of Vri, of the Tauriscians; they of Vnderwald, of certain banished Romanes; and indeed, their magnanimity in war, declares them to be issued of generous Ancestors.

Their Annals do testifie, that the Emperor Lewes, sonne to Charlemaign, at the request of the Byshop of Rome, granted these people liberty to bee gouerned by Lawes made among themselves, & gaue them many other Priuiledges, for their faithfull seruice in warre against the Sarrazins, in behalfe of the citie of Rome. For the Sarrazins, who in those times much troubled Africa, hauing invaded Sicilie, came likewise into Italy: where they tooke some places: and afterward marching vnto Rome, easily made themselves Masters of the Varican, which then stood voyd of any defence. There they robbed the Temple of Saint Peter, breaking downe the gates thereof, that were of stur and very great value, and afterward burnt and destroyed it. Having continued there diuers dayes in determination to surprize the whole Citie; they heard tydings (as Historians say) that a great band of soldiers, belonging to * Cisalpine Gaule, came to the succor of Rome, which made them forthwith recoile, and to waite all the plaine Country about Rome. Among other badde seruices, they robbed the Temple of S. Paul upon the way to * Ostia, and stuffed it with such fires, as the more part thereof was vtterly ruined.

From thence continuing on they coule in spoile and rauage, euen so far as mount Cassinum, they stole away all the Jewels and Ornaments of the Abbey, and defaced a great part thereof. Thence getting vnto the sea shore, and lading their Shippes with their holne booties: finding them ready to set saile, they lanchd forth into the maine.

Now, the Annales of Switzerland or Heluetia, do say, that these three first Cantons, and they of the Valley of Hufell, were present at this fore-mentioned succor and supply, and passed two severall times into Italy, vnder the conduct of a certaine Italian Marquesse, named Guy. They pursued the Sarazins, and cut their rere-gard in peeces, bringing back a great spoile from this ouerthrowe of theirs, which they altogether gaue to the Temple of S. Peter, euen all that they hadde gotten from the enemy. In regard whereof, the Pope (as a recompence for so great a benefite) obtained (on theyr behalfe) great priuiledges from the King of France; and moreover, presented them with those Ensignes or Standards, which yet, in our daies, they vse to beare in war.

Notwithstanding, the Emperor Lewis sonne to Lewis the Debonnaire, and youngest sonne to Charlemaigne, gaue them of Vri, to the Abbey which he had built at Turegum, now called Zurich, wher his daughter Hildegarde was Lady Abbess: and the wordes of the Donation (truly translated out of the Latine Coppie) are these which follow.

The Donation of the Emperour Lewis to the Abbey of Turegum.

E give to our Abbey, founded at Turegum, where Saint Felix and Saint Regula rest in the Lord with their bodies; our Bourrough or Towne of Turegum, situated in the Duchy of Saaba, in the Territory of Durgan, with all the appurtenances and dependances in diuers charges: to wit, the village of Vri, with the churches, houses, and other buildings aboue named: The slaves, male and female young and old, lands earable and desert, Woods, Meddowes, pasture grounds, Fish ponds, Rivers, Ports, Passages, things found and yet to find, with all olde rents and reuenewes. Moreover, our Forreist named Albis, and generally all those things fore-mentioned, that either now or hereafter do and may appertaine vnto us, without reseruing or retaining any thing whatsoever.

But it is not to bee thought, that this Donation did vtolly abolish the ancient priuiledges and libertie of them of Vri: For, if we may credit them, the Emperour gaue not the Seignery of all the country to this recited Abbey, but of one Village or two onely. Moreover, if it were so that the whole valley of Vri had bin vnder subiection to this Abbey, yet notwithstanding, it could not much preiudice their freedome: because such as were any way subiect to Monasteries or Conuents, were obliged vnder certaine conditions, and enioyed their liberties in the meane while, onely their seruice to the Church excepted.

Beside, they receiued their Gouernors or Prouosts of the empire, to take knowledge and censure in causes criminall, without any appeale. They of Vri also did formerly do the like; and as concerning other causes, their Iudge, whom they tearme Amman (as much to say, as Maior or Bourgmaster) with his Counsellors or Alsistants, was chosen from among the people, by good knowledge had of him and them, & they are to provide in common for the affaires of the Commonwealt. They of Suits & Vnderwald gouerne themselves in the same manner: and among them, men belonging to the Church, haue some power and priuiledges. In these severall quarters were good store of Noblemen. As among them of Vri, the Barons of Atingbule, Schwynnberg and Przing: The Lords of Silini, Wimerberg, Moje, Sedorf, Spiring, Meier, of Bourgs and of Gesefeld. Among them of Suits, the Lords of Stouffacker, Roggenberg, Schuuanow. In the quarters of Vnderwald, the Lords of Wolfenschiess, Blumenc, Rudenz, Altsach, Walkersberg, Lembourg, Liebourg, and Huneville. At the beginning, these Gentlemen carried themselves very kindly with the other Inhabitants, and part of them serued as vassalles to some neighbouring Earles. But when they grew rich thorow succession of times, they began to misprize the people, and to subiect them to theyr vnusl commands. The Gouernors, who ought to conferre the peoples libertie, making semblance of not seeing such harsh behaviours: fauoured the Gentlemen, as being next in condition to themselves, and by those meanes both augmented & supported their power.

In those times especially, not onely the freedome of the Switzers Cantons, but likewise of many Townes in Germany, were in manifest danger. The Emperors were excommunicated, and in open warres assailed by the Popes, so that all Germany was diuided into two factions, one part wherof followed the Popes power, and the other the Emperors. The people of Switzerland, and some few of their Nobility, rooke part with Frederick the lawfull emperor, who (for that cause) renewed and reconfirmed the auncient priuiledges of their liberty. They of Suits can yet shew the Letters Patents of Frederick the second, written in the moneth of September, in the yeare 1240. whereby he receiued them of Suits into the safeguard of the empire, as members thereof; and that they should not be any way aliened or estranged thence, hee confirmed their priuiledges, and called them people of free condition.

On the contrary side, the most part of the Nobility, especially such as were as vassalls to Conuents and Abbaies, which were then in very great credit, they followed the Popes faction. Hence spring the hatreds, enmities, and first foundation of ciuill dissensions, all taking a wonderfull increasing in the Interregnum of manie yeares, after the death of Fredericke. Next thereafter, in those very times, the fore-named people did (euen then) enioy their intire liberty, although many ambuscadoes were prepared to deprive them of it: as appeareth sufficiently by a deed patent of confederacie for three yeares, by them of Vri and Suits, with them of the Towne of Zurich, the tenor of which confederacie followeth thus.

Whatsoeuer hath bin done or past before y day, doth not any way ty vs together. If a Lord, whatsoeuer he be, haue a seruant or vassall among vs: that vassall or seruant shall be subiect vnto him, according to the custome which hath heretofore bin vsed in the kings time. But if the Lord shall constraime him beyond that limitation; then will we endenor to succour the seruant. If any of the Allies or confederates shall possesse himselfe of any Castles or other places, without the counsell and liking of the other Allies, they shall not stand bound to furnishe the with the charge of Garrison or munition. If any one haue done endamage by fire or spoile on any place, Wee will join all our meines together, to make war on them that shall haue committed such an offence. If any shall attempt to invade or set upon the lands of Vri and Suits: they of Zurich shall impeach them to their uttermost power. If they cannot attaine therunto: they shall then endamage them by burning,acking, and all other helpes of hostility. If any shall besiege the Towne of Zurich, and shall

And We of Zurich haue chosen three among them of Vri's name, Garnier de Atinghule, Burckhard, the old Amman, Conrad Maieur of Orschneid. And as many of Suites, namely, Conrad, Amman of Iberg, Raoul Stiffacher, and Conrad Hun. These twelue men, according to their discretion, shall giue command to all the Allies, for mutual aid and succouring one another, both how and whensoever neede shall require, in those affaires whereof the conditions haue formerly bin expressed. If any one of these twelue men shall chauce to die within compass of the three yeares alliance, the other shall stand bound by Oath, to substitute another in his place, within fourteene dayes after following. And to the end that all before declared, may continue firme for the time prefixed: Wee the Senate and Citizens of Zurich, and we the people of Vri and Suites, haue put our Seales to three instruments of the same tenore, concerning this our faithfull alliance. Given at Zurich the day of Saint Gal in the year of our Lord God, M. CC. LI.

These Letters of alliance, made an too. yeares before that they of Zurich hadde contracted perpetuall alliance with the three first Cantons, do euidently declare how those people were euermore ielous of their liberty, without offering wrong neuerthelesse vnto any person in conseruing it. Now, about ten yeares after this alliance made, the Empire being troubled with factions, in regard it was destitute of an Emperour, and Heluetia much molested by the ouermuch license, which the Nobility tooke to themselves day by day: the three Cantons hauing heard Raoul of Habsbourg (who was afterward Emperour) to be highly commended for many Vertues clearly shining in him, gaue him yearly pledges, and electing him for their head, made alliance with him, that they liberty might be maintained at the sword's point, if neede required. They of Zurich, Basle, and Strasbourg did as much at the very same time. The like did manie free Townes of Germany, being called vnto their succour, and gaue many euery yeare to the neighbouring Princes, to the end, they might be secured by their meanes.

The authority of Raoul, being buified in other warres about Zurich, Basle, and Strasbourg, comming short of abilitie to repress the insolence of the Nobilitie: at length the people (being too much trod downe by great meane outrages) vnder-tooke Armes, and expelled them forth of the Country that had raised this disorder. This warre continued twelue yeares, about the yeare of our Lord, 1260. and some few yeares following. And in this warre, all the Cantons beganne to fortify the passages of their Countreies. They of Suites builded a Tower at Mount Sattell, fortifying and cutting off the great highway. They of Vnderwald, did dam vp the Lake with a strong prouision of stakes & shrubs, toward the village of Stantz, and fortified the Port, by meanes of a Tower which they builded there. The year 1273. it came to passe, that Raoul of Habsbourg was elected King of the Romaines. Then the Gentlemen of Switzerland went vnto him, and gaue him to vnderstand, that the people had rebelled: on the contrary, the people maintained, how much the Nobility had outraged them. The King hauing heard both parties, and sene the priuileges of the people, gaue sentence to their benefit, and made peace between them and the Noblemen expelled out of Heluetia, whither they returned again for the more part. As for the rest of the country, the king did generally confirme Gouernours in the name of the Empire, & not of the house of Austria: which Gouernours (from their beginning) did not dwell in towns or villages, but kept themselves in their Castles, whence they came, twice or thrice yearly, to iudge in cases of process, but more especially in criminal causes.

In our dayes, there are Towns in Germany, that receiued such Gouernours of the Empire, who managed no other matter, but onely causes criminal, & had no other occasions in Townes to attend vpon, but only the. And so far off was king

For, without depending on them of Zurich, he confirmed and augmented the priuileges of the Canton of Suites, in the 18. yeare of his Empire, as appeareth by his Letters giuen at Bada, in the yeare 1291. where, in expresse termes, they of Suites are called people of free condition.

True it is, that the King himselfe tooke very great paines, to make the house of Habsbourg great: but he left to the Switzers their liberties entire. Either because he would not be accounted vnthankfull, in ruining that that had succoured him, and shewne themselves faithfull in his right, before he was Emperour, perswading himselfe also, that his affaires would prosper the better, by hauing the Switzers his loyall friends and associates; then to make rebels of subiects, who would carry but bad affection to the oppressors of their liberty: Or else in regard, that hauing (but a very little before) ioynd the Dukedome of Austria, as also of Allemagne or Suabia, to his other possessions, he might thereby imagine, that it would beget him a generall hatred, to fasten on things of such slender consequence, and that all the profit hee could procure, by vlturping ouer the Switzers, could not value the ill-will he should gaine thereby.

Adolph de Nassau, who was successeur to Raoul in the Empire, confirmed to the Switzers their priuileges. By meanes whereof the Switzers were highly hated of Albert, Sonne to Raoul, and enemy to Adolph. This Albert was the very greatest aduersary and persecutor of the liberties of the Switzers. Hee had a great number of children, and to aduance and enrich them, hee began to stretch soorth his wings so farre as possibly he could, & especially hee refused, to prouide a new kinde of principality in Switzerland. Hye being become Emperour, attributed many things to the house of Austria, that appertained to the Empire: which made him offensive and insupportable to his neighbours, in being shamelesse, yet to himselfe whatsoeuer he desired, cyther by vniuelt demands, or else by manifest violence. And because Ecclesiasticall persons were very powerfull, he practised by all meanes, cyther to make sale to them of their iurisdiction, or else to make them acknowledge him and his childre, as their hereditary and perpetuall Tutors & Protectors. In this manner he dealt with the Colledges and Conuents of Strasbourg, Basle, Constantine, Coire, S. Gall, the Hermitage, of Basle, Disentz, Pfawertz, Ringow, Wettingen, Auren, Interlach, Trubis, Gertra, Secoug, Schenstis, Zurich, and many other places beside. By the selfe-same cunning, he solicited & oppressed the Earles and Barons of Switzerland or Heluetia, to put themselves into the safeguard, and become vassals to the house of Austria. Among others were the Lords of Pfisau, Rotenbourg, Kempfbourg, Eschenbach, Albourg, Wolburg, and Grencence.

In former times, the Colledges and Conuents depended vpon the Empire, & Lords & Gentlemen did neuer acknowledge any other Soueraigne vpon earth, but the Emperour only: but this Albert laboured to fasten all to the house of Austria. Wee may easily iudge of his violence towards strangers, by his bad carriage to his owne proper Nephew, to who he would neuer (although hee was very many times thereto required) render the Hermitage paternall, which hee gouerned in quality of a Tutor. But the Abbot of Saint Gall, two Colledges of the Towne of Zurich, and the Count of Hombourg, could neuer be brought to that point, to acknowledge them of Austria, for their Protectors, neyther to sell them any portion of their iurisdiction. They continually alledged their ancient priuileges, and would not permit, that they should be dismembred from the Empire: which much incensed and offended the Emperour, who had practised vpon the rights of many other, especially the Conuents Secoug, Murbach, the Hermitage, Interlach, Disentz, and Lucerne, who had giuen him all that appertained to them, at Glaris, Lucerne, Suits, and Vnderwald. Howbeit, they had formerly promised (by verie authentical letters) to the inhabitants of those places, neuer to alienate them to any other. But all this while, Albert cunningly wonne the hearts of simple people, and by goodly promises, made them to ratifie these alienations.

ting in the round neighbouring Countries, & bought some Castles of the Con-named Cantons: hee began to looke into some meanes, whereby he might become Master of Suiss and Vnderwald, which be-mined over the Hermitage, Glaris Zug, Lucerne, & other places thereabout) caused many to imagine, that except hee could prevale against the too, they would quit their liberty as the other did. Nevertheles, Albert being desirous to reach the height of his desire, by such meanes as he had propounded to himselfe: sent in Embassage to them of Suiss and Vnder-wald, the Baron of Lichtenberg, Gouvernor of Alsace, and the Baron of Ochsenlin, two of his intimate Counsellors. They addressed themselves first to the of Suiss, and perswaded them to yeeld themselves into the protection of the house of Austria, who were very benigne Princes, & vnder whose dominion they might live much more peaceably, the formerly they had done vnder the Empire, dismembred and rent in peeces (as it were) while the Princes were in debate about the election of Emperours. They further added, that they of Austria had the reuenues of many Convents in those very quarters, and that if they refused, by displeasing Albert, they might well conceive, that their affaires would but badly carry themselves;

but in doing the contrary, his highnesse made them promise, of all honest & amiable entertainmet, that a Prince could afford them.

The men of Suiss, having bene aduertised before, concerning the intention & demand of Albert, by Garnier, Count of Hombourg, Lord of a neere neighbouring Country, called La Marche: a man not well affected by Albert, because he had refused to yeeld himselfe vassale to y^e house of Austria: And having conferred with them of Vri and Vnderwald, returned thus their answer to the Ambassadors.
That the Kings and Romane Emperours had given them faire and ample privileges, carrying expresse charge, that they should neuer bee dismembred from the Empire: wherefore they were fully resol-ued, in imitation of their Ancestours example, to continue firmly ioyned to the Romane Empire. As for the Monasteries of Murbach and Beron, whose rights and reuenues (especially about Suiss) were then in the hands of the Austrian Princes, having formerly promised by authentical instruments, neuer to alienate themselves to any other authority whatsoever. If they had kept their promise, they would have done the like in duty to them. But seeing that they had broken their faith, and all former contracts were vnusually cancelled: their example was no warrant to them for the like. Moreover, they would render to Albert and his children, Princes of Austria, such fidelity and obedience as they ought to do: entreating Albert, seeing he was Emperour; that he would not permit them to be diuided from the Empire. Beside, in regard his Predecessours had confirmed their privileges to them of Suiss (which himselfe as yet had not done) they therefore againe did humbly entreate him, that he would vouchsafe to confirm them. They also desired the Ambassadors, to returne this their answer to his Imperiall Maiesty, and to entreate on their behalfe, that he would benignly receiue them.

The Ambassadors hauing this answer, went to deale with them of Vri & Vnder-wald: who (according to that which had bene accorded on among them before) made the selfe-same answer as they of Suiss had done. In all the forenamed Villages, they did nothing else but shew to the Ambassadors, the Letters Patents and privileges, granted them by Fredericke, King of Habspourg, and other Emperours, together with the letters and consents of the Monasteries: all of them making humble entreaty, that they might not be compelled to feele all those things frustrated. But the Emperour having heard the Ambassadors, was highly offended at the answer, because the Switzers not only refused to acknowledge them of Austria for their Lords, & would not willingly be separated from the Empires body: but also declared, that they would yeelde to no distinction from the Monasteries, by which meanes, all the precedent attempts of Albert, built vpon great cost and trouble, were utterly disappointed.

In some short while after, they of Suiss, Vri and Vnderwald, hauing againe sent their Ambassadors vnto the Emperour, to obtaine confirmation of their pripriviledges: hee answered them in chol-ler, that hee would satisfie their requests, according as they had done his demands.

And that hee had deputed certaine Gouernours, which he purposed to send vnto them; and by whom they should more amply vnderstand his minde.

Following this intention, hee sent as Governours, the Knight Grissler, and Peri-grin Landberg. Grissler was appointed for Suiss and Vri, and made his abiding in an olde Castell about Suiss, called Cusnach, and beside, hee builded another Fortresse
on the Land of Vri, Landberg, the Gouer-nour of Vnderwald, had two Castles, to wit, Sarne about the Forrest, and Rosbach, beneath, which Forrest diuided the country of Vnderwald into the midst. These two Castles did formerly belong to the Conuent or Colledge of Lucerne, & the Majors or Bourgoisasters made their dwellings there: but the Emperour Albert
had sold them to the house of Austria, and there he appointed Garrisons. These deportments were something nouell and strange to them of Vri, Suiss, and Vnder-wald: for till that time, these three federal places together had but one Gouernour, who (ouer and beside) was many times
Gouernor of Zurich and other Townes.
Hee remained in his Seigneries out of the Cantons, and euery yeare once or twice (being called) hee came thither to Iudge in law-cafes. The rest of the time, he had a Lieutenant chosen among the Country people, that executed his charge.
But now there was appointed two perpetuall Gouernours, keeping Garrison in the very strongest parts of the Country:
which the people were constrained to endure, only in feare of the Emperour, and in regard beside, that those places were in the power of the Austrian Princes.

At the beginning, these Gouernours shewed themselves very courteous and affable to all men labouring by blandishments and faire looks, to winne the peoples hearts, & to subiect them to the house of Austria. But perceiving that these carriages did little auale them, they began to checke and oppress the people, by the command of Albert; who was againe greuously enraged, by reason of a new league or alliance (made for the space of ten yeares) betwene them of Suiss, and the Count of Hombourg. Tyranny thus encreasing day by day, Ambassadors (in name of the three Villages) were sent to the Emperour, who would neither see nor heare them: so that they were com-strained to declare their Commission to his Counsellors. The summe whereof was, that being people of the Roman Empire, they had obtained very ample franchizes and priviledges of the Emperours:

whereof they were now in danger to bee deposited, and oppressed by an idleforme and insupportable tyranny. For the inhabitants of the recited places, were without cause, or vpon very slender occasion, immediately imprisoned, & pressed with nouell exactions. Beside all this, euery man in particular, was compelled at a certaine time, especially the first day of the year, to bring presents to the Gouernours, which neuer had bene put in practise before. In which respect, they most humbly desired the Counsellors, to intercede on their behalfe to the Emperour: that such charges might bee taken from them, and that their ancient priviledges might bee confirmed and put in full force againe.
But the Emperours Counsellors hauing conferred and agreed together, made answer; that the Villages themselves were the cause of this oppression, and that the Emperour was thus severe to them, because they would not follow the example of Lucerne, Zug, and Glaris, in yeelding themselves to the house of Austria. Which doing, and making more account (then formerly they had done) of Albert and his children; they should find him a Prince that would vse them very kindly.

The Deputies hauing received this answer, returned without doing any thing else: in the meane while, the tyranny of the Gouernours (being fauoured & winked at by the Emperour) grew more and more to greater strength. In a certaine Valley of Vnderwald, called Melchtall, ther dwelled an aged rich man, ialous of his Countries liberty, and one that had bene
the cheefeft in counselling his comparions, neuer to subiect themselves vnto the house of Austria, but carefully to preserue their ancient liberty, which ma was named Henry of Melchtall. Landberg sent a Seruant vnto him, with charge to bring away with him a couple of Oxen. When to Henry answered, that he knew not himselfe to be culpable of any crime, whereby the Gouvernour should exact such an amends of him: and albeit hee had committed some offence, yet hee ought not thus to extend his authority vpon his goods, before he had beene heard & condemned. The seruant being of humour answerable to his Master, arrogantly replied, that instantly he wold drine thence the Oxen: and if he stood in need of them to plough his Land, his Country lubbers should serue to draw in the yoke. Thus speaking, heeooke the Oxen out of their yokes, and made himselfe ready to drine them away.

Oppression is an evil matter to procure impudence in a Sonne, seeing his Father injured.

Tyranny may iustly be termed the Mother of wrong and iniustice.

Tyranny blindfolded by his villanous companion concupiscence, and chastised by the iust iudgement of God.

Arnold, a lusty young man, and Son to Henry, moued at this outrage offered to his father, gaue the seruant a sound blow with a cudgell, as hee was drining on the Oxen, and chanced to breake one of his fingers: but fearing the tyranny of his Master, he got immediately to the top of the Mountaines, and withdrew himselfe among them of Vri, where hee kept close with one of his kindred. Landberg vnderstanding at that had past, sent out for Henry Melchall, demanding of him what was become of his Son. Henry made answer, that he knew not where he was, as indeed hee was merely ignorant of his flight: whereat the Gouvernour was so furiously enraged, that he caused the old mans cies to be pluckt forth, & rowe away his Oxen, & depoyled him beside, of the most part of his goods. This cruelty brought him into the hatred of all the people: but in regard of Alberts power and oppressions, commanding ouer them very stearely, there was no man (as then) that durst stir against him. And because wicked courses grow to a great head, when ouermuch licence is permitted to them: euen so insolent iniquity in the Gouvernours, did drine them out of one mischiefe into another.

Neere to the Abbey of Engelberg, and to the Village of Wolfenchiez, in a place named Alzellen, there dwelt a country mā called Conrad de Bongarten, married to a very faire and beautiful woman. It chanced that a Gentleman, named Wolfenchiez, being Lieutenant to the Gouvernour, returning from Engelberg, & passing by Alzellen, to goe home to his house at Rotzberg, found this womā in a meadow, busied about some commendable exercise. He vnderstanding that her husband was absent, commanded the woman to make him ready a Bath, wherein he might wash himselfe, because he was ouer-travelled with heate and labour. The woman not daring to make refusall, did as the tyrant had commanded her. Proceeding on further in his intended villany, he pressed the woman to put off her garments, and come into the Bath to him; wherein shee promised to obey, provided, that two varlets, which attended on him, might withdraw themselves, as accordingly they presently did vpon their masters command.

The woman vsing some delay, yet feigning preparation of her selfe to come into the Bath; got recovery of a doore behind in the chamber, and fled away in great feare and anguish. Her husband returning from the Forrest, chanced to meete her, and vnderstanding what had happened, entred his house, and with an Axe or Hatchet, which he then had in his hand, slew the Lieutenant sitting in the Bath, and so hee receiued the chastisement due to his wicked attempt, vpon the honour of a vertuous modest woman. The Gouvernour fought all means to reuenge his death: but hee was so hated of all men, as he could not execute any thing. Beside, the villany and indignity of his Lieutenant, with-held him from daring to require any helpe of the Country: in regard also, that he who had done the deed, was fled into the Lands of Vnderwald, & kept himselfe hid among them of Vri. Some say, and among others, Eternilerus, and Stumpfin in his Annales of Heluetia, that this man was the Gouvernour himselfe; who seeking thus to violence an honest woman, became so laine. But they of Vnderwald maintaine, that hee who was kild in the Bath, was called Wolfenchiez, a seruant to the house of Auflria, and dwelling at Rotzberg.

While these Tragedies were thus acting at Vnderwald, Grifler, the Gouvernour of Vri and Suits also, to keepe the people in the more awe and subiection, began to build (by command from his Master) a Fort or Cittadell neere to Alorff, vpon a small Hill called Solturme. This Grifler being a verie vaine-glorious man, made vaine of abasing the people in such fort, that hee would bow & bend them at his his pleasure, whereupon he called his Fort, A yoke of extreme slavery to the Priens. He perceiving, that all men were enraged & badly bent toward him, and doubting, lest some matter might secretly be contriued against him, to compasse discouery thereof, he vnderooke this course ensuing. He caused a Hat or Bonnet to be fixed vpon a long Pole, erected in the market place of Alorff, where the greater part of the Country people vsed to meete, and gaue command, that all men (taking off their owne Bonnets) should bow their knes, and yeelde as much honour to that Hat, as they vsed to doe to him the Gouvernour, or when they came into his presence. His purpose and opinion was hereby, that such as were maliciously addicted towards him, would neuer humble themselves, in doing so many reuerences to the Hat, especially if they had any comforts, vpon whose help they made any dependance: and that this occasion would serue him as an honest pretence for their discouery to his spies, and so tortures might be inflicted on them, to gain knowledge of the whole enterprize. In the meane while, he departed thence, to visite the Country of Suits, where he was likewise Commander and Gouvernour.

In Suits there was a Gentleman of marke, named Garnier Stouffacher, whose Father was called Raoul, and had bene the first Magistrate of Suits, about thirty years before. This Garnier had built a house in more ample and magnificent manner, then was the vsual custome of the Country. It fortuned, that the Gouvernour Grifler passed on horsebacke by this house, and demanded to whom it appertained. Stouffacher knowing himselfe to bee in the ill opinion of the Gouvernour, because he had alwayes before counselled the people, not to subiect themselves to them of Auflria: This house (quoth he) is for the King and you, by whose liberality, I am possessor of it. Then the Gouvernour answered; I am Lord of this Country, and henceforward I will not suffer any more, that yee shall sway your selues after your owne appetites, in building houses, as if you were Masters, and that you shall well feele before it be long.

This answer deliuered with outrageous menaces, greatly displeased Stouffacher, who (from that time forward) could not dissemble his griefe. Which was the cause that his wife, being a wife, modest, and discrete Lady, perceiving her husband sad and pensifue, and vnderstanding the reason thereof: exhorted him to hope well, in regard that God, to whom all violence and tyranny was displeasing, wold neuer forsake such as inuoked his help & furtherance. Moreover, it would well become him to make search after men of courage, such as were oppressed with the same tyranny: to conferre with them, and ioine their meanes together, to recover the liberty of their Country; for shee durst assure him, that God would blesse so holy an enterprize. Stouffacher, hauing a long time consulted with himselfe, at length went from Suits, to Vri, where he easily knew and perceiued, that Grifler was hated of all men in those quarters, by reason of his insupportable pride, euen as much as he was in Suits: especially by the Baron of Attinghuse, then cheefe in iustice at Vri, & a familiar friend to Stouffacher. This Baron first began to complaine, as extremely wearied with the insolencies of Grifler, in erecting his Hat, as to ranke it with Princes; protesting openly, that he could not permit his Country, any longer to endure so great a tyranny.

But Stouffacher fearing (perhaps) that the Baron vsed this kinde of language, onely but to sound him, and (as we vse to say) to vndermine his secret cogitations; kept his owne intention couert, contenting himselfe, to breake his minde vnto an ancient faithfull friend of his, called Gautier Furst, that is to say, the Prince. These two hauing many and sundry times considered on all matters, and taken into their counsell (as a third party) Arnould Melchall of Vnderwald, bound themselves together by mutual oath, to ioine all their meanes, and employ their paynes by a common consent, for the extirpation of tyranny, and reducing their country to her ancient liberty. Moreover they concluded, that each of them in his owne quarter, should procure so many men as possibly he could, provided, that they were people of good and discrete carriage: who should all sweare, to employ both their goods & bodies, and to maintaine one another in his right, for recovery of the Countries former freedom: and that in the meane while, each man should acquit himselfe of his duty towards the Empire, the Monasteries, as also to all Gentlemen & Yeomen. Promising likewise, to keepe this league & combination secret, untill such time as (by common aduice) all the confederates should bee resolved to publish it. They made choise also of a private place, neere to the Lake of Vri, called Grully, where these three chiefe heads of the League vsed to meete, accompanied each one with three or foure, to aduise together what was to be done.

Thus you may perceiue, how the ground-wooke of the League of Switzers was then begonne, by Stouffacher, Furth, and Melchall: and being so agreed vpon, each man returned by himselfe home, to make conjunction with his companions. Soone after this, not onely the vulgar people, but likewise the most part of the Nobility in the Villages, rancked themselves with the confederates: For the Governours did molest the Noblemen, no lesse then they did the common sort, not making any difference betwene the one and other, but called the Gentlemen, peazants, and companions of rascality. In like manner, they of Austria had appropriated (by little & little) to themselves, the rights belonging to Noblemen: whereat many being offended, had forsaken (as it were) the part of Austria, as we haue formerly obserued by the Baron of Attinghusse.

The number of the confederates being encreased, it seemed good to many, that it was time to set hand to the worke, namely, to chafe thence the Governours, & replant the ancient liberty of the country: for feare (lest by ouer-long delay, their enterprize would be discouered (by some means) to the Governours. And therefore, in the yeare 1207, the 17. day of October, twelue of the principall men among all the confederates, assembled themselves at a certaine place appointed. All inlisted to lay hand to the business so soone as possible might be against which, they of Vnderwald onely opposed themselves: because that the Castles or Fortresses, which the Governour held in their territory, to wit, Sarne and Rotzberg, were places well munited, and almost impregnable, and if sieges should bee planted before them, the King of the Romaines would come forthwith, bringing an Army sufficient to succour them. The other confederates yielded to this motion, and agreed together, that the first day of Ianuary then next following, through all the Cantons, seizure should be made, on all the strongest Castles belonging vnto the Governour. To whom notwithstanding, not any outrage should be offered, neither to any of their family or Garrison: except only to such as would make head, and withstand them in Armies; but to send the Governours safely and well away, with their goods. Moreover, that the Castles and strongest holds or Cittadels, should be rased from the top to the bottom: to declare by manifest effect, that they had not vnderaken Armes for blowes or pillage, but onely to conferre their Countries liberty. This resolution agreed on, each man retired home to his house, awaiting for the day appointed: in the meane space, according to faithfull promise, they kept their determination very secret.

While these affaires were thus in forwarding, there happened a notable accident at Vri. One Guillaume Tell, a man in the confederacy, diuers times passed by before the Hat exalted on the Pole, as formerly hath beene related, without performing any reuerence thereto. And being therefore accused to the Governour Grissler: he entreated, that his incivility might bee excused, because hee reputed such reuerence to bee a matter of no importance. But the Governour, who held him a man much to be suspected, among Guillaumes children, made choise of a young little boy, whom the Father loved very dearly. And hee commanded Guillaume (being known an excellent archer) to set his sonne some good distance off, & with an Arrowe, to cleave an Apple vpon his head, which if he did not, his owne head should be smitten off. Guillaume Tell answered, that his commaund was too strange and seuerer, and he had rather die, then thorough default of shooting right, to kill his dearest sonne. If thou doest not performe it, saide the Governour, it shall cost both thy life, and thy sonnes.

Prayers and entreaties not preuailing, Tell tooke his Bowe; and, by the providence of God (who questionlesse guided and directed the Arrow) cleft the Apple in twaine vpon his sonnes head. Euerie

one of the beholders did not a little reioyce. at such a faire and admirable shoot: but the Gouvernor, not contented with to perillous a satisfaction, perceiving another Arrow remaining vnder Guillaume girdle, demanded of him, what vñ hee meant to make of that other Arrow? Guillaume replied, that it was a custome among Archers, to draw more arrowes then one out of their Quivers, for any occasi that might happen. But the Gouvernor suspending something else, pressed him more & more, & finally, promised him to saue his life, if he would confesse the truth: which accordingly Tell did, and that he had that other Arrow ready, therewith to kill the Gouvernor, if his first shaft had slaine his Son. Then the Gouvernor declared, that he would not take away his life, because he had promised the contrary: but he should be kept in perpetual prison, and liue miserably in darknesse, without conuersing with any man liuing. Thus speaking, he caused him to be fast bound with cordes, & led into a Barque, that hauing past the Lake of Vri, he might be conuayed to the Cattle of Cusnach. The Gouvernor, with his people & prisoner, being in the midst of the Lake, a greenous tempest suddenly exalted it selfe, which did put the Barque in euident perill. They perceiving themselves in extreme danger of their liues: one of Grislers seruants laid to his master, that there was but one only means whereby to saue them, and that was, to vnbinde Guillaume Tell, and refer the Barques conduct to him, because he was a most expert Mariner, strong and able to direct them in such a necessity. So extreme vrgent was the case, that every man allowed the counsell, & vnbound Tell, who fastening hold on the Rudder, and guiding it manfully, preferred the Barque among the roughest billowes, turning her prow towards the country of Suits.

Hauing attained neere enough vnto the shore, there appeared a mighty stone (like vnto a Rock) about the water, which to this day is called Telles Stone. Being hard by it, Tell caught hold thereon with his Bow, which lay at his feete in the Poupe, and leaping forth quickly vpon that stone, he gaue so strong a thrust with his spote against the Barques side, that it returned back among the steem billowes. This done, he tooke his flight thence, and hid himselfe among the neighbouring Mountains. The Barque hauing long floated in this manner, was guided at length by the Gouvernours seruants, to a Port named Brune des Fontaines. From thence the Gouvernor set on his way towards Cusnach, and must needs passe thorough a hollow craggy strait, where Tell (well acquainted with all those parts) by great good hap had ambushed himselfe among thick bushes: there he discharged an Arrow at the Gouvernor, which passed quite through his body, & slew him. Ther remaineth yet (to our time) a Chappell, built on the place where the Gouvernor was slaine: and another vpon the Stone or Rocke, where Tell threw himselfe out of the Barque. After this successfull shoote, Tell went to Suits, where he made all these matters knowne to Stonfacher. From thence hee tooke his way ouer the highest Mountains, and turning by Morsach, came back to Vri, wher hauing sofid Gawter Ernst, he acquainted him with all that had hapned. By this time, they had gotten hearts and hands enow, to expell all the Gouvernors family and followers: but hauing respect to them of Vnderwald, and remembering their former resolution for the first day of Ianuary following, they kept themselves quiet, & Tell (in the meane time) liued closely among his friends.

The first day of Ianuary being come, they of Vnderwald made themselves Masters of two Fortresses, according to a compromise passed betwene them. In the Fort of Rotzburg there dwelt a Chambermaid, who was in loue with a goodly young man of Vnderwald, and committed folly with him. An especiall night of meeting being appointed by them both, the young man brought twenty other armed Souldiers with him, and caused them to lye closely hidden neere the Castle. He hauing giuen the signall to his wench, who knew nothing at all of the intended deccit, was mounted vp aloft to hee by the helpe of a corde. Hauing staide some time of dalliance with her, making her to beleue one thing for another, he left the chamber a while, going to the window whereat he had bin drawne vp, & letting downe the cord, drew vp one of his companions, and then returned to his last againe. He that had thus gotten vp, neuer left till he had drawne vp all his other fellows, lowes, (who were vnmatchable for strength and courage) and so got possession of the place: where they kept all the gates strongly defended, and close shut vp, in expectation of good newes from their other consorts, who were to seize the other Fortresse, called Sarne.

That other company consisted of fifty valiant men, thirty of them hauing ambushed themselves in a neere neighboring wood: the rest went directly towards the Castle, leaning vpon staues and croutches, and carrying presents to the Gouvernor, (according to custome of the day) as Lambs, Pigs, Calnes, Cheefes, and such like things. The Gouvernor was going to church, answerable to his ordinary wont at such a time, and met them on the way, wher perceiving them to haue no other Armes then staues and croutches, which serued (as it seemed) to support their feeble bodies: hee made no doubt of any thing, but passed on, not a little pleased with those presents, and brought him in more liberall and plentifull manner, then they were formerly wont to do. Their staues and croutches were made round, and pierced so hollow within: that they could easily scrow in long sharpe pikes of iron, which each of them carried close hid in his bosome. They came to the Castle, where beeing permitted entrance with their New-yeares gifts: they possessed themselves of the Gates, giuing an appointed signall to their fellow-souldiers lying in the wood, who came immediately to succour them, and tooke them all prisoners that were in the Castle. Afterward, hearing that Rotzburg was surprized by their other associates, they released all their prisoners, and the Gouvernor also, whom they had laid sure hold on, as hee was about to escape. When the Gouvernor and his followers had solemnly promised vpon oath, neuer more to returne againe into those quarters, they gaue the leave to depart, & sent them by safe conduct out of the Country, and then ruined those two strong Forts or Castles flat to the ground. The very same day also, they of Vri demolished the new Citadell, which Grisler had named, The yoke of the Vrians, being not as yet fully finished: and in Suits, Stonfacher (with his followers) won and ruined the Citadell of Lourets, builded nere vnto the Lake. On the morrow, the three villages (by their Deputies) made a publike league of amity and alliance, to continue for ten years, vpon the conditions before mentioned, confirming them al by solemne oath. Behold the end of their tyrannicall government, whom Albert had established ouer the Cantons.

When Albert had receiued tydings of this sudden change: he was wonderfully enraged, and resolved to make war vpon the cantons, as thinking by strong hand to bring them in subiection. He sent first of all to his subiects of Zug, Lucerne, & other neighbours of Suits, Vri, and Vnderwald, to suffer no vñ to be conuayed to them. But in a short while after, he was slaine by his owne Nephew, the Son of his Brother, and by his complices, in passing ouer the Riuer of Ruff: so that this war by him intended, remained now to be freshly attempted. His sonnes, being sufficiently hindred from reuenging his death, left the Switzers in peace: fearing lest they should ioyne with the Gendleinen, who had slaine their Father. About this time, they of Austria ruined many strong places in Heluetia, as in the Territory of Zurich, Warte, Mulperg, Schnabelberg, Maschande the Towne and Castle, and Farwange in the neighbouring quarter. Some most noble families also were by them subuerted and exterminated, to wit, that of Eschinbach, Wartz, Palme, & many other. For at the taking of the Castle of Forwange, in one day, 64. Gentlemen, with their seruants, had their heads smitten off: And in other parts of Switzerland, they of Austria caused to be slaine, or banished out of the country, about a 1000. persons, the most part wherof were Noble. There are some ill-willers, that do falsely accuse the Switzers, to haue defolated many places, & expelled many Noble families: when all this while, those horrid actions (for the most part) were committed by them of the house of Austria.

Henry of Lunzelbourg, 17. Emperor of that name, succeeded after Albert. He confirmed the priuiledges & ancient liberty of the 3. cantons, & established a Prouost or Aduocate of the Empire, to be Iudge in law cases in the Towne of Zurich, the round neighbouring places, and in the three Cantons, in name of the Emperor. This Prouost was named Raoul of Habspourg, Lord of Lauffenberg, Sonne to Godfrey, who was Nephew to Raoul, vnkle to the Emperor Raoul of Habsbourg. But the Emperor Henry being gon into Italy, (in which journey an hundred Souldiers of Zurich, and as many of the other Cantons, were at his pay) the Prouest was falsly accused (as some say) before the Emperor, by the means of Duke Leopold, who hated him, and said that he had abused his authority. So that he was depofed, and Edvard de Burgie, dwelling at Turge, substituted in his place. Afterward, Raoul being brought to answer his cause at the Court of France, dyed at Montpellier. His seruants brought backe his body, and caused it to bee buried in the Abbey of Wettinghen.

The reuenge of the Emperor four Alberts Sonnes on the murderers of their Father.

The Sonnes of Albert, hauing flaine all them that were present at the murder of their Father, and expelled all their other complices; became rich and powerful, for they had seized on the goods of all thē that had hand in the death of Albert. The three cantons were highly in their malice and disgrace, yet they durst not begin war vpon them, fearing (perhaps) the Emperor, who had taken the Switzers into his protection: but neuerthelesse, they molested the Cantons by diuers in-roads, for they could easily offend them of Vnderwald, by Boates descending on the lake of Lucerne; yet the Cantons kept themselves carefully within compasse of their guards, & mutually assisted one another.

A difference betweene them of Lucerne & the men of Vnderwald.

In the year one thousand three hundred and ten, a Ship well munit & furnished with men, set forth from Lucerne, to make assault on thē of Vnderwald, who in the defence of them of Vri, that were come (by great chance) with a Shippe of warre to assist them; did both bondge & sinke the Vessell of Lucerne, very neere to the Port, killing a great number of the Soldiers, and taking the rest prisoners. This losse thus receiued, they of Lucerne (and their neighbours) tooke truce with the Cantons. In the same year, they of Suits, being desirous to pacifie all matters among them: bought of Eward, Count of Habsbourg, Arte and Cusnach, Villages of their Cantons, and subiects to the house of Habsbourg, encreasing & enlarging the limitation of their bounds very much that way. But on the other side they had warre against the Monkes of the Hermitage, & for the space of about four hundred years; each being at push of the Pike against the other, and for those reasons which I will breely relate.

The Emperor Otho, surnamed the great, about the year 950. hadde established certaine bounds to them of Suits, and to the Monkes of the Hermitage. In these limitations, some Mountaines (fertile for pasturage) were left to the Monkes, which till that time had bene possessed by them of Suits. It came to passe, that they wold not keepe themselves to the Emperours appointment; but held their ancient limits. The Abbots of the Hermitage, who were not able enough to debout the out of their possession; gaue not ouer to obtaine of the Emperours successors, confirmation of the ordinance set downe by Otho. About the yeare one thousand, forty foure, the Abbot Geron accused them of Suits to Henry the third, Emperor. Raoul and Arnoul, Earles of Lentzbourg & Gouernors of Zug, being ioyned with them of Suits, made their complaint likewise, that their limits were much abridged. But the Emperour Henry re-confirmed the grant of Otho, & condemned the Counts of Lentzbourg to a certaine fine of mony; all which notwithstanding, they of Suits kept themselves in their ancient possessiō still, in despite of all y^e the Abbot could do. Once more then, about the yeare of our Lord, 1144, the Abbot Paul accused them before Conrad the second, Emperour, who confirmed also the sentence of Otho. Neuerthelesse, they of Suits maintained themselves (perforce) in possession still, and the Abbot (on the contrary side) defending the limits giuen him by the Emperour, and making vie of them accordingly; raised warre vpon them, invading continually one another, and taking prisoners on eyther side. These enmities endured a long time, and at last, Raoul, Count of Rapswil, brought them to an agreement, in the year 1217. This accord was imbraced & kept for about the space of fifty yeares, at the end of which time, there came an Abbot, named Aselme, vnder whom nouell differences began: because that both sides expounded the tract of pacification, in a contrary sence and meaning.

The war being againe renewed, continued foure and forty yeares: but soone after, they of Zurich laboured to ratifie

a firme peace, in the time of Henry the seauenth. While they were treating on this peace, some men of Suits, being gon in pilgrimage to this Abbey of the Hermitage: were villianously and publicly outraged by certaine Monks, which wholly brake off the negotiation. Moreover, the Princes of Austria, who had appropriated to themselves the protection of the Abbey: incensed the Abbot and Monks against them of Suits, promising them continuall succour. The warre hauing lasted long, wherein they of Suits were greatly endangered: at length, in the yeare, 1313, the 23. day of February, they went forth secretly into the fields in the night time, & hauing deuiued the guardes; entred by strong hand into the Abbey, taking and leading thence the Monkes that had done the outrage, together with the Curate of the place, named John, and the Master of the Schoole, named Raoul. There were then Monkes of noble birth in the Abbey, namely, Raoul, and Henry of Wuenberg, John Regensperg, and Burckhard Fleminger. This was the cause, that the Counts of Habsbourg and of Togge, and the Baron of Regensperg, who were their neere allies and kinmen, as also John of Schwanden, Abbot of the Hermitage, greatly imploied their pains with them of Suits, for these Monkes. When the Monks had solemnly promised vpon oath, neuer more to deale with them of Suits in any such enterprize, nor to attempt any matter of reuenge vpon them: they were releafed, hauing first payed nine hundred pounds Tournois. But this enlargement came so farre short of appealing them: that it wrought a quite contrary effect in them, continually fixing their thraldome before their eyes; so that thence forward, they fought all meanes whereby to iniure them of Suits.

A reconciled enemy is very hardly to be credited.

Election of Lewes of Bawaria, fourth of that name, Emperour, and a difference falling among the Princes Electors.

Hereupon happened a new occasion of troubles. After the death of the Emperour Henry, in the year 1314, the States of the Empire besing assembled to create a new Emperour; the Electors found themselves to be diuided in opinion. Foure of them elected Lewes of Bawaria, fourth of that name; but the other three gaue their voices to Frederick of Austria, the Sonne to Albert. He to make his part equall in voices to Lewes his number, named Henry, Duke of Carinthia, as King of Bohemia, maintaining that this kingdome belonged to him, by right of the Country. Frederick counted this Duke among them that should giue their voyces: albeit that John, sonne to Henry the 7. was king of Bohemia, hauing married the daughter to the late deceased king. This dismembing of the Empire, caused those greuous troubles in Germany and Sclauia. The three Cantons, enemies to the house of Austria, ioyning themselves with Lewes of Bawaria: all their neighbors being before in their protection of Austria, or else at the time of these elections, approved that of Frederick. Now in regard that the three Cantons onely, made head against Frederick; he prevailed so far, that (by his accellation) the Bishpope of Constance excommunicated them, & they were banished by the Court Imperiall, which was at Rottville. They were charged, that they had violated the abbey of the Hermitage, & (in that tumult) had cast downe and spoiled the holy sacrifice: which they of Suits firmly and stoutly denied, promising contrariwise, feuerly to punish the offenders in such a delict, provided, y^e they might be discouered to them. And although they could not produce any one; yet notwithstanding, they remained banished & excommunicated. In regard whereof, they humbly entreated the Emperour Lewes to vndertake the knowledge of this cause: which he did, and procured afterward, that they were reintegrated into the communion of the Church.

The cause of the dismall troubles in Germany and Switzerland.

The three Cantons excommunicated and banished, because they would not yield themselves to jurisdiction.

In this time, the Gentlemen that were forth of the lands of the 3. Cantons, with the Gouernors; solicited Leopold of Austria, Son to Albert, to make war vpon the Cantons. The Abbot of the Hermitage, and the Count of Montfort rouled on this wheele with their best helpe. The occasion was very honest, as it seemed to wit; that the Prince purposed to reuenge the outrage done to the Chappell of the Virgin Mary. The young Prince, being young, powerful, and a true heire to his Fathers hatreds; suffered himself to be thus counselled, and intended prosecution of this war. His forces were about him, by whose meanes he had spoiled the places and castles of his fathers murderers; & Soldiers were people aptly disposed for war, and made rich by the booties they had taken in those castles. Moreover, he leued a

Army, collected from Suisse, Suaba, and Alsatia, dividing all these powers into two parts. One of them, which (as is credibly affirmed) consisted of about twenty thousand men; was conducted by himselfe against them of Suits. He gave the rest to the Count of Strasberg, Governor of the vale of Hesell, that they might ascend the Mountaine of Brunig, and assaile that side belonging to them of Vnderwald.

The Cantons hearing newes of this preparation, mustered vp their forces, & because nothing might remaine as forgotten: they sent to craue peace of the Prince; by the Count of Togge, promising to accept the Prince as their Iudge, & to make answer in his presence, to the Abbot of the Hermitage, and to the expelled Nobility. But the Prince would allow no audience to the Count, and refused all negotiation of peace. The whole hope and expectation of quietnes being thus cut off; a Fast was published & commanded throughout the Cantons, and prayers devoutly made to God. All such as could carry Armes, were sent to the Garrisons in all those parts, where any entrance might be made into the countries.

The assembly of the forces of the three Cantons, and their number.

But because the Prince was at Zug, with the greater part of his power: the allies assembled themselves at Suits, which is the very neerest Canton to Zug, and there were mustred foure hundred Souldiers of Vri, three hundred of Vnderwald, and sixe hundred of Suits. These made vp 1300. men in all, and thus they resolved to attend the enemy, valiantly exposing their liues, for conseruation of their countries, liberties, wiues, and children: declaring themselves (in this case) no lesse worthy of commendation, then the Lacedemonians, who fighting for the freedome of Greece, dyed all with their weapons in their hands, at the passage of the Thermopylae. It is said, that the Lord of Hunenberg, a worthy Gentleman, dwelling in the territory of Zug, and being then in the Army of Prince Leopold, taking compassion on the death of so many innocents, at whose throtes slycing knives lay overready (for it was concluded by the Nobility, to put the three Cantons to fire & sword) did secretly aduertise the confederates, by a Letter which he shot vnto the fastened at an Arrow, that the day of S.

Omer (which was the 15. of Nouember) they should be assailed at a place called Morgarten, and therefore it stood them on to looke to their businesse. The allies hearing this, fortified strongly that place, appointing men to all the wayes whereby the enemy should passe, and encamped themselves aloft on the Mountaine.

Fifty men had then ranked themselves together, which had bene banished from Suits, and they humbly desired, that their banishment might be reuoked, offering to employ their paines courageously, for the safety of their Country. But a sad answer was returned them, to wit, that many among them were guilty of very greuous crimes: therefore they would not accept such people for companions, as fearing lesse those faulty persons, might be the occasion of harme to the whole Army. These poore banished men (for all this) would not giue ouer their good affection, which they had intircly addicted to their Countries succour: but got possession of a little high Hill on the Frontiers, which hung ouer the way, whereby (of necessity) the enemy must passe.

The sixteenth day of Nouember being come, in the yeare, 1315. Leopold caused his troopes to issue forth of Zug, about the breake of day; the infantry marching foremost, with all the Nobility and horsemen: for the Gentlemen had resolved to chastise the poore Country people with their owne hands, whom they teamed the Seditious. As they were entered on the confines of Suits, hauing the Lake of Egeria on the one side, the high Mountaines on the other, and their Army betwene both. The banished men began to roule downe from the Mountaines top, great huge stones, and mighty Logs of Timber, vpon the Princes Army. Afterward, without the least intermission, hauing laid together great heaps of incredible big (sharpe-pointed) Flints: then showed them downe (as it were) vpon the horsemen, euen like to a violent tempest of haile.

This accident neuer expected, did put the Army into very great troubles; for men were not able to gouerne their horribles, frighted with the continuall falling of sharpe stones from aloft, and very greuous wounds they receiued by the. This being noted by them of Suits, who were ranged ranged vpon a very high place: they marched on to meete the enemy in the face; and (from a farre off) threw huge stones, and shot sharpe pointed arrows at them. Afterward, they came to handy grappling, and charges with Halberds to furrioullie, that both horse and foote were put to flight; among whom, the Abbot of the Hermitage, and the Count of Mounfort were the foremost, as is credibly reported.ouer and beside the footmen, 1500. horsemen were slaine in this battell, beside many drowned in the Lake, & a great number (by reason of the narrowe passage, which hindred the sauing of themselves) were murdered by their own fillowes, and trodden to death with horses. Two and fifty Citizens of Zurich, being all habited alike in garments of one colour, and well knowne by the Cantons, to be the most valiant men in all the enemies army, being sent by the Senate to succour the Duke of Austria, were slaine in the field.

The overthrow of the Count of Strasberg at Vnderwald, & in what manner it was performed.

The selfsame day as the battaile was fought at Morgarten, the Count of Strasberg (hauing chased the Garrison of Brunig from the Mountain;) entered into the Country with three thousand men, and began to forrage euery where. He incamped at Alpenach, which is a Village in the Canton of Vnderwald, threatening the next morning to invade the other part of the country beyond the Forrest, if they on the hither side did not willingly yeeld themselves. But in the meane while, they of Vnderwald beyond the Forrest, assembled them of the Mountaines round about, & called to their assistance them on the hither side the Forrest, whom the enemy had not found as yet. and by the same meanes gaue knowledge to their partakers which were at Suits. The Messenger arrived at Brunen the morrow after the battaile, but others say, that it was the very same day. These newes being thus come, they of Vnderwald put themselves vpon the Lake, and made such diligence in getting to their houses, as in two hours space (by painfull labour and speed of the Ferry men) they crossed ouer the Lake, which indeede was very broad. An hundred men of Suits did accompanie them, with whom they arrived at the Port of Buchs, which is a village appertaining to them; then going on from thence to Eurgensflud, ioyning their people with the others troops.

Diligence and hast in most expedient & available when vrgent necessity is a spur thereto.

Soone after, they came to assaile the enemy, who was come thither by the Lake of Lucerne, and ranged on through the country: but they compelled them to flight, and made them glad speedily to recover their Boats. Hauing thus chased them thence, they went towards Alpenach, to seeke the Count of Strasberg; & although it was late, they concluded (neuertheless) to assaile the enemy, because his powers were disperced amongst the Villages, where they piled and rauaged. Moreover, might could be no hinderance to them, that were well acquainted with all the straites and passages of the Country: which was an excellent resolution, and wonderfull contrary to the enemy. For very hardly could the Count of Strasberg endure their first shooke or encounter, because the dispercion of his soldiars amazed him: and when hee saw two Engins belonging to them of Vnderwald, like a good and discreet warrior, hee perswaded himself, that they of Austria were ouerthrowne at Morgarten.

Hereupon, he speedily retired (throw the Mountaines) home to his owne house, and the rest fled amaine and confusedly: but yet not all; for three hundred of them were left slaine in the field, and the whole booty taken from the enemies hand. They of Suits and Vri, hauing provided for their affaires, came to succour their confederates of Vnderwald, and in the night arrived at Buchs, where they did heare tidings of the victory. Wherefore hauing first giuen thanks to God, & gratified their friends with so fortunate a successe, they returned home vnto their owne houses.

This victorie, settled and assured the foundation of the Switzers confederacie or alliance, and from thence forward, they of Suits, Vri, and Vnderwald, changed their league of ten yeares, into a perpetual alliance, and so passed it by authenticall Letters. The Switzers tooke their name of Sydgnoffen (which signifieth partakers in swearing, or conioyned together by one and the same oath) by this alliance. At this time, among strangers, they are called Lords of Leagues, and Switzers, by reason of the Village or Canton of Suits. It may be, because they fought in that quarter, for the maintenance of their libertie: or in regard of their long warre

IN the Name of God. Amen. Forasmuch as humane sense is infirme and fraile, which is the cause that things intended to be durable and perpetuall (as they ought to be) are too soone and very easily lost or forgotten: it is therefore profitable and necessary, that such things as are established for peace, tranquillity, profite, and honour of men, should be couched and published by writings, and authenticall instruments. Notwithstanding, if wrong be done to any one of vs, either in his body or goodes, We are all bound to succour him to our power: to the end, that (by friendshipp or iustice) the wrong may be amended or repaired. Moreover, We binde our selues by the same Oath, that none of the three Cantons, shall receyue any man as Lord and Commander, without the aduice and liking of the other. Each one of vs, as well males as females, shall stand bound to obey their naturall Lords and Masters, and liue vnder their lawfull power, in all seruises iust and legitimate: except the said Lords offer violence (in any manner whatsoeuer) to any of the Cantons, for vnto such Masters they shall do no service, vntill such time as they be concorded with the Cantons. We haue covenanted also, that not any of the Cantons or Confederates, shall minister an Oath, or binde himselfe to any stranger, without the aduice of the other Cantons and Confederates. Not any person of the Confederates, shall communicate with a stranger (without aduice and permission of other Confederates) so long as the Cantons shalbe with out a Lord. And if any one of our Cantons, violate and infringe any thing or point of that which is contained in these Presents: he shall be esteemed as a disloyall and perjured person, and his body and goodes confiscate to the Cantons.

MOREOVER, WE haue agreed and condiscended, not to accept or entertaine any Iudge or Magistrate, that shall buy his office with money, or any bribe else, although he be of our owne Countrey. If difference or warre happen to be moued among the Confederates: then such as are knowne to be of most honesty and wisdom, shall meet together, to pacifie & confound the war or difference, either by louing composition, or censure of right. If the one side do reiect this proposition, the Confederates shall assist the other side, to the end, That the debate may be ended, either by amity or iudiciall sentence, and at the charges of them that would not stand to the award.

If any Suite or warre shall arise betwene two of the Cantons, and any one of them will not yeeld to a friendly composition, or according to right: the third Cantons shall maintaine the cause of that side, that submitted most to reason, and powerfully assist it: either to end the contention by a louing composition or by iudiciall sentence. If any one of the Confederates shall kill one of his owne fellowes, he must dye also: except hee can make it appeare, and the Iudges likewise auouch it by their sentence, that he did it vpon vrgent necessity, and in defence of his owne bodie. If he flye for the fact, whosoever of our Countreies shall receyue him into his house, there to lodge or maintaine him: he is to be banished perpetually, except by common consent of the Confederates

If any of the Confederates, either priuily, manifestly or impudently, shall fire any house or goods of some other of the Confederates: he shall bee expulsed (for euer) out of our Countreies; and whosoever lodgeth or maintaineth him, shall stand bound to satisfie the others losses. And to the end, that these conditions aboue written, may remaine firme, inuiolable and perpetuall: WE subnamed Citizens & Allies of Vri, Suites, and Vnderwald, haue put our Seales to these presents, at Brunen, in the yeare of our Saviour Iesus Christ, 1315, being the morrow after the day of S. Nicholas.

The liberties and alliances of the Switzers, confirmed by the Emp. Lewis.

These Cantons hauing conquered their enemies, and confirmed their Alliance, sent men to the Emperor Lewis, to aduertise him of all. He at the beginning of the yeare, held a day imperiall at Nuremberg, where the Princes of Austria were condemned of high treason, the goods which they had in Suisse confiscated to the Emperor and Empire, and the liberty of the Cantons fully confirmed. The Letters containing this ordination, were giuen in the campe at Merride, the 23. day of March, in the yeare 1316. & the second yeere of the Emperor Lewis. The same Emperour, about the yeare 1323. established as Governour in these three Cantons, John, Count of Arberg, vnto whom (as Lieutenant of the Emperour Lewis) the Cantons gaue their Oath.

The power & authority of the Governour limited, as his entrance into his rule ouer the Cantons.

The Governour promised them also by Letters Patents, that hee would not diminish or preiudice (in any manner whatsoeuer) their liberties and alliances, nor suffer them to be alienated from the Empire, neither to be reduced vnder the power of them of Austria, or of the Noblemen excluded from the Countiees of the Cantons. Beside, that no man amongst them should be drawne in iustice out of these countreies, and that their Iuges should not be taken from any place else, but meely from among themselves. And because the Governours should not infringe the liberties of the Cantons, their power was limited by the Emperour, and prohibited (vnder greuous penalties) from diminishing in any manner whatsoeuer, the liberties graunted to the Cantons. The Letters Patents which contained these articles, were giuen at Paria, in the yeare 1329. and on the day of S. John Baptist. The Emperours that succeeded Lewis, confirmed these things, and permitted (moreouer) to the Cantons, to elect Governours (for their countreies) among themselves: but in the Emperours name, and to haue highest iustice in causes both ciuill and criminall.

They of Austria hauing bin so shrewdly gauld, as hitherto hath bene declared, grew to truce, not because their forces were wholly weakned: but in regard that they were impeached in war against the Emperor Lewis, so that they could not deale with so many matters all at a time. In the meane while (after the selfe) some incursions and losses were made in Suisse on either side. It came to passe, that they of Weser and their neighbours, which liued below the government of Glaris, and in diuers kinds molested them of Suites: who came and met them with a main army, and compelled them to craue peace. On the other side, the Abbot of the Hermitage, had caused the three Cantons to be excommunicated, especially them of Suits: first by the byshop of Constance, & afterward by the Pope. Fredericke of Austria, who termed himselfe to be Emperour, likewise banished them, but the Emperour Lewis tooke away the curse, and by his commandment, Peter, Archbyshop of Mayence, remitted them into the communion of Christians. Also, the Abbot of the Hermitage, wrote to them of Suits that hee had renounced the Popes Bull, and would not suffer it to be serued against them.

During this time, that the truce continued on either part, they of Austria drew into league with them, Hermis & Envad, Counts of Kybourg, and Lordes of Dun: this happened in the yeare, 1317. By the meanes meanes of these Earles, they procured such a hindrance, that the men of Immerlach could send no victuals to Vnderwald. In the yeere one thousand three hundred twenty three, they drew to them Iohn of Habspourg, Lord of Rusperwill, and heyre to the Count of Hombourg. Afterward, they combined themselves with him, against the Cantons, because his Landes neighboured to the Canton of Suies, and lay aptly to cut off all reliefe, and rayse warre. The yeare following, Raoul and Herman, Counts of Werdenberg, and Lords of Sargans, made alliance also with Leopold of Austria: but their brother Henry tooke part with the Emperor Lewes, who (at that time) was excommunicated and deprived of the Empire by the Pope. By these meanes, great divisions fell in the empire, some depending on the Popes decree, others mocking it, and cleaving to Lewes, as their lawfull Emperor.

In these troubles, the Cantons maintained themselves carefully, and in amitie with the partakers of Lewes; whereto also, many Townes of Suisse conformed themselves. For, although (at the beginning) they of Zurich, and some others followed the part of Frederick of Austria: yet notwithstanding, he being prisoner, and having renounced the empire, albeit his brethren continued warre against Lewes, they of Zurich joyned with Lewes: as with him that then was their only true Emperor. In the yeare 1327. the Cantons made alliance with the Imperiall cities and townes, that stood fast for Lewes, to wit, Mayence, Wormes, Spire, Strasbourg, Rafle, Fribourg, Constance, Lindaw, and Pberlingen: with this League they of Zurich and Berne combined themselves. But five hundred yeares after, Lucerna made perpetuall alliance with the three Cantons. In few words, I will tell you the occasion, after I have first declared somewhat, concerning the beginning and estate of the said City, before it became allied with the Cantons.

CHAP. III.

Of the Originall estate of Lucerna, before it leagued it selfe with the Cantons.

The city of Lucerna is seated on the river Russe, which issueth forth of a great Lake, whereby wee may passe to the three Cantons. Also, at the foote of an high Mountaine, commonly called Pilates Mount. The situation is commodious, because this is the way, to travell by the mountain of Saint Godard in Italy. From Fribourg, the Merchants are transported over the Mountaines, and from thence into Italy, with beafts of carriage: and (reciprocally) the Merchants of Italy descend by the Lake and River of Russe, to the Rhein, & thence into the Ocean sea.

It is not certainly knowne, neyther at what time, nor by whom the Citie was builded: but one faith well, that on each side of the River there is a castle (which are houses nowe inhabited by Citizens) and builded by the Allemaings or Germanes. Concerning the opinion of Etterlinus, who wrote some small history of Suisse or Svetia, referring these matters to the house of Austria, and thinketh that those castles served as a retreat for robbers and theeves: he abuseth his own judgement greatly therein. For, in the time of Raoul of Habspourg (and no sooner) they of Austria began to command in these quarters here, when the Dutchie of Austria fell to the house of Habspourg. And it is no way credible, that a Prince would ever endure, that theeves should make use of a passage so commodious, for traueilling from Suisse into Italy.

It seemeth, that Lucerna was so named, in regard of a Lanterne, which duly every night is there advanced, and bright lights clearly shining therein, for benefite of passengers vpon the Lake. And it is very likely, that the high ancient Tower, which (at this day) standeth alofte on the bridge (as in like manner there is another at Zurich, called Wellenberg) served for that purpose. Our graue ancients & forefathers, termed every such kind of Tower Pharos. A Charter granted to Guichard the Priest, auoucheth, that Lucerna deriued her name from Antiquity. For, the Annales of Lucerna do declare, that the Lucernians (having served Charlemaigne in a warre against the Sarazins) obtained of him diuers priuiledges, and especially, the vse of Cornets, wherewith they did both summon the battailes and retreats, euen as they doe nowe at this present time.

Be it howsoever, anciently, the Cannons of the college of Lucerna, helde great authoritie, as also in many Townes of Germany. This college was founded by Guichard the Priest, brother vnto Kupertre, Leader of the horsemen to king Lewes, who was sonne to King Theodorick, who died in the yeare seven hundreded, & founded also the college of Canons at Zurich. The college of Lucerna fell to the Abbot of Murbach, by the donation of King Pepin. The same Abbot was Lord of Lucerna, vntill the time of the Emperor Albert of Austria: who hauing resolved to establish a new kinde of principality in Svetia, as already wee haue told you, bought Lucerna of the Abbot of Murbach, by giuing him foure villages in Alsatia, and a certaine summe of money, amounting to the valew of two thousand Markes of money, as it is affirmed.

This City enioyed (formerly) the enfranchisement of many things, & sundry goodly priuiledges beside, so long as the Abbots were Lords thereof; and yet they held no soueraigne iurisdiction: for, the citizens were the greatnes of the city, builded the wals and rampiers, and fortified it (by their owne discretion) in those times. The Prince of Austria also promised for his part, to conferre their priuiledges intirely, and made shew of being a verie gentle Lord; as he was neuer sparing of goodly promises. But soon after, the dominion of the Austrians procured to gripe and oppress the Lucernians; who were constrained to their great (disadvantage) to make warre vpon their neighbours. For they were the first that exposed themselves to make incursions on the Cantons, and maintained a garrison in their cities at their great charge. The Tower of Sbourg, which standeth yet to this day cometh with hath bin said: for there it was, where the Lucernians planted a Corps de guard, against the incursions which their enemies made vpon the Lake. When they had no open war, nor any assurance of peace, the Austrians did not much care to maintain them. In the meane while, Traffike ceased, the fields were foraged, and many times the Lucernians fell into the hands of their enemies. Moreover, being gone to warre with them of Glaris, vnder the conduct of Orbo, Captaine of Colmar, to encounter with the Emperour Lewes, the wages promised them, was made void and frustrate. They themselves had paid many in other warres, and lent good summes of money on sedules, to Captaines of the Austrian Princes; but now, in place of payment, they were handled in such sort, as they thought both their good seruice and money utterly lost.

Being thus tyred and harried for many several waies, they supplicated and desired (oftentimes) them of Austria, to be at peace with the Cantons. But perceiving they traueiled all this while in vaine, themselves (in the end) accorded vvith the Cantons, leauing (neuertheless) the rights of the house of Austria to them intirely. This peace exasperated not onely them of Austria, but also many citizens, seruaunts, and pensioners to Gentlemen, by whom they benefited & enriched themselves. Both the one & other feared, that the City would ally it selfe with the three Cantons, and that in so doing, they would estrange themselves from the Austrians. And therefore they conspired, together, to oppress them that had comecld the people to make this peace, and that they should exhort them to be allied vvith some other. For this effect, in secret they contracted a league; the substance wherof was this, That at a certaine, house of the night, they of the city should open the gates, and at the same instant, they of Austria, (with so many horsemen well appointed) should make seizure of the Citie. Afterwardes, hauing joyned their their forces together, and reduced the City into their owne power: they would punish the friends of the Cantons, break the peace, and plant a Garrison in the city, to the end, that afterward no such matter might be againe attempted.

But the Citizens being aduertised, of the traines and ambushes prepared for them, vpon the appointed night did put themselves into armes, placed good guards at the gates, & provided so surely for their safety, that such asooke part with the house of Austria, durst not bee seene any way to stirre. Then the Gouvernour of Rotembourg (with many Gentlemen) beeing come to the gates, they of the City (to whom he termed himselfe a friend) gaue him entrance, and some small number with him, suffered the rest to stand without. Perceiuing that this cunning tricke tooke no such successe as he expected, and not daring to doe any thing by open force, because he was the weaker, he returned the next morning to Rotembourg with his traine, and some Citizens of Lucerna, partakers with the Austrians, fearing to be punished by the City, went away with him.

The league & Alliance
made betweene them of Lucerna, &
the 3. Cantons

This combination was the cause of hastening the league between the Lucernians and the three Cantons; for, perceiuing the iniuries and ambushes of the Nobility, and the dangers where-with they threatened them: they thought it fit not to reiect the succour of their neighbours, which they accepted, as sent from heauen. So they became vnited together, on the Saturday before Saint Martins day, in the year one thousand, three hundred, thirty two.

Extremity vr-ged against the Lucernians
by them
of Austria.

When the Austrians had intelligence hereof, they appointed Garrisons in diuers places about Lucerna, as namely, at Sempach, Rotembourg, and Meyenberg: by means whereof, they did cut off all victuals from the Lucernians: and if any aduentured farre from the City, they were either slaine, or taken prisoners, so that they were constrained to goe secke for food with a maine army. The yeare ensuing, and the seauenteenth day of March, the Lucernians going with their troopes towards Buchnaß (which is a Castle, now called Hertenstein, vpon the Lake of Zug) the Lord of Ramswang, Gouvernour of Rotembourg, for the house of Austria, layde an ambuscado for them on the way, and slew about some fourescore of them. The rest that were scattered in the fields, and looking after pillage, assembled themselves together, neere to Buchnaß; and charged the enemy fo courageously, that they enforced them to flight, hauing first lost an hundred foote, and eightene horse.

The Gouvernour of Austria well perceiuing, that ouert power stood not for his aduantage, neither did any way benefite him in his businesse: vnderooke the first traine of ambuscadoes, and priuate practises. There were then at Lucerna, many persons that had bene pensioners to the house of Austria. This war was verie troublesome to them, for they had lost their pensions, and besides, enioyed not the reuennues of their owne inheritances; which (for the most part) lay on the lands of the Austrians. The Gouvernour conferred with them, and because they were of the very worthiest houses in the City, and the cheefest of them: he aduised them to perswade the Citizens to renounce their alliance with the three Cantons, and render themselves again to the house of Austria. He shewed them, that they might bee much more endamaged by one Prince, being a potent enemy, & so neere a neighbour, than by the three Cantons, who (in the passed Warres) could doe them little, or no harme at all.

And so far as much as it had happened at this very time, that the lower Towne, and the fields about it, were greatly iniured by impetuous and extraordinarie raines: the Gouvernour made vse of this accident, to his own aduantage; telling them that God punished them by such a means, because they rebelled against their lawfull Prince. But because these coniurations could not preuaile, nor hee moue the people with all his goodly perswasions; he would compasse his intention by another stratageme, and comploted with close confederates, to massacre the Authors and conservators of this Alliance with the Cantons, taking their faith vnder oath, and Letters signed and sealed. And, because they might be knowne one to another, each of the Conspirators did weare red sleeves, which onely was their noted mark. Whereupon grew the Pro-uerbe (afterward) among them of Lucerna; Beware the band of Red sleeves, and it was held for a matter extremely ignominious, to tell any man, that he was one of the red sleeves band.

The number of the conspirators encreased, and then they assigned the day for the massacre, which was the last day of Iune, being the Feast day of S. Peter & S. Paul, Apostles. They were to meete vnder the great Arch or Gate, neere to the publike house of the Taylors fraternity: for then the watch for night should cease to walke the round in that quarter: Also, the Lieutenant to the Duke of Austria, must haue an army ready to bee let into the City by the conspirators, who (purposely) should open the gates. But God (by his gracious providence) discovered these bloody consultations, the very same night as the massacre was to bee executed. For, as the conspirers met in Armes at the place appointed, a yong man, passing accidentally by, without dreaming or thinking on any such matter, discovered the businesse, and vnderstood their deliberation. The night was very darke, by means whereof, he softly slipped away, hying speedily to the butcher or Shambles, where perceiuing by the lighted candles and noife he heard, that diuers were there vp out of bedde, drinking and playing: hee went in amongst them, and tolde them the things hee had heard.

Forthwith they ran to the Gouvernour, and acquainted him with the compack, & the Citizens quickly had warning to arm themselves, and good Guards also sent to the gates: moreover, they rushed in suddenly vpon the conspirators, and tooke them prisoners, before they could giue entrance to such supply as they expected from without. And to impeach the Lieutenant to the Duke of Austria, from attempting any thing by manifest force, or violence against the City, it being in this dangerous agitation: the same night they sent (in posse) for succour vnto the three Cantons, who also sent them three hundred men early in the morning. After this happy supply was thus come to the, they consulted then together, concerning punishment to bee inflicted on the conspirators. Their Letters were laid before them, and such other guilty persons, who had escaped out of the tumult, by fauour of the nights extreame darknesse, were likewise apprehended and imprisoned, as was most conuenient.

Now, in regard that the number of the conspirators was great; and, many among the of the principall houses, who had store of kindred and friends in the city. At request of the three Cantons, their liues were saued, and they punished by the purse, after they had solemnly sworne neuer to attempt any thing more against the state of the city, nor contrary to their alliance with the three Cantons. Heereupon, they of Lucerna made a law, whereby it was prohibited to the Citizens, not to make any assemblies or clandestine meetings in any place, nor to bind themselves one to another by Oath: except vpon any bargain they made for monies, they should leaue twice as much in the hands of the Seigneury.

At this time, they of Austria were reconciled to the Emperor Jewes, to whom also, a great accusation was made of the three Cantons & the Lucernians. Who (contrarywise) well excused themselves, and shewed, that they were allied vpon plenty of good reasons, and without doing wrong vnto any man. Whereupon, the Emperour gaue charge to them of Zurich, Berne, and Basile, who were then allied to the house of Austria, and friends also to the Cantons (for three yeares before, the men of Zurich had assited them in a Warre against the Grisons) to pacifie the difference, and make an agreement of the Cantons with the Austrians.

VVhereof, in the yeare, one thousand three hundred thirty four, by entermise of their Ambassadors, truce was taken for two yeares and an half, on these conditions following. That during this time, they of Lucerna should not be constrained to pay the monyes borrowed of them, nor the wages due to the Lucernians by the Captaines. That they might make vse and seruice of the Money of the Dukes of Zofing, forged in their Citie: rendering obedience and honor due to the Dukes.

CHAP. III.

Of the Originall, condition, and estate of Zurich, before it leagued in with the amity of the Cantons.

IT is not to bee doubted, but that Zurich is one of the most ancient Cities of Swetia. The Annals of the country doe declare,
that it was builded sixetene yeares after the cittie of Trenes or Treuris. Marianus Scotus saith in his Chronicles, that Trebetus, son to Ninus, builded the city of Trenes, in the time of the Patriarch Abraham. The Romane histories make honourable mention of the 1

Tigurines, who are they of Zurich, because they were present in the war of the Cimbrians against the Romans, and overthrew the Consul Cassius. Afterwards, when Julius Caesar came to the conquest of the Gaules, they were vanquished and ruined by him. After that time, to the invasion which the Allemaines or Germaines

made: Zurich was subiect to the Romane Empire, then fell into the hands of the Kings of France, and lastly, came to the Germane Empire, which beareth y name and shadow of the Romane empire.

There are in Zurich two Colledgiall churches; one of men, the other of Women founded by the Kings of France. In ancient times, these colledges were (wellneere) Lords & commanders of the citie.
There was also (heretofore) a castle, builded vpon a little hill, nere to the River of Limagus, where the Gouernours (established by the Kings of France) kepte their abiding, who were Prouosts of the city, & of those colledges. Afterward, vnder the Germane Emperors, those Prouosts still continued, but they dwelt not in the castle: because the gouernment was willingly giuen to the Princes. Neuertheles, since those times, there grew in the city a councell of fixe and thirty men, twelue whereof gouerned for the space of foure monthes. The commonwealth was so ordered in the year, 1100. and continued in that estate till the year, 1336. and then it fell to changing, in manner as hereafter we shall declare.

From such time as the city beganne to throwe off the yoke of the Colledgiall churches, it began also to consider on hit owne freedome, and how it might best receiue increasing. For, amongst the dis-sentions of the Emperors and Popes, the men of Zurich adhered to the Emperors, and followed Fredericke Barbarossa, Fredericke the second, and Lewes of Bawaria, who augmented their liberties and franchises, especially Fredericke the second.
For, after the death of Berthoull, the last Duke of Zerungen, Prouost of the Col-ledges, and also of the Citie of Zurich:
he receiued the citizens into protection of the Empire, about the yeare, 1218.
Then afterward, he tooke many priuiledges from the Colledgiall churches. Amongst other, the right of electing the councell, and graunted it to the citizens, ordaining, that it should neuer bee law-full to alienate Zurich from the Empryre.
Also, in the time of Fredericke, the Citizens made the ditches and walles about the City.

It came to passe, that they requested

these fortifications, and commaded them moreouer, to rid their houses of some women ill reported of: which offended them in such sort, as they with-drewe themselves from the Citizens. But this difference was appeased by the byshop of Constance. Some few yeares after, the Pope excommunicated them of Zurich, because they tooke part with the Emperor Frederick. At the same time, they ruina-ted (by permission of the Emperour) the old Castle, fearing least some enemies to their liberties (should get possession ther-
of. At this day it is a very pleasant place, beautified with Linden and other fayre trees planted there. And because the City stood excommunicated, and (by consequence) exposed to the violence of any man: many Gentlemen round about, much mollified the Citizens, so that the trafficke of silkes, being very great before in that place, was from thence transported to Come.

In the year, 1351. they of Zurich did take their first alliance with the Cantons of Fris and Suits, the tenour whereof you haue already seene. Some few yeares after the death of Frederick, his Nephew Conradine laboured to subiect them of Zurich, to the Dukes of Swabia: vnder the pretence and colour, that they had long time bin Prouostes and Gouernors thereof. The Citizens maintained their liberty very firme and strongly, which caused Conradine to worke so with the Emperour Conrad, that Zurich stood proscribed from the Empire. But Richard of England, king of the Romanes, tooke away the proscription, and by Imperiall Letters, confirmed the priuiledges of the Citizens. In those Letters, amongst other matters, these words following are contained.

A true Coppy of the fauor done by Richard of England, K.
of the Romanes, to them of Zurich.

*B*Y faithfull report, which is come to our serenity, we haue vnderstood, that Conradine, sonne to the late King Conrad, who named himselfe D.
of Swabia, not contented with this fauor, in vainely vsurping the honor appertaining to another, without hauing any right or power

so to do: hath published a sentence of banishment, against our Citizens of Zurich (as if they were subiects to that Dutchy) planted in the especiall boosome of vs and our Empire, & not appertaining any way to that Dutchy, but immediately to the Empire, according as fro antiquite hath bene established, and is now approved in our time. Given at Hague, now, the xx. day of November, in the yeare one thousand two hundred sixty two. And of our reigne the first.

These Letters do render an ample re-stimony, of the liberty belonging vnto them of Zurich: notwithstanding, they tooke no great effect then, because such as succeeded in the Empire after Frede-ricke the second, to Raoul of Habsbourg, held no great credit, so that (by manie)
they are not numbered among the Emperors, but all this intennall or respice of time, is referred vnto an Inter-regnum, wherein the most part of all the variances were decided by the sword, rather then by iustice and law, and the stronger trampled the weaker vnder their feet. Aboue all, the Gentlemen that had anie means, did nothing else but machinate against the liberties of those Cities that were their neighbors. All the wayes were co-uered with theues, & (in brieft) this License wrought a meere confusion among the most wicked and desperate, mouing them to attempt and execute euen whatsoever themselves pleased.

Hereupon, they of Zurich, desiring to conferre their liberty, and maintaine themselves in peace: sent an honorable Ambassage to the Lord of Regensbourg, entreating him to be their Gouer-nour and Captaine, vntill the election of a new Emperour, and (for that effect) offered him honest and sufficient gages.
The Gentleman was a neighbour to Zurich, a rich and powerfull Lord in those times. Hee proudly reiected the honour which the men of Zurich did him, and made them answer in this manner. If the Citizens would obey all his commandements, and subiect the Citie to him:
hee was ready to take them into his protection, and would be their benign Lord.
But if they refused his offer, they should shortly bee compelled to accept it, euen in meere despight of them : because their Citie was ingirt and inuelped with his castles, as Fifth within a Weele, or water Leape.

This vauentry of the Lord of Regenspourg was not wholly vain, for he had many strong places neere vnto the citie : as Wrispia on the Lake of Zurich, a mile and a halfe from the citie ; Glanzenbourg, a Towne and castle of like distance, and on the riuier of Limagus. He had (moreouer) much neerer to the citie, vpon a high Mountaine towards the Sonne-fetting, two castles, to wit, Pliberg and Balderie, impregnable (as was imagined) by reason of their situation. Beside, the Towne and castle of Regenspourg, not a boue five miles at the most from Zurich. And, beyond all these, manie Countes or Earles were Leagued with him ; among other, the Count of Kybourg, dwelling at Burgdorf, the Count of Rapperswill, of Togge, of Nidow, of Arberg, and the Barons of Eichenbach, of Rigenberg, of Kilchberg, of Balme, of Hombourg, of Warris, and many other. They of Zurich, hauing beene so ignominiously refused : addrested themselves to Raoul of Habsbourg, mortall enemy to this Regenspourg ; made alliance with him, & within two yeares following, tooke the castles of Vitznaberg, Wrispia, Pliberg, Balderie, and the Towne of Glanzenbourg, molesting Regenspourg in such sort, as at length hee desired peace, and came to make his abiding at Zurich. These things hapned in the yeare, one thousand, two hundred, sixtie sixe, and the yeares following.

Pride & scorn full contempt very nill y scorned and rewarded.

Raoul of Habsbourg King of the Romanes, and a friend to them of Zurich.

In the yeare one thousand, two hundred, twenty three, Raoul of Habsbourg, was created king of the Romans, by common consent of the seauen Electours of the Empire. Afterward, being chosen Emperour, the Citizens of Zurich, serued him in many Warres, hee finding them still faithfull, and valiant fouldiers. In the warre of Bohemia, he had two hundred, which he placed beetweene the Ensignes in the first ranke : exhorting the others fouldiers to imitate the magnanimity of them of Zurich, whom (he said) he had well knowne and made prooue of before. Also, the most part of them dyed in the field, of battaile then giuen, and the Ensignes of the other were borne (for their honour) into the Temple of the Cordeliers or gray Friars. Raoul hauing receyued so many seruices by the men of Zurich, gaue them diuers priuiledges : and to honour them the more, beautified their Ensignes of Armes, with a Diadem and Bend of Purple.

Many haue imagined among the vulgar fort, because in the battaile at Winterberg, that the Bend was afterward annexed therto, as a note or mark of their ignominy. But there are many things yeelding contrary reasons to this opinion. For, in the first place, the notes of ignominy are not red, but meere black. And afterward, when René, Duke of Lorraine, tooke away all the marks of the ensignes belonging to the Switzers, in the warre against the Duke of Bourgonne, they of Zurich would neuer permit, that the Bend should bee taken out of their Standard. And in the yeare, one thousand, five hundred and twelue, when Pope Innius gaue new Standards vnto the Switzers, the Councell of Zurich would not alter any thing whatsoever in their Ensigne, no, nor so much as the bend or Diadem, which they neuer would haue done, if they had beene any notes of infamy.

Moreover, John of Winterduer, who liued at that time when they of Zurich were conquered by ambuscadoes at Winterduer, spake to King Raoul these Words : He crowned the Standard of Zurich with great action of graces. The same Authour also declareth, that in the warre at Reigenbourg, Iagues Mulner, a citizen of Zurich, couered (with his owne body) Raoul of Habsbourg, who was cast from his horse : and hauing remounted him vpon his owne, brought him forth of the prease safe and sound. For which great fauour, Raoul did much honour to the man, and loued him singularly ; yea, hee was also a deare friend to them of Zurich. This they auouch, because Carion, and such as were of his minde, did highly wrong the citie of Zurich, accusing it of fedition & rebellion against King Raoul, who therefore foiled them, and brought them vnder his obedience by armes.

After the death of Raoul of Habsbourg, they of Zurich maintayned the part of Adolph, and so did the Abbot of S. Gall, and

and the byshop of Constance. Now to the end that they of Zurich might ioyne them selves with the other : they assailed the Towne of Winterduer, and tooke it in the assault, vnder conduct of the Count of Togge, and there (in Garrison) was the Lord of Werdenberg, with great troopes, in name of Albert of Austria. The first day they were Victors, but on the morrow, by treachery in the Lorde of Werdenberg, who caused the Ensignie belonging to the Byshop of Constance, to be carried before him : by this cunning stratageme, the men of Zurich were overthrowne and cut in peeces. They attempted againe another warre in the name of Adolph, against them of Groningen, the which is in the territory of Zurich. But Albert Duke of Austria, sonne to Raoul, was offended at their enterprize, being informed by his people, that the greater part of them of Zurich, were slaine at Winterduer, which caused him to come and besedge Zurich, which hee imagined to bee quite emptye of any defensiu men.

The Citizens made a muster of their men (apt for armes) in the Citie, and on a place very high, where sometimes the Castle stood ; and that the Duke of Austriaes Army might easily discerne them. And, because their number might appeare to bee much more greater then it was, they caused all their strongest and stoutest women to be armed, and they children of biggest stature : which made the enemy to imagine, that there were great store of warlike people within the Citie. Afterward, they sent Ambassadors vnto Albert, to remember him, that his Father alwayes loued and maintained that citie ; that the citizens had serued him in all his warres, and wherein they (euermore) carried themselves faithfully and valiantly. Wherefore, they intreated him to follow his Fathers steps, and to accept them of Zurich rather as loyall and seruicable frindes, then to beleue false rumors spread abroad by their wil- lers, considering withall, that they were ready to giue him satisfaction.

Albert answered the Ambassadors very kindly, & willed them to come to him at Winterduer, where the peace was confirmed : betwene him and them of Zurich : vpon condition, that they should acknowledge and honour Albert as lawfull Emperour. This peace was continued after the death of Albert, and in the warre which his sons made against them that had slaine him : the citizens of Zurich kept themselves still faithfully on the behalfe of Austria, and fought for them against the three Cantons. After that, in the battell of Morgarten, fiftie men of Zurich were slaine in the field, as hath already beene declared. Moreover, when the Emperour was in some troubles, because some had elected Lewis, Prince of Bauaria ; and others Fredericke, the Sonne to Albert, the men of Zurich helde a long time for the part of Fredericke.

In the yeare, 1330. peace was made betwene Lewis of Bauaria, and Fredericke of Austria, wherewith, Fredericke renounced his Imperiall Election, and Lewis (to recompence him) promised to pay him a great summe of money. And because hee could not presently furnish him therewith, in regard of the Warres hee lately had, to his mightie expences ; gaue vnto him foure Townes as a pawn, and security of payment, Namely, Zurich, Schaffhouse, Rhinfeld, and Neubourg on the Rhene. But they of Zurich, immediately sent Ambassadors to the Emperour, to shew him, that they were so incorporated with the Empire, as they could (by no means) be separated from it. Their Letters were shewn to the same effect, read and perused by the Emperour, and then, although hee loued them but a little, because they had taken part with Fredericke ; yet notwithstanding hee left them to their owne liberties, and in sted of Zurich, Brissacke was giuen in gage to them of Austria.

The Ambassadors had also brought with them, the Deputies of the three Cantons, whom Lewis greatly affected, because they had alwayes beene faithfull vnto him. These Deputies declared, that the City of Zurich was a louing & friendly neighbor to the Cantons, & had highly serued them many times : Beside, they of Zurich promised, that (hereafter) they would be no lesse faithfull & obedient to Lewis of Bauaria, who was then their only lawfull Emperour, then they had formerly beene to Fredericke of Austria. This did much offend the Austrians ; for, albeit Fredericke had renounced the empire: yet notwithstanding, Leopold, Albert, and Otto his brethren, would not ratifie the agreement, but continued warre against Lewes of Bavaria. By which means Zurich fell off againe from friendship with them of Austria, and was excommunicated by the Pope, in such manner, as for the space of eightene years, there was no exercise of ceremonies (according to the Romane Church) vied in Zurich. The Priests departed from the citizens, some by their owne meere motion, others were expelled by the Bourgeses, because they refused to administer the Sacraments. There were none but the Coroclers or gray Friars, who went forth at one gate, and entered immediately at another.

The Citie standing thus excommunicated, and hated by the house of Austria: many Gentlemen, servants vnto that house, much molested the Citizens. Wherefore, in the yeare 1333. they of Zurich, with the men of Strasbourg, Basle, and Borne, besieged and took a castle on the Rhine, named Schunaw, belonging to the Lords of Geroltszegg, and ruined it, because it was one of the retreats for theecues. The yeare following, the men of Zurich ruined many castles, to wit, Fryenstein, on the riuer of Tofe, and another nere vnto it, called Touff the high. Also Schenvert, on the Limagus, about three miles from Zurich and Schlatt, nere to Espow, because the Gentlemen to whom these castles appertained, did greatly trouble the city of Zurich.

The next yeare ensuing, the Government of the Common-wealth of Zurich was changed, which procoued to bee the cause of great garboiles, and the principall occasion, of allying the citizens with the Cantons of Swetia. We haue already told you, that the commonwealth was gouerned by 36. men, and in such sort, as twelue commanded during the space of foure months. Some difference hapned between them and the people, in regard whereof, the people began to demand an account of their administration, especially, of the twelue that were in the second order. Some were accused among them, of robbing and dissipating (in a small time) the publike treasure, and besides, that they had bound the Citie in no meane store of great debtes. Eight of those men, finding themselves to bee hardly clear in this case, retired from the city: the other foure, voluntarily resigned vp their charge. Thus the authoritie of twelue ceasing, they grew to a forme of electing Magistrates, being chosen out of euery band of the tradesmen, and by seuerall nomination.

The Emperour Lewes confirmed this kinde of Commonwealt by his Letters Patents, and the succeeding Emperours also approued the same. They that had withdrawn themselves from the Citie, yielding after to the peoples iudgement, were condemned in seuerall fines: and they that sped the best were banished for three yeares, hauing first faithfully promised neuer to make any conspiracie against the citizens. Heere to also was annexed a note of infamy, to wit, that neyther they, nor any of their children, should euer be admitted into Councell. The ancient men and councillors, being affraide of a iudgement so seuer, beganne to distrust their owne causes; so that nine among them forsooke the Citie. This departure of theys was conuerted vnto banishment, and their goodes confiscated. As for the rest, nine of them were condemned in great fines, and then banished for two yeares: with this brand also set vpon them, that they nor their children should euer be admitted vnto councell. Others, that stood to their tryall, iustified themselves before the people, and were elected to be of the new councell.

The banished men made their retreat to a Towne, situated on the Lake, two miles (or thereabout) from Zurich, named Rasperwill, which at that time belonged to Count John, of the House of Habsbourg. Three yeares before, he had made request to them of Zurich, to accept him as a Citizen: willingly they would, and did (at last) receiue him, although he was Leagued with them of Austria, and diuers of them also were of his parentage. Heereupon, hee listened the sooner vnto the banished men, and made a confederacie with them, vnder certaine conditions; for securitie vvhreeof, hee gaue them the Castle of the Towne in keeping. These banished men being thus commodiously lodged & fortified, began to accuse them of Zurich, pretending to haue suffered great outrages by them; they defamed the Confull and new councell, and to make attempts against the Citie, vnto this effect: the helpe of some of their friends, that remained still in Zurich. Some of them being discovered by the councell, were punished: others fled away secretly, and ioyned with the banished men. And because these banished men had falsified their solemne promises: they were banished perpetually by the Senate, especially they that stood relegated but for a certaine time enioyned them.

Now, because the citizens of Zurich stood in slender security, either for themselves or their goods, since those banished men were excluded the city: diuers times they admonished the Count of his duty, that he being a Bourges, ought not to continue his fauour to the banished men, but rather to withdraw al helpe and comfort from them. Perceiuing the Count made no reckning of their complaints, they leuiet another Army, and went and besieged Rasperwill, the retire and refuge of the banished men. In vaine was this attempt of theirs, because the banished men had great plenty of victuals, and defended themselves valiantly, which made the other to raise their sieg. Gladly therefore they quitted the place, & so much the rather, because the Count of Habsbourg, protector of the banished, and whom most especially they fought for; was not at Rasperwill, but in a Castle called Grinow, which is at the head of Zurich Lake. They discamped thence, & marched with their Army vnto that very place, being conducted by Diethelme, Count of Togge, who was at controuersie with the other, concerning the cattle of Grinow.

The Count of Habsbourg (with his Army well appointed) was encamped at Buchberg, whence he came mainly running vpon them of Zurich, who landed suddenly from their Boates; and they granting them no leysure to bee ranged in order of battaile, put all in rout and disorder that were on Land, compelling them to enter their Boates againe, in which confusion they lost not many me, except the Count of Togge, who was taken prisoner. But after that al their troops were ioyned together againe in the middle of the Lake, being moued with anger, and desirous to wipe off the shame formerly receiued: by aduice of their Leaders, they went on shore againe, brauely bidding them the battaile, which they wonne. And such was their successe, that the Count of Habsbourg, and many Gentlemen with him, were slaine in the field: moreouer, they carried away in their Boates a mighty booty, & fixe ensignes of the enemies. The citizens of Rasperwill, hearing of this ouerthrow, to reuenge the death of their Lord, they cut in peeces the Count of Togge, who was conuained on Land, so soone as he had beene taken prisoner in the first encounter.

This things hapned in the yeare 1337. And the same yeare, the Emperour Lewes, and Albert of Austria, second of that name, furnished the Cripple, made peace betwene John of Habsbourg, Sonne to the deceased Count, the banished men of Zurich, and the Confull and Citizens of the City, vpon these conditions following. That the banished men should pay to the citizens (as a fine or amercement) the summe of fixe hundred markes of money: remaining still out of Zurich five yeares, during which time, they should not come neare the city, by the space of two miles; which beeing expired, they should againe be receiued, & their goods remaine entirely to them. The Emperour conceiued, that this new government in the state, would highly strengthen it in these five yeares: for there was appearance of great danger, that if the ancient Councillors were re-established, alterations would ensue in many matters, & nothing else please them, but the old form of rule, as many of their friends and partakers earnestly desired.

This peace lasted not long, for the banished men (faouored by a great number of the Nobility) made no regard at all of their promises: but molested the citizens, and conspired daily something or other against the city. In regard whereof, by permission of the Emperour, the houses, and al the goods which the banished had in the city, were confiscated. Notwithstanding, the yeare following, by the intermedie of Agnes Queene of Hungary, (who was daughter to Albert, first of that name, and after the death of her Father, remain-remained in Swissia the most part of her time) of Fredericke of Austria, and some other of the Cities: peace was renewed betweene the banished, and the citizens of Zurich: yet this was no firmer, or dur'd any longer then the former. For although the banished promised faithfully, that they would stand to the counsell of Zurichs sentence, and pay the fines wherein they were condemned; yet would they not make any satisfaction at all.

Means devised and undertaken, to resist enemies and maintain their liberties.

Many of the house of Habsbourg, (among others, the Sonne and kindred to Count John, whom they of Zurich slew in the battaile at Grimow) assembled a great number of Gentlemen, offended with the liberty of Zurich, hating that Democraticall government, as being too popular in their opinion: favoured the banished, and provoked them still on against them of Zurich. And they on the other side, for their better maintenance, first of all burned two Castles: one neere to the Tofe, appertaining to the Lords of Landberg, Gentlemen of marke: and the other to the Lords of Schonenburg, on an high hill above Elgow, because these places did much inure them. And to fortifie themselves yet stronger, they combined amity with the cities of Constance and S. Gall. Also, because some differences remained to be appeased with them of Schaffhouse, and war might be moved from thie: they yeelded willingly (by intermission of Ambassadors to some other cities) & in short time after, comprehended them of Schaffhouse in alliance with the cities of Constance and S. Gall. At the same time, they allied themselves also with the Bishop and city of Basile. Afterward they received into the number of their Bourgeses, many houses of the Rhodes, or of S. Iohn of Ierusalem: to be supplied and maintained with Gentlemen, and men of warre, as continually (and from time to time) were in that worthy Order of Knights of S. Iohn.

Schaffhouse, Constance, & S. Gall allied with Zurich.

A new conspiration of the banished men against them of Zurich & the City.

These puissant cities and people round about, being leagued with them of Zurich by new alliances, or reconfirmation of their ancient amity: the estate of the city remained more peaceable, and it seemed, that the banished had lost all hope of ever enjoying the city by power. But in this sleeping time, they conspired very secretly, to make themselves Masters thereof by treason. Count John of Habsbourg, Son to him that was slaine on the day at Grimow, as already we have shewn, was ioyined with them; vpon condition, that he should re-establish the banished men, in possession of their goods in the country, and that they should disingage the lands of the Count, morgaged for debts to his creditors. With them ioyned the Count of Toggenbourg, Peregrin Landberg (who some yeares before, had bene at great debate with them of Zurich, though all seemed to be laide asleepe by an agreement made betweene them) the Baron of Marcing, and many Gentlemen, partly pensioners and vassalls to the Count of Habsbourg, who they gladly endeavored to gratifie, & partly as friends to the banished, who had many ancient friends and partakers in the city, some whereof were well acquainted with all the conspiracy, and others also that would ioyne with them, if the first attempt succeeded well. A further hope also was conceived, that no meane number more would come to their part, if they did but see the ancient councillors, namely, such as were greatly indebted, and could subsist by no other meanes. Such likewise, as in this alteration of the state, were not honoured nor recompenced according to their expectation, and who were vnworthy to be seene of others, advanced and preferred before them. Then againe, some others, who were weary of the estate in her present condition, desiring nothing more then novelty: as in all commonwealths are daily to be found, too many such kinde of people. The resolution of the conspirators was, to make vse of the night time, and to plant armed men in all the streetes of Zurich, and to force the houses of Raoulle Brun, Consull also of all the new Councillors, and the rest of their enemies, to massacre them, seize the city, make themselves Lords thereof, and take away the liberties of the citizens.

In this manner, the 24. of February, in the year 1350. Peregrin Landberg, Count of Habsbourg, many Gentlemen, and some of the banished with them, came vnto Zurich: The same ranne through the City, that they came to present a request to the Councill, in behalfe of the banished. At the same time, diuers armed armed men had secretly slipt into the city, and hid themselves in the houses of their complices. The Counts and Gentlemen had a very great troope of armed Groomes and Pages waiting on them, ready to execute whatsoever their Masters should command them. Moreover, there were sundry companies readily prepared (both of horse and foote) who in the night should come neere the city, and there to be suddenly let in, after the watch-word was giuen. Others should come by Boates, and on that side where the Lake makes a separation of the city: to rush on by impetuous troopes, & hinder the country-men round about (who were very honest and faithfull to the city) that they should not come that way to help or releue it.

All things being thus ordered and appointed, vpon the very same night determined for the massacre, the conspiracy was discovered: more by the providence of God, then any counsell or industry of men. For God (vndoubtedly) preferred this city to be (very loone after) the first, for conferring the Switzers liberties, as also, for the retrace of his church.

The chiefe men of this coniuration, were in the house of a citizen, where they conferred on their affaires, and closely expected the houre of night, when the watch-word was to be giuen abroad. A servant of the house, who neuer had knowledge of this enterprize, being layd vpon a Bench to sleepe, happened to wake by their close whispering, and lending some attention to their talke, obserued their words very carefully, yet shored as if hee had bene in a found sleepe. So soone as he could conveniently do it, softly he got away, and went directly to the lodging of Raoulle Brun, who was Consull then, reuealing to him at full, what danger hung ouer the head of him, the whole counsell, and all the honest minded people of the city. He also acquainted him with the watch-word, whereby the enemies should be knowne one to another, in the darke obscurity of the night.

The Consull having heard the servants words, armed himselfe immediately, and went towards the Towne-house: the enemies were going and coming already through the streetes, yet he escaped well among them, because hee deliuered the watch-word readily to them, and so got on to the Towne-house. A servant of his, attired in the garments of his Master, having not vnderstood the watch-word, by reason of the great feare and haste the Consull made, was slaine by the enemies before the Towne-house: not so much because he could not giue the word, as for that they tooke him to bee the Consull.

In the meane while, the Consull commanded one of the Officers of the Seignury, to run to the church, and to ring out the watch-bell, after the wonted manner, to signifie the coming of enemies. The Officer seeing the gate before the clock-house to be round enight with enemies: by a secret doore belonging to the church, got into the clock-house, & rung out the terror to all the city. On the other side, the Consull (himselfe) cryed out aloud on the top of the Towne-house, Arme, Arme, the City is full of enemies. Now the Ruer named Lamagne, or Limmath, diuided the city in twaine, & those two parts met and ioyined together, by the means of two Bridges made of wood. Immediately, euery one ran to these bridges: but because the planks and boords of the one were not made fast nor nailed, they threw them all downe into the water. By this meanes, all the fury and tempest of trouble, kindled it selfe at the other Bridge, which ioyined neere to the Towne-house.

There is a place of indifferent greatness, at the entrance to the said Bridge and house: the enemies got possession of that place, and of another neighboring to it. Heere the conflict grew very sharp, for, from forth the highest roomes of the houses, they of the city hurled downe Tyles and great Stones vpon their enemies, who were also to fight with other citizens, gotten together in great number, and came to ioyne with their bell helpe. The Butchers were the foremost men in the fight: for they were then vp in the Butchery (it being banded neere to the Ruer) killing Oxen and other cattell. Having heard the noise and out-cries of the Consull, they ran out vpon the enemies, with their Axes in their hands. In memory whereof, and as a testimony of their hardihood, the common-wealth gaue them a Lyon of Copper or Brasie, which which (as yet) they beare yeerely in pomp and triumph through all the city. They were moued to vnder take Arms, by these meanes following.

The Count of Toggenbourg, being with-drawne into a house of one of the conspirators, and perceiving the danger, fearing also his owne skin-coate; after he had a while consulted with his Host: determined to free himselfe from blowes, refusing thus; that if matters fell out well for his companions, he could easily come in againe among the troopes, and speake to them, as if he had bin alwayes in the crowd. But if it happened otherwise, he would be sure to save himselfe, & learne to meddle with better businesse. According to this conclusion, himselfe, his Host, and his seruant, well laden with money, got into a small Boate, belonging to a fisherman, named Bax, who should conduct them along the Riuer out of the city. But fearing lest this Bax should discover their flight, the Count commanded his seruant, that so soone as they were out of the city, he should presently kill the fisherman. He being neerer to them then they imagined (by reason of the nights darknesse) vnderstood their purpose and resolution concerning himselfe: wherein he wisely preuented them, by suffering the boate to tilt suddenly on the one side, and so they all three together fell into the Riuer.

Making haste afterward home to his owne house, and waking all the neighbours dwelling about him; he desired them to take Arms secretly, because the city was in eminent perill, and enemies were hidden in many parts thereof, but he knew neyther how, nor what was their intent. Hereupon, they armed themselves presently, and hearing the Confull still crying, Arme, Arme: waked other friends and neighbours, by whose helpe they got the Bridge, and there raunged themselves orderly in fight against the enemy. It is further said, that the Priests of the great church, being then singing Masses, and hearing this tumult in the night: armed themselves from the houses round about, and entred in among the thickest throngs, fighting valiantly for the freedom & safety of their country. It might so come to passe, that this year the Popes excommunication was first raised, and that after eightene yeares were expired, the Priests entred into the city againe.

Thus the citizens (by little and little) gathered their strength together, for from euery part they came in full troopes, and declaring their valour in so great a need, the enemies that were in the city (constrainedly) gaue way. Fifteene among them were slaine, and more then thirty seuen taken prisoners, among whom was the Count of Habsbourg; others saved themselves by fauour of the night. The Baron of Matzingen, and Peregrin Landberg were among the dead. The Count that fell into the water, was there drowned. The bodies of the slaine lay three whole daies on the pavement, expofed to the mockery of all men, and to be trampled on with the feete of euery passer-by.

On the morrow, seuteene, the principall men in the coniuration, were broken, and their bodies laide on wheeles: eightene were beheaded. The Count of Habsbourg, Huldreich, Baron of Bonstert, and some other, remained prisoners. The Army of the Count of Habsbourg, as well that which came on the lake, as the other by land, hearing this tumult in the city, and seeing no man came that should open the gates to them: retired backe in great feare, so that in the morning, the people gathered vp their armes and weapons for warre, which the run-awaies had gladly left behinde them, for their easier escaping.

Matters being thus appeased at Zurich, to preuent any more new troubles in the city: the Confull brought an Army into the field, on the second day of March, & being seconded with supplies sent them by the men of Schaffhouse; they went and besiedged Rapperswill, the Fortresse & retreat of the conspirators. The inhabitants of the Towne knowing that their Count was taken, the banished mangled in peeces, or made fugitiues and vagabonds, and hauing no likelihood at all of succour: on the third day of the siege yeelded, and bound themselves sollemnly to the common-wealth of Zurich, promising (for euery after) to acknowledge them as their chiefe, and render them all such duty, as formerly they had done to their Count. The Towne taken, they of Zurich thought they had gotten two aduantages. One was, that from thence forward, no pilling or rauge was more to be made of their country, as oftentimes before had bene, and that the city wold now safely be preferred from ambushes and treasons. The other, that the kindred and friends to the imprisoned Count, began to treat on peace: fearing to lose all the country about Rapperswill, because the Towne and the Count were taken.

Hereupon, the Queene of Hungary procured, that truce should be accorded for certaine moneths: but Raoul St Godfrey of Habsbourg, being summoned by them of Zurich to make peace, declared no affection thereto. Considering withall, that diuers Gentlemen, neighbours, but enemies to the men of Zurich, incited them rather to make warre. So all hope of peace being quite cut off, the first day of September (the same yeare) they of Zurich conducted their Army towards the country of the Marche, situated at the beginning of the Lake of Zurich, towards the Sun-setting, then being in obedience to the Count of Habsbourg. The cities of Constance and Saint Gall, sent succour to the men of Zurich, and hauing spoyle & burnt all the country, they besiedged a Castle, called Rapperswill the olde, and followed it so closely, that the besiedged, hauing no more meanes of resistance, yeelded, & went away with their liues saved. The Castle was ruined downe to the ground, and they of the March promised fidelity and subiection to the common-wealth of Zurich. This done, the Army went to a Towne, called Rapperswill the new. They brake downe the Bridge that ioyned to the Lake, beate downe the Castle, and most part of the walles of the Towne, and hauing heard (for certaine) that Albert of Austria meant to come aid them of Habsbourg with great forces: they set the Towne on fire, and burnt it wholly, not leaving any iote thereof remaining.

At the same time, certaine Gentlemen, named the Waldners of Sultz, dwelling in Austria, declared warre against them of Zurich, taking their Merchants, pilling & outraging them by all manner of wayes. They of Nafle and Strasbourg withdrew, & gaue supportance to these warres there. Vpon these indignities, they of Zurich were moued, to seize on about eight score and ten persons of Nafle and Strasbourg, that were come on pilgrimage to the Chappell of the Hermitage. As essaying by this meanes, whether they of Strasbourg and Nafle, compaffionating the imprisonment of their citizens: would expell from their countries those Gentlemen that were the cause of this disturbance. This fell out to proue but a very vaine hope, for these cities and their Bishops, offended with this vniuelt detention of their pilgrims; ioyned themselves with Fredericke of Austria, Fribourg in Brisgow, Selsbad, Brissac and Colmar. Hauing vniited their forces together, they resolved to make warre on Zurich, and redemand their prisoners by Armes. The men of Zurich, finding themselves not strong enough, in regard of their precedent warres, seditions and losse of men, which had greatly impaired them in power: deliuered backe the prisoners, and so turned aside this dangerous tempest.

Now because they had suffered great outrages, and saw no likelihood of any better successe to ensue: they sent Ambassadors to Charles IV. to whom they made their businesse knowne. They told him, that hauing taken (in a iust warre, & within their city) the Count of Habsbourg their enemy, for maintaining their cause against him, they were molested and assaulted by Gentlemen neighbours. But that which most of all greeued them, was, to see those Gentlemen assisted by Fredericke of Austria, and other potent cities of the Empire. And because Zurich was an Imperiall City also; they made their recourse to him, as being the sole head of the Empire. They humbly desired him, to lend them both aide and counsell, and to take order by his power and authority, that (in succeeding times) the Princes of Austria, the cities and Towns of the Empire, nor any other Gentlemen might make warre against them, contrary to all right and reason. But rather to permit, that their city might enioy her wonted liberty, in peace and quietnesse: considering, that they were ready (as they ought to be) to answer before the Emperor, to all whatsoever any man could object against them.

The Emperor hauing heard the complaint of them of Zurich, answered the Ambassadors most humanely: that he coucted nothing more, then to haue their liberty continue in full perfection, and would do his endeavor, to accord them with Fredericke of Austria, and his associates. But he could give them no succor, nor attempt any thing by force, against the house of Austria, the Nobility of Germany, or the Cities of the Empire: because (at that instant time) they were far stronger then he. Wherefore, they of Zurich should devise to pacifie their differences with such enemies: by some reasonable agreement, wherein he would assist them to his power.

The Ambassadors departed away very sadly with this answer, and came home againe to Zurich. And because (at that time) Albert of Austria, Sonne to Albert, was in Swetia: they of Zurich sent presents to him by Ambassadors, to whom he gave kinde entertainment, and tolde them, that he would come meete them with an ample power, for he desired to be a friend to them of Zurich, and had some matters to acquaint them withall. Afterward, when the Ambassadors came unto him againe at Bruges in Swetia, he was become an enemy to Zurich, by accusations and reports of the Noblemen, and spake sharply to the Ambassadors, saying: That they of Zurich had done him great wrong in ruining both the old and new Raspermills, and spoiling the Marche likewise, because they were in his Seignoury. He therefore demanded, that they should restore what they held from him, rebuild those places which they had ruined, and repay their pillages with ready money, & in so doing, hee would pardon them all those wrongs.

How the lands of John of Habsbourg belonged to Albert of Austria, in manner of a right by title.

As concerning his maintaining the lands of John of Habsbourg; they belonged to him, in manner following. Garner Count of Hombourg, Lord of Raspermill the elder, and of three castles, seated vpon one Mountaine, named Wartenberg, nere to Basle, dying without children; the succession fell vnto that John of Habsbourg, who was slaine at Grinow. But Oslo and Albert, Princes of Austria, laid claime to them, being the stronger (I know not whether they had any other title) and all the other goods of Garner, including both Raspermill the elder, & all the Marche. Neuertheless, they rendred all vnto John of Habsbourg, and he to hold it of them as in Knights fee, and so became their valfaile and pensioner. Thus you see, why Albert of Austria said, they had done him wrong, and wherefore he demanded satisfaction.

The Ambassadors of Zurich made answer, that (from those places) ambuscadoes had bene made against their city, their citizens spoiled and slaine, and in those castles their banished men were harboured. Therefore, seeing they had ruined Raspermill, which no longer was an abiding for Noblemen, but a retreat for theues & banished men: they thought it no way meete, that any should be compelled to builde it againe, or in the selfsame place. They entreated the Prince to consider seriously on euery thing: they being alwaies ready, to debate their cause before the Princes and cities of the Empire, and in any such place as hee would appoint. The Prince answered them in choller, that this was not a difference which stood in need of any Iudges, to beate downe his castles, and waste the places of his Seignoury. But if all were not redressed againe to the first condition, and full satisfaction made: he would employ all his forces, and constraine them of Zurich to do it. In briefe, he would haue no other debating of this cause, but by the point of the Sword.

The Ambassadors hauing made their answer to the councill of Zurich, & they perceiuing also evidently, that the citie would very shortly be besieged, because all the Noblemen were already in armes: the men of Zurich well knowing, that in expecting aide from the Emperor or the Empire, was merely to abuse themselves; resolved to combine alliance with the Cantons, for the better preservation of their common liberties. Till then, they maintained themselves in amity one with another, and although in the day of Morgarten, they of Zurich gave succour to the Duke of Austria; yet notwithstanding, the Cantons were not offended therewith, but rather tooke pleasure, to approue the hardinesse and valour of the men of Zurich in fight.

Hauiug then so maïne an enemy (in common) against them all, to wit, the Duke of Austria, both the one and the other then might easily iudge, that their forces beeing thus combined together, they had thereby the better means for resistance. Moreover, the Cantons were not ignorant, that this their alliance with them of Zurich, did highly accomodate them for prouision of victuals; because there was a very excellent market at Zurich, and the Lake was apt to transport both food and Merchandizes. Wherefore, after that the men of Zurich had sent their Ambassadors to the Cantons, to require their alliance in loue, and freely had acquainted them with their present dangers: the Cantons imbraced their motion very thankfully, and (soone after) sent their Ambassadors to Zurich, with plaine power to confirme this alliance, which was fully resolved on in the Moneth of April, in the yeare one thousand, three hundred, fifty one, and engrossed in writing at the beginning of May following. Now albeit Zurich is the first, coming thus into alliance with the Switzers; yet notwithstanding, because it is a city much renowned and mighty; the first place was giuen to it, and Zurich named to be the first Canton. The men of Zurich (yet to this day) do hold that name and ranke, among all the thirteene Cantons, as well in dayes occasions of the Switzers accounts, as in all Ambassages, and other publique actions whatsoever.

The alliance and vniou of people, as in a thorne in the haire of all such as would oppress them

This vniou of them of Zurich, caused warre (so much the sooner) to come vpon them: for the Prince of Austria was already very angry with them of Suits, Fris, and Underwald, which first of all were leagued together: neuertheless, hee assured himselfe (one day) to bring them vnder his yoke. For, because the country was barren, and not conveniently groundd for warre; there grew some apparance, that (at length) it might bee subdued, albeit they were good Souldiers, and well resolved for fight. But when Lucerne, which was vnder the dominion of Austria, ioynd with them, and then (soone after) Zurich, a free city, and cheefest of all other in the country: the Prince became much more mooued and troubled: for he was not ignorant, how greatly this alliance had strengthened and authorized them of Zurich. And therefore he concluded, to lay hold on this occasion, to make warre on the men of Zurich, and besiege their city; to essay if thereby he could vnknit this knot of combination, before any other (following example of the former) should make any more new leagues. See heere the true cause of the warre, and I dare maintaine, that no cause (concerning the ruine of Raspermill) incited it; because (at all times) when peace was treated on after the warre began: they of Austria neuer vrge that article, concerning the building againe of Raspermill; but rather that they of Zurich, should renounce their alliance with the cantons.

Thus then, in the Moneth of September, the yeare 1351. Albert of Austria besieged Zurich. He had encamped with him, Lewes, Count of Brandenberg; Fredericke, Duke of Teck, the Duke of Pyflinge, and the Burgeaue of Nuremberg. The Bishops of Wincheburg, Bamberg, Frisingen, Coire, and Basle sent him succour. He had fise and twenty Counts or Earles in his Army, namely; Enrrad, Count of Wirttenberg, conductor of the Army; Lewes, count of Outigen; Fredericke, count of Ortenberg; the two counts of Schmalenloch; the two counts of Ternanges; the two counts of Furstenberg; the three of Tierstein; they of Halsbourg and Kybourg; Raoul and Herman of Wendenberg; Albert and Henry of Nellenbourg; Guillaume of Kilchberg; Immer of Strasbourg, of New-chastle, of Nidow, of Arberg, of Fribourg, of Zolern, and of Metbourg. Likewise the cities of Strasbourg, Basle, Fribourg in Frigraye, Soleurre, and some others sent aide to the Duke. It is said, that he had in his Army two thousand horse, and fise thousand foote. On the other side, the four Cantons sent a good Garrison to them of Zurich. The Souldiers and the citizens fortified the city, and made diligent prouision of all things requisite to withstand the siege, and to defend it: so that (on both sides) there were some sallies and skirmishes.

But few daies after the siege, peace was made, by the intermille of Fredericke, count of Togge, and of Hertze, Ketcheberg, commander of Rhodes, abiding at Vatelud, with them of Basle and of Berne on condition, that the Switzers should refer themselves vnto the definitive iudgement of Agnes, Queene of Hungary, to whom, eyther side should send their Ambassadors, and that which was concluded by them, with plurality of voyces, eyther party should ratifie. For this effect, they of Zurich were to giue in 16. Hollages, of the cheefest of the Citty, and Albert promised by his Letters, that no wrong should be done unto them. The foure Cantons would not accept of this peace, alledging, that no trust ought to be given to the Queen of Hungary, who would not faile to give sentence in fauour of Albert, he beeing her brother. Neuerthelesse, the men of Zurich, who had a good opinion of the woman, did so plesse the other Cantons, that they subscribed together the conditions: adding this exception (in common) that their alliance should continue in full force.

The Duke of Austria chose for Iudges, Immer, Count of Strasberg, and Peter of Stoßfelen, commander of Tannenfels. They gave sentence in behalfe of their Master, whereby it was appointed, that they of Zurich were bound, to renew (according to their former condition) the olde and new Rasferwiles, and give satisfaction to Albert: rendering backe Lucerna vnder his gouernment, and surrender also great store of possessions and rights, in the territory of Vnderwald. They tooke away likewise from them of Suits, their right of fishing in the Lake, and their ancient possession and vse of many Forests. Finally, they condemned all the five Cantons, in great fines of money: neuer having any regard, what wrongs the city of Zurich had endured, by them of Rasferwils, nor other reasons and defences proposed by the Cantons, and by Philp Kyen, Knight, and Peter de la Hanne, Consull of Bern, their Iudges dealequed.

Queene Agnes approved the sentence of Alberts Iudges. She was a witty woman, that had an outward appearance of great sanctity, as we vse to say, from the teeth forward. At all times when she saw her brethren forward to make warre, but greatly unfurnished; then would she beleeve to procure truce or peace betweene the Switzers and them. Onely to this end, that they might assemble their troopes together in the meane time, and bee the better provided for a sudden assailing the at vnawares. Yet all that while, she would still protest, that she did all this for the enjoying of peace, and in meere compassion which she had of the Switzers.

Now albeit this sentence was most vniually yet notwithstanding, the Switzers promised to ratifie it. But the Duke being not contented with all this, commanded them of Zurich, to set at liberty (without eyther fine or ranfome) Count Iohn of Habsbourg, their prisoner taken in faire warre, and of whom the Iudges made not any mention. Heereupon, they of Zurich would not yeeld to any thing, by which occasion, the Duke imprisoned their hostages, contrary to his faithfull promise, planted a Garrison on the Frontiers, and prepared himselfe for a new warre.

More insurrection of the Duke of Austria.

CHAP. V.

How Glaris being conquered by the Cantons, came afterward to be accepted into their louing alliance.

THE Switzers seeing that all hope of peace was utterly frustrated, & that they must needs re-enter into war: determined among themselves, to invade the country of Glaris, for feare lesse (in that quarter) the enemy would make courses on the lands of the confederates, and especially on them of Suits. Wherefore, the very same yeare, and in the Moneth of November, the men of Zurich, Vri, Suits, and Vnderwald, ioyned together, and led their troopes towards Glaris. Without any blow smitten, they made themselves Masters of the whole country, taking oath of them of Glaris; and in regard of their faithfulness, as also their approved valour in war, which they had well tried oftentimes before; they received them into their alliance.

The determination of the Switzers, who peace was made void, and war must needs be undertaken.

Glaris is a strait Valley and long, cotaining a league and an halfe of the Germane measure, neere to the River of Limagus or Limmatris. It tookname from the principall

Towne of all the Country, being engirt on three sides with very high Alpes: hauing the Grifons on the South side, & towards the East, Vri, & Suits to the West, and on the North, the field called the Girons.

A breefe description of Glaris.

The Abbey of Secon giuen to S. Fridolin, by two brothers.

Glaris yeelded willingly to the Switzers.

the country, by which, the River of Limagus runneth along the Valley, and enters into the Lake of Zurich. Glaris had bin subiect a long time, and for the space of many yeares, to the Abbey of Secon, & was giuen to S. Fridolin, by two brothers, named Ours and Landsolphe. They of Glaris paid tythes to this Abbey, and certaine constituted rents, beside taxations of some inheritances. They were not charged with any imposts, or subsidies whatsoeuer: they held their owne lawes, & a councill among their citizens. True it is, that the election belonged vnto the Abbess; but the Prouostship or gouernment (both of the Abbey and country) was the Emperours onely, & in his power.

Afterward, Frederick Barbarossa gaue it to Otho, Palatine of Bourgonne, from whose successors, it came to them of the house of Habsbourg. Vnder pretence of this authority, Albert of Austria, Sonne to the Emperour Raoul, made himselfe Lord of Glaris, in despite of the whole country: who had promised to the forenamed Abbey, neuer to be leparated or alienated from it. This vspurpation was the cause, that many Noble families forsooke the country, and withdrew themselves thence, some to Vri, and others to Zurich. They of Austria being well fortified, expelled out of his house the Baron of Suanda, a rich Gentleman, and well beloued in those parts, appropriating all his goods to himselfe. They vsurped also the rights of the Maiordome of Glaris, & brought in a nouelty neuer before practised: sending Gouernours into that country, to haue a seuerer eye ouer the people, and to iudge them by proceesse in law.

Those Gouernours were very rude and insolent, so that the people (in despite of the Austrians) yeelded themselves voluntarily to the Switzers, when they came to warre vpon them, and made perpetuall alliance with them. Gautier de Stad, Gouernour for them of Austria, departed from Glaris, after the inhabitants had sworn fidelity to the Switzers, withdrawing himselfe not far off, namely to Wesen. But they of Glaris chose among themselves (according to their ancient custome) a Maior or Ammun, and their vsuall number of counsellors. And because they expected nothing more, but that the Austrians would soone come againe to molest them: they strengthened their walles, and trenched their Valley, neere to a Village named Naiffell, where was the easiest entrance into the country; that needed no fortification, but only there, all the rest being engirt with Mountaines round about.

During these alterations at Glaris, in the Moneth of December, they of Zurich marched with their Army towards Bada, where was a great Garrison of the Austrians, that by their often out-roads made much waste on the Lands of Zurich. To require them with money of the saide stamp, they of Zurich forraged the country about Bada, and burnt the Subburbs of the Towne, getting vp on the Mountaine, to come neerer to them. But towards Tetiulle, on the Mountaine, a Capitaine of the Austrian horsemen, named Ellerbach, made firme the passage with foure thousand men. They of Zurich were no more then 1300. (some say they were much lesse) notwithstanding, they set vpon the enemy, and wonne a very remarkable victory, leauing there 700. enemies slaine, among whom (as is credibly auouched) there were 65. Gentlemen.

The yeare following, Gautier de Stad, not long before Gouernour of Glaris, hauing leuiued an Army, prepared himselfe, to subiect the country againe to the house of Austria. Hee tooke occasion to do this, because he had receiued intelligence that two hundred men of Glaris were in Garrison at Zurich. But the other inhabitants ouercame him in a ranged battel, where he was slaine, and a great number of the Nobility, the 2 day of February.

The selfe same day, the Austrians that were at Zug, being gone by Boates to Arre, & did set vpon the lands of Suits, but met with the like welcome as Stad had at Glaris. In like manner, all the confederates sent an Army to forrage Berne, and other neighbouring places, from whence the Austrians issued forth oftentimes, to set vpon the Lucernians: As (on the other side) the Austrians put to fire and blood Cusnach, and some other places, yet not without their owne great losse. About the holidayes of Pentecoste, the Lucernians, assisted by the three Cantons, tooke (by assault) a Castle, called Habsbourg, seated on the Lake of Lucerna; cut in peeces all them that were therein Garrison, & ruined it quite fro the top to the bottom.

Of Zug, and at what time it came to be comprehended, in league and confederacy with the other Cantons of the Swissers.

IN those times, Zug hapned to be thus comprized in alliance with the Swissers. It is a Towne betwene Zurich and Suits, seated at the foote of a Mountain, rich in pasturages, and vines planted on the sides ioyning to the Lake, which a-boundeth with plenty of Fish, common to them both of Zug and Suits. It is reputed to be the capitall Towne of certaine people, which accompanied the of Zurich, in the warre of the Cimbrians against the Romans. Sometimes these acknowledged diuers Gé- tle men as her Lords: but afterward, fell into the hands of them of Austria, who, during the warre against the Swissers, maintained there an ordinary Garrison, which did many harmes to them of Suits and Zurich. And this was the cause, that in the year 1352. and the Moneth of Iune, the men of Zurich, with the foure other Cantons, prepared an Army to go against Zug. The Soldiers finding their strength far too weake, would not attend the Swissers coming: but withdrew to Bremgarten, and other places thereabout. But the Townsmen, who would be faithful to the Duke of Austria, maintained the siege for fifteene daies space: neuertheless, hauing received a very violent assault: they yielded themselves, & took an oath to the Swissers, on this condition. That if within a certaine time appointed, the Duke of Austria brought an Army, to cause the siege to be removed: they would returne againe vnder his obedience, and stand acquitted of their oath giuen to the Swissers. To effect this businessse, they sent their Ambassadors, to require succour from the Duke of Austria: he being then in the Abbey of Champ Royall, about fifteene leagues from Zug,

& there the Ambassadors let him vnderstand their charge and message.

It chanced at that instant time, that the Duke was walking in a Gallery, demanding of his Faulconer, whether hee had (that day) fed his Hawkes or no? The cheefeest of the Ambassadors, named Herman, taking him at that word, said. Alasse my Lord, haue you not more care of your Subjects, the of Hawkes? Especially now, when the enemy hath so strictly engirt vs; as if you send not present supply, constrainedly we must surrender our felues? The Prince returned this answer. It is wel, yeeld your felues; before it be long time, we will recover againe whatsoever we haue lost. And because they of Zug well saw, that it was in vaine to looke for any comfort thence: they ioynd themselves in vinity and alliance with the Swissers.

Hardly were the Letters of this alliance written, for combing thus the Cantons by oath: but Albert, Duke of Austria, now the second time besieged the city of Zurich, about the midst of Iune. But at the end of the Moneth, by intermisse of the Marquesse of Brandebourg, peace was made, on those conditions following. They of Zurich should set at liberty John of Habsbourg, their three yeares prisoner, without eyther fine or ranfome. Also, that the Duke of Austria should acquit (frank and freely) the hostages of Zurich, whom he had likewise imprisoned. They of Zug and Olaria, absolued of their oath taken to the Swissers, should (as before) yeeld obedience to the house of Austria. In the meane while; nothing should hinder, but that the alliance of the Swissers must stand firme.

In the time of this treaty, John of Habsbourg came forth of prison, without paying any ranfome; but the Hostages of Zurich were not released, according to sworn promise: for before they could get forth, they were compelled to pay sixteen hundred crownes for a ranfome, & yet could not enioy eyther peace or safety. For so soone as the Count of Habsbourg was released, hee gaue Rasperwill, and the places neighbouring about it, to Albert of Austria; who immediately fortified Rasperwill, and planted a Garrison there, whereby a new warre was engendered. For the Soldiers of that Garrison ranne in on the Lands of Zurich, and slew fifty men at Heereby we may plainly perceiue, that the Duke of Austria did but seeke occasion, whereby to begin the warre againe. The year following, as the Ambassadors of Suits were gone (in name of the fine Cantons) to require of them of Zug, the obligatory oath of their alliance, according to the Articles of pacification: they of Austria expelled them away with outrages. In regard whereof, they mustred their forces together againe, and made themselves Masters of Zug the second time, and then commanded the citizens, to giue their oath to the Swissers. In the same year, 1352. the sixteenth day of March, Berne ioynd it selfe in alliance with the Swissers. But we are to speake somewhat in this place, concerning this city, which is the most powerfull among all them in Swetia.

CHAP. VII.

Of the building of Berne, the situation and condition thereof, and how it was yeelded to the Empire.

Bernhau, fift of that name; & the last Duke of zeringen, built the city of Berne, and being offended with the noblemen, who had caused his male children to be poysoned in their youth: he submitted it to the Empire; & enfranchised it. The Emperor Fredericke the eleuenth, ratified the Dukes will, and after the death of him, in the year, 1218. a Gouverneur was sent to Berne, named Otho of Ramenbourg, in name of the Empire. But some yeares after, for good seruices done by them of Berne to the Emperor: hee gaue them much greater priuiledges and franchises, exempting them also from hauing any more Gouverneur.

In the troubles and confusions which happened in the Empire, the Count of Suabour, Lord of Burgdorf, stroue to abolish the cities liberty, leaguimg himselfe (for that purpose) with Gentlemen his neighbours, and the Towne of Fri- bourg, which Bernhau the fourth had built: And his Son had giuen in charge to both these Townes, to continue friends for euet: As concerning the occasion of this war, it grew thus. The men of Berne had bought certaine Lands beyond the Riuer of Aar, & began to prepare a bridge, which the Count would not suffer, hee being Lord beyond the Riuer. Whereupon they of Berne; (desirous to make themselves as strong as their enemies) did put themselves into the protection of the Count of Sauoye, who represented the attempts of the Count of Kybourg, and hauing obtained peace, enlarged the compass and roundite of the city. Then after warre was moued, betwene the Count of Sauoye, and the Duke of Bourgongne, the Count promised the men of Berne, that if they carried themselves valiantly, and he prospered in his attempt, he would grant them whatsoever they would demand of him. They performed their duty so well, that the enemy was discomfited: and then (as in recompence) they desired nothing else of the Count of Sauoye, but their ancient liberty, and he granted their request, and kept his promise most faithfully with them. After that time, they of Berne were alwayes friends, and allied to the house of Sauoye.

The City being reintegrated into her wonted liberty, before they entred into league with the Swissers, had many and very difficult warres, as well for conseruation of their liberty, as enlarging their limits. They gaue a battaile to Godfrey of Habsbourg, in the year, 1241. but that was to their owne disadvantage, because the enemy was far greater in number. Moreover, Raoul of Habsbourg, accompanied with them of la Tour and de Gruyere, besieged (two severall times) the City of Berne; vnder colour of accusing them of Berne, that they had violated the publicke faith of the Empire, in taking prisoners, and euill entreating certaine lewes. Albert of Austria, sonne to the Emperor Raoul, did twice bid them battaile before the city, and many citizens were there flaine. In the year 1291. the Counts of Sauoye, Newberg, and Gruyere, the Bishop of Laufanna, the Lord of Tour, beside some Townes and Gentlemen, made a league against Berne: but by the aide of the Counts of Kybourg and Arberg, as also the city of Solleurre, the men of Berne wonne a mighty battaile, at a place called, The hill of Thunder. Auldrieh Erlach was chiefe of the Bernish Army in that warre. During the yeares following, many of the Castles, neighbouring to the city, were taken in war, and demolished by them of Berne. They also had victories in the warres, moued in the vale of Simma, and in many other places, against the Noblemen that much molested them, whereby they greatly enlarged their limits. Also the inhabitants of the vale of Hafell, who were at free liberty, ioyned with them of Berne. This happinesse of theirs, so enflamed the malice and enuy of the Noblemen against Berne, as thereon ensued the memorabill battaile giuen at Loupen.

The famous and memorabill battaile giuen by Count and Gentlemen, against the men of Berne at Loupen.

Many Counts and Gentlemen, hauing leuiued a well prepared Army, of sixteen thousand foote, and three thousand, five hundred horse, at the least, went and besiedged Loupen, which is a small Towne appertaining to them of Berne, who were about five thousand, assisted with three hundred men of Vri, as many of Suits, as many of Vnderwald, and as many of the Vale of Hafell, Waulf Erlach being chiefe of these troopes. This small number overcame the enemy in a ranged battaile, nere to Loupen, where dyed in the fildes, the Count of Sauoye, who was sent to the Campe by his Father, onely to treat on peace: but the other constrained him to make one in the battaile. There were flaine also, the Counts of Nidow, of Arberg and Valendis, fifteen hundred horsemen, among whom were fourescore Gentlemen of marke, and about three thousand foote. This battaile was fought the 21. day of Iune, in the year 1339.

A fortunate and successfull pursuit of victory against them of Fribourg and many towne more.

After this successfull day, they of Berne made warre (to their advantage) against them of Fribourg, who were vassalls to the house of Austria, and also to the Gentlemen about Fribourg. For at Schonnenberg, they of Fribourg were ouerthrowne, and lost many of their men, their country forraged, and the Subburbs of their

Towne burnt. Signow, Langnow, Burgdorff, Longuenall, Pyrnetic, Arberg, Erlach, Nidow, Thun, and other Townes and great Villages, were eyther spoyled, or taken by them of Berne. Finally, Agnes Queene of Hungary, made an end of this warre, by means of a peace which shee compounded. In all these warres, they of Berne euer felt, that Gentlemen, no better then vassalls to the house of Austria, most laboured to oppress them: whereas (contrariwise) the amity of the Switzers did highly aduantage them. But in the meane while, and contrary to their hope and expectation, they were drawne into a new warre, wherein they of Vnderwald ioyned themselves with their enemies. The Lord of Singenberg, and the Prouost of the Abbey situated betwene the two Mountaines, were Bourgeois of Berne. They were Gouvernors or Bayliffs also of that country, which lies nere to the Mountaine of Brunic, and the Lake of Brientz.

It came to passe, that they of the country, accounting the government of these two Lords to be rude and harsh: began to mutiny against them, and after they had called to their aide the men of Vnderwald, who were nere neighbors; they tooke the Castle of Singenberg, in absence of the Lord, set it on fire, and denied the Prouost such duties and tythes, as they were accustomed to pay. They of Berne sent Ambassadors to exhorthem of Vnderwald, not to succour such seditious persons against all right and reason. But they of Vnderwald made no reckoning of this aduertisement, but went and encamped with the seditious at Brientz. On the other side, the men of Berne, hauing required their allies of Solleurre, Thun, Bienné, and Morat to send them succour, and it being sent them; marched with all their troopes to Brientz, gaue battaile to the seditious and them of Vnderwald, compelling them to flight, and retire into the neighbouring Mountaines. They of Vnderwald (flourning at this disgrace) called their confederates of Zurich, Lucerna, Vri, Suits, Zug, and Glaris to helpe them: but they of Berne sent their Ambassadors to those Cantons, offering the iustice & equity of their cause, and to haue it tried before them.

Heereupon, a day was held at Lucerna, where where the Deputies of the Switzers, hauing heard the reasons alledged on either side, commanded them of Vnderwald, to renounce their alliance with them of Brientz. On the same day, the men of Berne made a perpetuall alliance with the three Cantons, Vri, Suits, and Vnderwald. Now, although this alliance is made but with three, yet Zurich and Lucerna are comprized therein. For the three first Cantons bound themselves to succour them of Zurich, & Lucerna whensoever they called them; and to bring with them the men of Berne, who by the same alliance are tyed thereto, if Zurich and Lucerna do desire it. In reciprocall manner they of Zurich and Lucerna, promised solemnly, to go assift (with all their power) the men of Berne, if the three Cantons call them thereto.

The third time of sledge laide to the City of Zurich.

Immediately after this alliance made, the city of Zurich was besiedged agayne the third time. For, Albert of Austria, accused the Cantons before the Emperour Charles the fourth, who hauing heard the answer of the Cantons, made a truce, vntill his returne from a voyage, which hee was constrained to vndertake, about some affaires of the Empire. Being returned, he came to Zurich, where he heard either parties, and directing himselfe vnto the Switzers, especially to them of Zurich, he aduised them to renounce this alliance: adding withall, that the city was Imperiall, and could make no alliance without consent of the Emperour. But the confederates rendred a sufficient reason for what they had done, exhibiting their priuiledges, and making it manifest, that the alliance contracted between them, could not any way preiudice the rightes of the Empire. Seeing he could not driue the Switzers out of this league, then he made his re-course to Albert, desiring him to sell Lucerna, Glaris, and Zug vnto the Empire, because the difference did concerne those three places especially. But Albert audaciously answered him, That he would rather buy some Townes, if the Emperour would sell him any, then let him haue any of his for money.

A proud answer of Albert of Austria to the Emperour.

Once againe the Emperour pressed the Switzers, to suffer him to end the difference, and promise to tie themselves to such orders as he should set downe, assuring them that Albert would do the like.

But the Switzers would not consent thereto, without plaine exception of their priuiledges, and the Emperour vrged his authority, without any refection: by which which meanes, all this long unparlance ferued to no purpose, but only that a truce was taken for some time. Which being expired, the Emperour being incessantly importuned, ioyned with Albert of Austria, and besiedged Zurich. The besiedged (by diuers ambassages) intreated the Emperour, not to presse thus into the house of Austria (sauiour) their city, which was Imperiall: for they desired nothing but conservation of their priuiledges, and would not recēt any composition whatsoever, if it were reasonable.

Then the Emperour began to summon Albert to listen to a pacification; which hee would not doe: in which respect, the Emperour raised the sledge, and returned home. That which also moued him hereto, was, because his Camp stood composed of soldiers, who were (almost all) prest forth of Imperiall Townes and Cities, & (in his opinion) bare more affection to the Switzers, then to the house of Austria, albeit those soldiers during the sledge, would obey none other then the Emperour. After the Emperours departure the duke of Austria also speedily got him gone: hauing heard, that the other Cantons had sent forth supply vnto them of Zurich. Neuertheless, hee lodged his troopes in Townes, Villages, and Castles round about, enioyning them, not to suffer the Cantons to haue any rest, but continually to make incursions on their Lands.

At length, in the fifth year of this war, by authority and intermice of the emperour Charles the fourth, peace was concluded betwene the Prince of Austria, and them of Zurich. Now because it would seeme a troublesome matter, to insert heere the whole Tenure at large; we will be satisfied with a breefe Summary of the Articles, which are these following.

The Emperour ioyned with Albert of Austria.

The siege raised from Zurich by Gods most singular providence.

Peace made between them of Zurich, and the Duke of Austria.

Articles of Peace concluded on, betwene the Duke of Austria and Zurich.

1. W Hattseuer hath bene taken on either side in this Warre shall be restored againe.
2. They of Zurich shall not receive into the

the number of their Bourgeses such as remaine under the domination of the Duke of Austria: but if any will retire themselves to Zurich, they may be receyued. Provided, that they bee of the number of them, which the Citie might receive, before this peace was made.

3 Such as hold any other way then in fee-service, shall be under the iustice of the lords of those Fees. And they which make use of another mans possessions, shall surrender them, or shall stand bound to answer the same in Law: except it be for the goods of the banished.

4 From hence forward, they of Zurich shall not ally themselves with the servants of the Duke of Austria: or contrariwise, they shall helpe to recover his rights.

5 If any difference happen to becomaued, betwene the Duke and the Cantons: It is ordained before hand, that some Iudges shall consider on the cause.

6 Those alliances which the Switzers have made together, shall remaine in their full power and integrity.

There are diuers other Articles in this pacification: but I am onely contented with these, as beeing the principall and cheefe.

It fell out, that diuers interpretations were made vpon this agreement, which likewise begat new contentions: yet they were still qualified, before they came to hand-blows, for either sides purse being emptied of money, and their forces fading, made them unwilling to heare of any more warre. Albert Bucheimer, Lieutenant to the duke of Austria, pressed them of Zug, to give their oath of fidelity vnto his Prince, which they would not do, but with exception of their alliance made with the Cantons, or else to stand acquitted by the sayde Cantons, to whom they had giuen their faith. This difference was referred to the Emperor Charles the fourth, who finally gaue iudgement, that they of Zug should stand exempted from alliance with the Cantons: because (quoth he) the Articles of pacification doe declare, that the Switzers shall not possesse any of the Dukes Townes, neyther hinder any way his government in them.

Now, although this sentence was greatly greuous to the Switzers, considering, that in one of the Articles, the alliances made, were (by name) excepted, and onely ordained, that no new Alliances should be made with the vassalls to the house of Austria: yet notwithstanding, they were so ouer glutted with war, as they werypon the point to leaue Zug to the Duke of Austria, if they of Switz (who had not (as yet) signed the peace) had not opposed themselves against it. They then sodainly gathered their troops together, and went to Zug, demanding againe the faith of the Citizens, who (for their part) had sent their Deputy to Switz to require confirmation of the faith: first giuen. This done, after some long debating and consulting, it was at length concluded, by means of the Lord of Torberg, that truce should be confirmed for the space of eleuen yeares, which was till after the deace of Albert. During this truce, they of Zug and Glaris continued allied with the Switzers, and al that while were thereunto subiect, acquitting themselves of all duties due to the house of Austria. The Duke receiued from Switz a man, from foure yeares to foure yeates, whom hee confirmed Amman or Mior at Zug: And he gaue as Gouernour vnto them of Glaris, Godfrey Mulner of Zurich. Afterward, the truce being expired, it was againe confirmed for a longer time.

The sonne of Albert, named Leopold, greedily hated the Switzers; but he durst not meddle with them, least hee should gaine as little thereby, as his Father had done. And therefore he would worke his will by others, setting the Switzers at variance with the Englishmen, who hauing spoiled the country about the Reine, entered into Swetia, where they did as much harme to the Austrians, as to the Cantons. But hauing bin beaten in some encounters, after they had foraged in Swetia, and all the country about Mombelard, Basile, Strasbourg, and run into diuers other places, they retired home to their own houses, & hapned Anno 1376.

Six yeares after, war was moued against the Count of Kybourg. Hee was enforced to take (by treason) the Towne of Salluerre, allyed with the men of Berne, and at the very same time, they of Austria would haue surprized Dun and Arberg, Townes appertaining to the Canton of Bern. Consequently the Count of Kybourg made made open war vpon them of Salluerre, to whome they of Berne and the other Cantons sent supply. The Duke of Austria, who (so lately before) had made alliance with the Switzers, fortified (vnder hand) the Count of Kybourg, and (contrary to his faith) furnished him with victuals, and other necessaries for warre. Neuerthelesse, the Count was not able to endure the burthen of amity agreed on betwene them of Salluerre and Bern, but sold them Burgdorff, for the summe of forty thousand Crownes.

The Duke of Austria had a difference, in what manner I know not, with the Imperiall Cities and Townes. They made a league, wherein Zurich, Berne, Salluerre, and Zug were comprehended: but the Duke brake all in sunder by his cunning deuices, pacifying himselfe amiably with the Townes of Snaba and Franconia. And as for the Townes on this side the Rhene in Halsatia, hee conquered them in one battell. This victory did so aduance his hopes, as he began to consult with himselfe, how to bring the Townes of Speria vnder his obedience, and the occasion of the warre grew thus. Peter of Torberg, Gouernour of Walhouse, and in the Vale of Entlibuch and Herman Grunenberg, Gouernour of Rottenbourg for the Duke of Austria, who had engaged these places vnto them, tyrantized on the people, and did many outrages to the neighbours of the Lucernians. The people being tyrannically dealt withall, sent men to Lucerne, to desire acceptation into their Bourgeship. But the two Gouernours hauing discouered it, caused the Deputies to be hanged, and all them that had any hand in the matter, recompencing them with death, that had faithfully employed their paines, to giue life againe to their languishing country. Moreover, they imposed new passage Tolles at Rottenbourg on the Switzers, or else they might haue no passage there.

The Lucernians, so much prouoked by so many iniuries, being ayded by the men of Suis, Fris, and Kanderwald: made themselves masters of Rottenbourg, the 29 day of December, in the yeare, 1381. spoiling the Castle, which Grunenberg had forsaken. They did likewise beate downe the walles of the Towne, and filled vpper the Ditches: for feare least the Austrians should lodge any Garrison there, wherewith to molest the Lucernians. Some short while after, they of Sempach were receiued into Fellowship with the Lucernians, & two hundred men were put in garrison by the Lucernians, into the Town of Nichessee: but the Lieutenants to the Duke of Austria, hauing sodainly lequied an Artillerie, took the Towne by assault, cut off throats of the whole Garrison, put most part of the inhabitants to the sword, burned all the rest alive, in the same fire wherewith the Towne was embraced, shewing no pity to aged, sicke women, or children. On the other side, al the Cantons, except Bern, took a place in those parts, named Meyenberg, & there planted a garrison but the Austrians (faigning a flight) drew the Switzers soldiers forth into the open field, where they slew fourescore and one of them, and compelled the rest to retire speedily into the Towne. The Cantons aduertised hereof, called their people together, set fire on the Towne and Castle, leauing not a iote of them vntained.

These beginnings and entrances into warre, seemed to threaten the Switzers with a farre greater confusion: & therefore, they of Austria made their preparations carefully, yet with great pomp, and every day (by Letters and Heralds) denounced warre against the Switzers, at the beginning of the ensuing yeare. The Switzers considered likewise on their owne affaires, and provided to set vpon all those enemies, which had enclosed the round about. The men of Berne, who had not bounde as yet, being solicited by many messages from their confederates: ruined two Castles, to wit, Torberg, and Kopping, belonging to Peter of Torberg. They of Lucerne, Fris, Suis, and Funderwald, spoiled the Castle and Towne of Woolbenzen also Lele, Rinach and Badegg. The men of Zurich ioyned their forces with the Cantons; and after they had made some courses & waste in the countries neere to their limits: in retiring backe, they took (by assault) the Castle of Ramclange, and set it on fire. And because the Duke of Austria made the murdering of his people, especially at Arme & Bada, neere to Zurich: it was imagined, that he would go and besledge that Citie also. And this was the reason, why the

A new variance concerning the Canton of Zug, & referred to the opinion of the Emperour.

Tyrants neuer want execrable and monstrous cruelties.

four Cantons sent sixteen hundred men to succour them of Zurich.

Duke Leopold understanding that such a Garrison was at Zurich, marched boldly with his army towards the Cantons, which seemed then naked of the most part of their troops. But this enterprize was discovered by their spies, & therefore left the city of Zurich, in the citizens guard, and returned back those sixteen hundred men which marched under their Ensigns day and night; and so diligently, that they arrived at Sempach, even at the same instant as the duke came to lodge his troops there. That day was the ninth of July, and battell was given the very same day, wherein Leopold sonne to Albert the wife, and Nephew or youngest child to the Emperor Albert, was slaine in open field, with six hundred seventy six Gentlemen, whereof there were three hundred and fifty more remarkable then the rest by reason of their Helmes and Burganets, beautified with Coronets and goodly plumes. After so faire a victory, the Cantons began to extend their strength throughout all Swetia, and chastised such as hadde forraged their country, pillied the Citizens, & moved Warre vpon no occasion: many castles were ruinated, and many Towns taken.

Truce fully agreed vpon for the space of a year, but being expired new quarrels arose againe.

In the year, one thousand, three hundred, foure score, and seauen, the second day of the moneth of February, truce was agreed on for a year, by the entermise of some Townes. The times of truce being expired, the citizens of Wesem, on the Lake of Rine, deliuered vp their Citie to them of Austria, who slew the Switzers that were there in Garrison. Afterward, the enemy (with great forces) to the number of eight thousand at the least, set vp on the Landes of Glaris the ninth day of April. Some say, that they were about sixteen thousand men, conducted by Donatus Count of Togge, Peter of Tarberg, John of Klingenberg, John Counte of Werdenberg, Lord of Sargans. This last man made choyse of two thousand men, which he brought by Beglinge, to enclose the Switzers, and make them turne their backs with shame.

A bargain made, but without any certainty.

The other marched boldly on towards the Walles, which they of Glaris had fortified and made strong their countries entrance the year before, gaying thereby such assurance of the wall, as the victory was almost intirely in their hand; yet they beganne to pillage, and burne all that was about them. Meane while they of Glaris met together in a neere neighbouring Mountaine, to the number of three hundred and fifty, and thirty beside, which they of Suits had sent from the neere valley. This ouer-little Troope, by greatnesse of corage and resolution, met with the enemy in a verie narrow passage; where they saluted them with such impetuous stormes of great stones, & whereof the place afforded no scarcities, drawing them into a place more open, they pressed and pursued on them with such extreame boldnesse; that the great armie was forced to flight, after they had renewed the charge cleauen severall times, as the Annales of Glaris do testify, for, so often did the enemy labour still to set vpon them.

The Count of Werdenberg, looking from the height of a Mountaine (which hee had betaken himselfe vnto) and perceiving the overthrow of his associates, saved his owne flake, as swiftly as he possibly could. There were two thousand enemies slaine in this battaile, and about five hundred were drowned in the Lake; because the multitude of Runne-aways, brake downe the Bridge in their halte, whereby they should passe from Glaris to Wesen.

After this battell, the Cantons shewed themselves still in many other skirmishes against the Austrians, taking townes and Castles, either by force or composition; but they fought no more battels. For by entermise of the Cities of Constance, Vberlingen, Rauenpourg, & Roselle, truce was taken for seauen years: and afterwards it was prolonged, even so farre as for the space of twentie yeares; and finally, peace was made for the terme of fiftie yeares.

Peace being established for such length of time, brought some more ease & quietnesse to the Cantons. But in the year one thousand, foure hundred and one, the war of Appenzel began, & continued seuen whole yeares. Appenzel is a Region of Swetia, seated neere vnto the Alpes, towards the East, and on the Head of the Lake of Constance. At this day, it is is one of the thirteene Cantons; but as then it was no way allyed with the Switzers: it only acknowledged (as a Lord) the Abbot of S. Gall, who was then called, Cuno de Stroufen. Some difference happened between the Abbot and them of Appenzel, and after it had long time bene debated in Lawe before Iudges; they fell at length to pleade theyr cause at the sword's point. The Townes neereest to the Lake of Constance, did take part with the Abbot, who had sundered them from the men of Appenzel, with whom they were allyed and combined. The Abbot having leuied an army of the inhabitants of those townes, gaue battell to the men of Appenzel, who ouer-came them, droue them in disorder, with great losse of their men.

Townes divided from Appenzel to take part with the Abbot, yet fell in fight.

A new warre happening betweene the Cantons, and Fredericke of Austria.

After this foile, they of S. Gall, of Appenzel, and of Suits, associated themselves together. The Duke of Austria ioynd with the Abbot; but they of Appenzel proued still victorious in all other encounters. And after they had conquered a great part of the country about them, ruined many Castles, and taken diuers Townes: at length they compelled the Abbot to craue peace, & leaue them in their wonted liberty.

Seuen yeares after these troubles were ended, a new warre kindled it selfe, betweene Frederick of Austria and the Cantons. The occasion was, because Fredericke had carried away (from fourth the Council of Constance) Pope John the 22. He was put to banishment from the Empire, and excommunicated by the council. By this decree of the Emperor, and of the Council, the peace for 50. yeares was broken, the Cantons absolved of their Oath, and commandement given them to take armes against the Emperor: which they did, and tooke in that warre hiberlein, nada, and other places belonging to them of Austria.

A war of the Switzers, for the reconceit of Bellizona, from the duke of Milaine.

In the year, 1422. the Switzers ledde their army by the Alpes, and by the Grisons, to besiege Bellizona; it being a Towne which the Count of Montax had sold to them of Suits, Vri, & Vnderwald. The Duke of Milaine seemed to say, that this place appertained to him; and thereupon tooke it by intelligence. To recover it againe, the Switzers conducted their army thither this year, then in An.

no 1425, and the year following also. But they could not take the Towne notwithstanding, they made hauocke, and forraged the Valleys round about neighbouring, and belonging vnto the Duke of Milaine.

But in the year, 1436. they of Austria, by cunning trickes and subtle deuices raised a great ciuill warre among the Switzers. First, because the Canton of Zurich and the men of Suits, to whom (soon after) the other confederats ioynd themselves. The Duke of Austria (first of all) ranked himselfe with them of Suits; and then (soon after) made alliance with the men of Zurich, and gaue them assistance. There were some encounters, and the Switzers besiedged Zurich: but ther was no battaile more memorable, then that which (not long after) was given at Basile, the year, 1444. and the 26. day of August.

The Dolphin of France, who was afterward King, named Lewes the 11. had brought a puissant army betweene Montebellard and Basile; provided partly by the praides of Pope Eugenius, to breake the Council of Basile; and partly by the emperor Frederick, as wishing well vnto the Switzers. Sixteene hundred Switzers entered into battell against that great armie, and made a terrible slaughter of them. True it is, that all the sixteene hundred men were slaine likewise, as being overborne with the meere multitude of their enemies: but they brake the whole armie in such fort, as they forooke all Germanie immediately, to get themselves into France againe. This memorable day, might well be compared with the battell of the Lacedemonians, at their passage of the "Thermopylae", considering the magnanimity of so small a number: who, for the safety of their country (euen all Germany) opposed themselves valiantly, against an infinite of enemies. In these ciuill Warres were made many Truces, which was the cause, why such as haue written thereof, do not agree together in the computation of the yeares. The common opinion is, that this war lasted seuen yeares: but it began in the year, 1436. & firme peace was made and ratified in Anno, 1450.

A year after this peace, the Abbot of S. Gall made alliance with four Cantons of

of the Switzers. And the year following, they of Appenzel allied themselves with seauen Cantons. And again, a year after, the City of Saint Gall, with sixe Cantons. Consequently, and in the year one thousand, foure hundred, fifty foure, the men of Schaffouse allied themselves with the sixe Cantons. But I shall make better mention of these alliances hereafter, and in aprer manner.

Warre by the Switzers, against Sigismund, Duke of Austria.

These alliances were no sooner made but a new warre beganne to shew it selfe, against Sigismund Duke of Austria. Pope Pius had excommunicated him, I know not vpon what occasion, and so incited the Switzers to warre. On the other side, the Lords of Grandler, brethren of Graz, a Towne in Syria, hauing bene dispoiled of their goods by Sigismund, desired ayde of them of Zurich, who had receyued them into the number of their Burgeses. Then the Switzers went and assaulted Winterthur, tooke Rapperswil, Diesfennow, Frauenfeld, and Turgaw. In the end, peace was made, Anno 1460. by the meanes of Lewes Duke of Banaria. Afterward, in the year, 1466, certaine Articles of peace & mutuall amity, were set downe in Writing. Two years after, war was renewed against the Duke of Austria, so that the Switzers led their troopes towards the Towne of Mulhouse, on the Frontiers of La Franche Comté. This Town had made alliance with the Cantons some moneths before: and in the same year, a Towne vpon the Rheine, neere to Basile, named Waltzshut, was besiedged by the Switzers.

Warre of the Switzers against the D. of Burgundie.

In the year one thousand, foure hundred, seuentie foure, began the Switzers warre against Charles Duke of Burgundie. It grew hot, and wonderfull sharp, in the year seuentie sixe, for two battailes were fought, in both which the duke was vanquished; but it tooke ending at the beginning of seuentie seauen, by reason of the Dukes death, who was slaine in Lorraine. The Princes of Austria were the sparkes to kindle this war. For Sigismund Duke of Austria, hauing ill performed his businesse in warre, which he maintained so long a time against the Switzers, was constrained to agree with them, although much against his minde. In the meane while, to torment them by some other meanes, he engaged those Landes which hee helde in La Franche Comté (as Montebeliard and Basile, neighbors to the Switzers) to Charles Duke of Burgundie, the most potent Prince of his time, adventurous, and of an high hand. Sigismund perswaded himselfe, that (as manie times it falls out among neighbours) some difference would shortly grow betweene Duke Charles and the Switzers: for they had sent Ambassadors to the Duke, to pray him renew the ancient amity of the hoise of Bourgongne with the Switzers, and confirme the Articles of peace, not long before concluded with Sigismund, in so much as concerned the engaged countries. But the ambassadors could neuer gaine access to the Prince, in regard of their hinderance by Hagenbach, chiefe Minion to the Duke of Bourgongne, and established Governor by him ouer those countries. This Hagenbach was the principal fire-brand wherby to kindle this war; for he gaue many outrageous words vnto the Switzers, & daily kept company with theyr enemies, as Hendorff, Eptinger, and some other Gentlemen, who had threatened the Switzers with war.

Hee tyrannized also cruelly in those pawned countries, so that the poore subiects who were able to performe no more, intreated most earnestly Duke Sigismund, their ancient Lord, to disingage them, & receiue them againe vnder his gouernement. This request was quickly granted them by Sigismund, a Prince verie benigne, and (for his facility) fir-named the Simple.

But the Duke of Bourgongne desired not to pursue the money againe. And on the other side, the tyranny of Hagenbach still increased, so that hee grev in supportable to the people, & neighboring lords. There were some other troubles between the Switzers and the D. of Bourgongne: because Count Ramon being seruant vnto him, had sent away diuers chariots from them, laden with Hides. In the mean while, King Lewes the eleventh, who desired not greatly the Dukes life, and had proued (neere to Basile) the valour of the Switzers horsemen, made alliance with them. And although himselfe would not meddle with the warre, yet he could whet on the Switzers, and (by vaderhand trickes) furnish them with money, to the end that necessity should not inforce any pacifi-pacification. He accorded Sigismund likewise with the Switzers, and made an Alliance betweene them. Soone after, Rene Duke of Lorraine, Strasbourg, and Basile, with theyr Bythoppes, Colmar, Seldetud, Montebeliard, and some other cities, ioynd themselves likewise into this confederacy.

During this time, Hagenbach was taken in a place, named Brissac, and the D. of Austria hauing configned the money at Basile, for which hee had engaged his countries, re-entred vpon possession of them, and (by sentence) caused Hagenbach to be condemned, and his head publicly smitten off. Contrarywise, Duke Charles made warre vpon the bythop of Cologne, pretending, that the Prouosts Office, or protection of the Bythoprick appertained to him, and therefore planted his sledge before Nass, about Cologne. The Emperor Fredericke, accompanied with the Empires forces, encamped nere vnto him, to fight with him. And, according to right and maiesty of the Empire, sent vnto the Switzers and their confederates, to assault (on their side) the Duke of Bourgongne, that his forces might be broken and scattered. But immediately after, hee shewed himselfe to bee of the house of Austria, and (consequently) an enemy to the Cantons. For so soone as the Switzers were entered into Bourgongne, and had won a battell, and taken some Townes, hee made peace with the Duke of Bourgongne, wherein the Princes of the Empire were comprized, and the Townes which had succored the Emperor in this warre. But the confederates were excluded, to wit, Duke Sigismund; Duke Rene, the Cantons, and the forenamed Townes.

Duke Charles, being deliuered from the warre which hee had against the Emperor and the Germanes: turned all his forces vpon the Switzers, and theyr Allies. There were some encounters on either side: but the very greatest efforts, and valour, shewed themselves in three battailes; whereat the Duke himselfe was present in person. The first was fought at Granson, neere to the Lake of Yuerdan, which (at this day) is called the Lake of Newcastle. This Towne had bene taken by the Switzers, and retaken againe by them vpon composition: neuertheless, the Duke of Bourgongne (contrarie to his promise) hanged and drowned the Souldiers of his Garrison; but (soone after) hee receiued wages answearable vnto his owne perfidie and cruelty, the Switzers ouercomming him in a field of battaile. True it is, that then hee lost not many of his men, for the Caualerie sustayned, and meerey covered the Infantry being broken and disordered, and the Switzers had not their Horsemen there, because they came not at a conuenient time: yet notwithstanding, the Duke of Bourgongne lost his baggage, wherein hee had great store of Riches and Treasure.

Then afterwatdes, there was another battaile fought at Morat, neere to Berne: the Switzers (after a great overthrow of their enemies) wonne the day, and it is sayde, that eightene thousand Bourgongnes lay slaine in the field; and to this day, there is still to be seene huge heapes of dead mens bones, as a credible Testimony of that victory.

The third battaile, was fought before Nancy in Lorraine, besiedged by the duke of Bourgongne: but the Switzers sent in succour vnto the Duke & Rene of Lorraine, (who had sixe hundred men at Armes, well neere all Frenchmen well provided) eight thousand foot, and the other confederates three thousand more. With all these forces Duke Rene gaue battell to Charles, who had many more to attend him: neuertheless, he was overcome, & (in flight) slaine by the Switzers, and so (with him) dyed all this warre. A year after, the Switzers passed the * Leopontine Alps, which mountains is now called S. Godard, & went to giue battell to the D. of Milaine, in a place named Torino. The occasion of the war, was, because the inhabitants of the valley towards Torino, subiects to the Canton of Vni, complained of diuers outrages doone them by theyr neighbours, who molested and troubled them in the vse and possession of certaine Forrests. The Switzers Ambassadors, being vnable to reconcile this difference, the men of Vni, craued succour of theyr confederates, and ledde their Armie to Bellinona. But because they could not besiedge it in regard of the winter: they leste sixe hundred men in Garrison at Torino, which is not farre from thence.

The Milaine's came in great troops, to set vpon the Garrison of the Switzers, which being shut vp in the straites of the Mountains; the more speedily and easily slew foureene hundred of them, and chased the rest quite out of the Valley. This battaile was fought about the third day of Nouember, 1478. And in the Moneth of December following, by the intermed of the King of France, peace was made betwene the Duke of Milaine, & the Switzers. In the same yeare, Pope Sixtus made alliance with the Switzers, and besides other priuiledges, he gaue the also strong pardons. Two yeares after, the Switzers sent seuen thousand men, to aide King Lewes the eleuenth, according to the renour of the alliance before contracted. But they hauing passed so farre as Chalou, the King (who had obtained the height of his enterprife) hauing then no occasion elsewhere to employ them; sent them backe againe with very good recompences: where-with many of them were so earnestly allured, that they strove among themselves; who should first take pensions or wages of the French.

The yeare after, they of Zurich, Berne, Lucerna, Pribourg, and Solleurre, made a particular alliance, because they conceived, that their associates had carried themselves inhumanely on their behalfe, in the war against the Duke of Bourgonne. For the fornamed cities and townes had bin at great charges, as well for conduct of their victuals, as also the carriage of the Artillery: moreover, they furnished more people, then the other cantons did. Neuertheless, when they hold diuide the spoile and booty, which was very great and rich, the cantons that had defraided nothing; neither brought any such number of men, tooke their part of the booty by equal portion. In regard of which iniury (as they pretended) and some other light offences; these cities and townes, desiring to provide particularly for their owne affaires; allied themselves onely together. But the other cantons were hereat greatly offended, especially, they of Vri, Suits, and Vnderwald: maintaining, that it was not law-full for the Lucernians, to make any new alliance without their knowledge and consent.

This matter was debated diuers daies together, in a Councell holden at Stantz in Vnderwald; and finally by the meanes of an Hermit, named Nicholas of Vnderwald (who was then in verie great authority among the Switzers, by their resolute opinion of him, that hee was a holie man) the parties were accorded to conditions, to witte; That the fore-named Townes should depart from that nouell alliance, and altogether (by a common consent) should agree on causes then debated; as that Pribourg and Solleurre, should bee receiued into the number of the Cantons of Swetia, so that there should be tenne Cantons: And because the former eight (which were and are called the olde Cantons, because they allyed themselves together before the other) had made a bodie of a Commonwealth together of the Switzers; for the space of fixe score and fise yeares; or thereabout; I will heere set downe a Summarie of the articles of the alliances which those olde Cantons made; and of that which was subscribed vnto at Stantz by a common consent among the Cantons.

Concerning the alliance of Glaris.

Every Canton is not allied with all the rest.

Vri, Suits, and Vnderwald.

The Lucernians in their necessity.

All the Cantons haue not their rights alike.

A briefe Summarie of the Alliances and Confederations, made betwene the 8. ancient Cantons of Swetia.

The principal & first Chapter or Article of the leagues and alliances, doth concern the aide and succour which one ought to giue another, against such as wrongfully shall assaile them: wherein all things are verie well ordered, gouerned by equity, and according to reason. For, to the end that no warre may be lightly moued, and vpon small or slender occasions; It is first of all obtained, that the Cantons which are offended, shall make knowne the merite of the cause to the Councell in general for that Canton established. And then, if it do appeare, that offence and outrage is dohe, it may demand succour and af-sistance.

In some other alliances, namely, that of Glaris, this knowledge is deferred to other allied Cantons. After that the equity of the cause hath appeared, & the outrage receiued: the Canton interested, may require the Confederates to come and helpe it. In the interim, the Cañon may not make recourse to whom it liketh best; but onely to that which is allyed to it in some especial manner. For (as I haue hitherto shewne) euery one of the Cantons is not allied with all the other. In the first place, concerning them of Zurich, allyed by antiquity with fix of the cheefest Cantons; they may demand ayde of all those fixe. Since then, they made alliance with them of Berne; and so (by consequent) they are bound likewise to giue them assistance, being thereto required. The Bernishmen may call vnto their assistance, them of Vri, Suits, and Vnderwald, by reason of ancient alliance: and they (reciprocally) may cal to their ayde, and for their other confederates the Canton of Berne. But by reason of the new league, they of Zurich and Berne, must require ayde one of another. The Lucernians (in times of necessity) may haue recourse to the men of Zurich, Vri, Suits, Vnderwald, and Zug. They of Vri, Suits, and Vnderwald, may call all the other Cantons. And they of Zug haue the same right as the Lucernians, that is, to require aide from the Cantones of Zurich, Vri, Suits, Vnderwald, and Lucerna. They of Glaris, haue recourse vnto the Cantons of Zurich, Vri, Suits, & Vnderwald.

Now, although that all haue not their rights alike heerein; yet notwithstanding if one Canton require one or two of his allies to come and succour him: all the Cantons must assemble together, because they which are first called, shall giue advertisement to the other. But, aboue all things, they shall send their Ambassadors to the Chappell of the Hermitage, or to a place named Kienholz, and if question bee made of an acte, which concerneth the men of Berne: they must aduise altogether (by all meanes) to appeale the difference in friendly manner, or according vnto right, or (if it may not so bee done) how they may assuredly giue suc-

cour. Their alliance speaketh expressly, that such as are called vnto assistance, shall not vse any fraude or deceite, neither any frivolous or vaine excuse, but to assist with all their power.

And because it may so happen, that a Canton shall bee so sodainly assailed at vnawares, as the enemy may stoppe all the passages, and so (by consequent) the Canton can compass no meanes of crasing succour, neyther by Letters or Ambassadors. For this it is provided and expressly ordained, that in such a case, and when most neede is of speediest helpe: the confederate Cantons, shall assist with all their forces, euen as if they had bene (by name) called thereto. In the alliance with them of Berne, it is ordained; That if the enemy assault the higher countrie, the confederates shall make spoile on the other, vpon the Landes of the enemy: thereby to scatter his forces. And the same to bee done in the higher countrey, if the enemy intrude vpon the lower.

They that are called to succour, shall come at their owne expences, and without any wages. Onely in the alliance of Berne, with Vri, Suits, and Vnderwald, mention is made of Wages, Namely, of a Sal Tournais (each day) for euery man on foote. Neuertheless, if the Warre be in the countrey of Ergow, then they of Berne shall pay nothing. But there is a Village or Hamlet, neere vnto the first Lake of the Riuer Aar, which is called Panderfer; beyonde which, such foote Souldiours as come to assist the one or other partie, shall receiue that aforesaid Wages.

If the warre last of any continuance; and that they must besidge and batter some Towne, Village, or Castle, and the same is fully concluded and agreed vpon, by common consent and aduice of the Cantones: then that Canton, in whose fauour, and on whose limites, the Towne or Castle of the Enemy is besidged, shall pay onely the charge and expences, as well for munition, powder, convey of Artillerie, Pionniers, as all other things necessarie and requisite in a batterie. Neuertheless, if the Warre bee vndertaken, not onlie in the name of one cañon, but ynder name of the Switzers whole Commonwealth:

Y 2 then

No fraud or excuse to be used in giuing succour.

then they shal every one pay their shares alike.

Likewise it comes to passe many times, that some such as dwell far off from Svetia, doth offer wrong to the whole Nation, or to one part in particular; in the meane time, no knowledge is had how to pursue this warre, eyther because the enemy is too farre distant, or keepeth no certaine abiding, where he may bee dealt withall. For such, it is ordained, that if (by any occasion) they, their goods, or any of their complices can bee apprehended on the lands of one of the Cantons: hand shall be laid on them, & they constrained to satisfie them whom they haue offended. Finally, to preuent & hinder, that none shall abuse, or be abused by the Switzers Soldiers, leading them whether they list: in many alliances, the limits wherein some stand bound to succour other, are prescribed and determined. The limits are partly to the Cantons confines, according to their extendure forth, or a little more further out: but they may not passe the ancient bounds of Svetia.

The second Chapter or Article, is touching publike differences or controuersies, between two Cantons or more. Forasmuch as it cannot be otherwise, but the very best friends and confederates, may sometimes haue cause to disioyne & sunder: our predecessours did denie, to stay the consequence of such differences, to wit, that no warre should follow, as fearing lesse alliance and kinnesse might thereby perish, & vterly be broken. First then it is ordained, that the other Cantons shall fend their Ambassadors, to take order, that the variance may amiably be ended, or according to right, and it is established to be administered in manner following. Each party shall chuse two Iudges of his owne Canton, to whom they shall promise by oath, that without any affection or loue to their country, they will iudge on the difference. To these foure Iudges, a fift must be added, named Vnspire or Superarbitrator: who is elected sometimes by the Iudges, and sometimes by the parties. If the one canton will not vndergo iudgement, nor suffer his right to bee examined: the other cantons stand bound by alliance, to succour him that consents, that the controuersie should bee ended by the Arbitrators.

The third Chapter or Article, concerneth alliances. The foure first Cantons do determine, that it is not lawfull for any one among them (without the will & consent of the other, to bind themselves by Oath, or make alliance with any, whofoeuer it is. Likewise, in the alliance of Glaris, it is saide, that they may not make any alliance or confederacie, without consent of the other Leaguers. For otherwise, the other Cantons may referue to themselves, the liberty and authoritie of making new alliances, yet leauing (in meane while) the ancient still in full force. They kept also the freedom, for increasing and diminishing their alliances, by a publike and common consent. And ordained in like manner, that these alliances might bee renewed by writing, or by word of mouth, and to bee confirmed by Oath, if neede required, from five or ten to an hundred yeares. If this might not bee done commodiously, yet notwithstanding, they were to bee obserued firmly.

In the fourth place, are added exceptions; because certaine Cantones, which anciently did concerne the Empire; as Zurich, Berne, Vri, Suiter, and Vnderwald, excepted the Empire, and the rights thereof, from which they pretended no derogation by this alliance, in any manner whatsoever.

Lucerna and Zug, excepted the rites of the Duke of Austria. By the alliance of Glaris, are excepted all rights and deuoirs due vnto lawfull Lords and Magistrates. Likewise, in all these confederations, are excepted the ancient alliances, rights, priuiledges, and customes of the Cantons, together with their Castles, Villages, and Hamlets: so that those rights remaine sound and intire to euerie one.

Now, although the other Chapters and Articles are not of any such importance, yet notwithstanding, they tend to maintenance & conservation of peace and quietnesse. There is one for the punishing of homicides or Men-killers. Hee that killeth any one of the Confederates, shall loose his head; except hee can make good proofe, that hee did it in defence of his owne bodie, and for safetie safety of his life. Whofoeuer shalbe condemned and banished from his Canton, shall stand banished and excluded also from the countries of the other Cantons: and whofoeuer lodgeth or afsisteth any such person, shall be guilty and punished in some other nature.

There is another Article, which prohibiteth the exacting or vrging of names to wit, if any Lay-man attempt to pay himselfe in his debtes, by the name or meanes of Iudges of the Church: onely causes Matrimoniall, and manifest Vltury, are to be referred, and sent to the Court for the Church. No man shall exact a pawne of any one, except of his debter, or him that standeth pledge for him. Neither shall he receiue pawns of his owne priuate authority, but by consent of the Iudge. No one shall engage himselfe for another man.

Concerning iudgements, it is ordained, that each man may haue, & assigne his Iudge. He that shall not appeare according to the assignation, but falleth into default, and interesteth the contrarie party by his absence, shall pay his charges. Causes shall be pleaded in the Audience Hall of the Canton, where the acte makes mention of the deed doing. Iustice is to be done without fraude or deceit. And euerie man shall content himselfe with the iudgements, Lawes, and customes of the Canton, where his cause is pleaded.

Although that these Articles, and other such like, may seeme to bee of small consequence: yet notwithstanding, because thereby (oftentimes) great debates do arise, yea, warres with our alliances, in discourting them distinctly & at large, it contents me (for mine owne part) that I haue thus breely & summarily toucht them.

The Tenor of the Arrest or Agreement made at Stantz.

Ist, we ordaine, that no one of the eight Cantons, either by it selfe, or aided by others shall enterprize to make war on any one of the said Cantons, or any other ioyned therewith in this alliance. Neither shal offer any wrong to their bodies, goods; Townes, Countreys, or people, nor robbe or despoile them of any thing to them appertaining. If any one of the eight Cantons shall do otherwise (which God forbid) and outrage any of the other. To the end it may bee remedied, and order giuen, that our alliance may remaine firme, so that wee may liue together in peace like Brethren: all the other Cantons shall ranke themselves with that which is offended, and conferre the rights thereof, in good faith, and without any fraud. And if some particular person, or many together, shal doe wrong or iniurie vnto some other particular body: that then speedily, and without any contradiction, they shall be chastised by their Magistrate (in what place foeuer it is) according to the quality of the offence, and as they haue deserved. Neuerthelesse, if any one shall commit such insolesces vpon the iurisdiction of another, and moue it to be troubled, answere may bee made him in the very same place, and he iustly punished, according to the right and custome of the country.

Secondly we say, that hence-forward, none shall attempt to make any assembly, and therein to purpose any thing whatsoever (either secretly or publicly) in the Cities, Townes, or Countries of Svetia, whereby any damage or danger may ensue, without making it first known, and with the consent of the Lordes of that Canton. Whofoeuer sweareth, and endeoureth to make any such assembly, or shall fauour it, either by worde or deede, shall bee chastised by the Magistrate, according to the exigence of the act, and that without the least hindrance or delay.

In like manner, and by common consent, we expressly ordaine, that (honour and oath reserved) it shall not be lawfull for any one, to entice the subiects of any Canton, to do any thing derogatorie, to the obedience due to the Magistrate, or moue the people to any disobedience or revolt. And if the subiects of any one of the Cantons, shall bee rebellious against the commandements thereof, that then the other Cantons shall succour it faithfully, and reforme these subiects to their duties, according to the agreement of our alliances.

Of insolescies committed on the iurisdiccions of other men.

The second Article concerneth assemblies or Conuenticles without knowledge & consent of the Magistrate.

For disobedience to Magistrates, or in-fringing their orders and decrees.

The third Article concerning the Military discipline of the Cantons, answerable to that of Sempach.

Thirdly, because that after the battell of Sempach, our Ancestors resolved vpon some ordinances, concerning matter of warre: it seemed good to vs, to explicate in this agreement, that which is perpetuall, euen the principall Article of those ordinances, and in regard of our selues and our successors, to set it downe as followeth. If one Canton or more, do bring an Army into the field, marching with colours displayed against the enemy: all they that march vnder those colours, must continue together for the fight, as honest men ought to do. And according to the example of our Ancestours, what necessity sooner is enforced, be it to fight in ranged battaile, in skirmish, or otherwise, how short or long fouer the time be: it is to be carried according to the orders Military, made after the day of Sempach.

The fourth Article, concerneth matters of contracts passed long ago by our Ancestors

In the fourth place, we haue ordained, that those contracts passed long time since, by our Ancestours, as concerning Ecclesiasticall persons, and other things, in the year, one thousand, three hundred and feuty; shall be obserued inuolubly firmly, and from point to point. And to the end, that the memory thereof may be perpetuall, at all such times as our alliances may be renewed by oath: those two transactions and ordinances, concerning affaires of warre and Ecclesiasticks, together with this amiable agreement, shall be publicly read, among and with the Articles of alliances. But to the end, that young men, and they of meaner yeares also, may the better remember our alliances, and obserue them the more faithfully; we haue agreed, that hereafter (from five yeares to five yeares) the alliances shall be renewed throughout all the Cantons, by oath, which shall bee given for this effect.

For young men and they of vnder age.

The fifth Article concerneth booties conquered in warre, & the ranfomes of prisoners,

Finally, we haue accorded, that when any warre happeneth, all the booty conquered from the enemy, and those sums payed by prisoners for their ranfomes: shall be distributed (by equall portions) among the number of Soldiers, which the Cantons or Townes haue in the Army. But the Cities, Townes, Castles, Countries, passages, anuall reuenues, iurisdiccions, and other things of the same nature, though conquered in warre, shall be equally parted or diuided among the Cantons, according to their ancient custome. If we permit any of these things to be bought or sold to any; the money paid, or arising thereby, shall be distributed among the Cantons by equall portions.

We haue determined and published this louing agreement, and in this manner, that all such as haue or shall carry Armes with vs, all Subiects, citizens, inhabitants, confederates, and parties ioynd with vs, may haue their iust portion in the booties. But as for Cities, Townes, Castles, Countries, men, reuenues yearly, iurisdiccions, ports, and conquered passages: such things doe belong to the Cantons onely. We make exception in this accord, of our perpetuall alliances, intending that nothing thereof shall bee infringed; but that this present transaction shall be inuolubly maintained, yea, faithfully and without any fraud, for the confirmation and manutention of our alliances.

This Arrest was ratified with the consent of all, in the year, 1481. in the house for particular alliances of four Townes: And by common accord, they of Fribourg and of Sollemure, were received into the number of the Cantons. And then the common-wealth of the Switzers (for the space of twenty yeares) stood composed of ten Cantons; whereto consequently, Basile and Schaffhouse, and then Appenzell were added. But before we speake of their alliances, wee must say somewhat as concerning Fribourg and Sollemure: then will we summarily declare, what they did, after their receiving into alliance.

CHAP.

The reason of making and publishing this amiable agreement to generally abroad.

Fribourg and Sollemure received into the number of the Cantons, making them ten.

CHAP. VIII.

Of the Towne of Fribourg; who was the first Founder thereof: And how it came into league and alliance with the Cantons.

The original of the Towne of Fribourg.

Fribourg is a Towne, seated vpon the Riuer of Sans, builded by Berthoull, fourth of that name, Duke of Zerigen, some few yeares before Berne. These two Townes maintained themselves long time in amity: but after the Dukes death, Berne became subiect to the Empire, and Fribourg fell into the hands of the Counts of Fribourg, that dwelt at Bourgdorff, which was the cause, that (by succession of time) they forsook their affection to them of Berne. First of all, they were present in the warre with Godfrey, Count of Rybourg, against the Bernians. Soone after, their friendship was renewed againe, but yet with this exception, that if the Lords of Fribourg were at discord with Berne, the Fribourgers might follow their Lords part, without any prejudice to that louing accord. Some short while after, the Count sold Fribourg sold to the King of the Romane.

Fribourg to Kaoul, King of the Romanes, and from thence forward, about the space of two hundred years it remained vnder the dominion of Austria. During which time, the Fribourgers being conducted and commanded by them of Austria, were present in many fought battailes, giuen to the Bernians at Loupen, at Schonenberg, and elsewhere. Again, afterward they renewed (diuers times) their ancient alliance and amity, with the men of Berne. In the year 1403. after they had bin tormented (in many kindes) by Noblemen, they contracted a perpetuall alliance with the Bernians: and yet notwithstanding, continued subiects to them of Austria. This amity endured forty five yeares, at the end whereof, warre being moued betweene the Prince of Sauiye, and the Fribourgers: they of Berne followed the faction of the Prince of Sauiye, to whom they had bene allied, and stood friends a long time. There were some courtes on eyther side, and a battaile fought neere to Griertz, wherein the Fribourgers had the worst. The year after, the Ambassadors to the King of France, of the Duke of Bourgongne, and of the Cantons, made a peace. And the year following, Albert of Austria being come to Fribourg, some certaine men of the Towne plotted with him, to make warre vpon the Bernians. Matters grew on so forward, that there was some apparance of sedition, and one was ready to run vpon another: the men of Berne (by a singular providence and address) had not appealed the commotion, by the sending of their Ambassadors.

Albert perceiving that Fribourg fauoured the Cantons, and leaned to that side, and that the citizens, who enjoyed the priuileiges of their Ancestors, obeyed not entirely to what he commanded them, and that oftentimes (according to their alliance) they followed them of Berne, and went in warre with the Cantons: he began to lose all hope of remaining any longer Master of the Towne. For this cause, the chiefe Master of his household came to Fribourg (sent by the Prince as some say) where he caused instantly to be noyed through the Towne; that the Prince wold very suddenly come thither, how soone he knew not. Heerevpon, he borrowed and got together, all the siluer Vessels, Tapistries, and such like costly moueables, to adorne that house in the Towne, where it was saide that the Prince should alight and lodge. But (by vnder-hand meanes) the Master of the household, caused those goods to be secretly transported out of the towne.

The day being come, of the Princes appointment to be there, he rode forth with his horsemen, as it were to meet his Master, accompanied with the worthiest men of the Towne. Being farre enough off, no Prince came; but only such horsemen as he had sent before, to attend the Master of the household, and the charge he had. When they were come into a place of security, he saide to them of Fribourg, bourg, who rode in his company to honour the Prince, that for the confidence they reposed, in their league made with the men of Berne, and combined amity with the Cantons: they were rebels to the Prince, and therefore it stood with reason and justice, that the Prince should get what he could from them: as namely, the silver vessels, and the other goods brought from the Towne.

Speaking these words, hee galloped away with his traine to meete the Prince with the spoiles of Fribourg. But the citizens, being thus unworthily handled, made a far stricter alliance with the Bernians, and ioyned themselves also with the confederates, vpon certaine conditions. So that during the warre against the Duke of Bourgogne, the Cantons sent a thousand men for Garrison into Fribourg. And the Fribourgers likewise, were present in the battailes with their confederates, against the Duke of Bourgogne, carrying themselves very valiantly in that warre. Afterward, they were received (with them of Solleurre) into the number of the Cantons, as hereafter we shall tell you.

CHAP. IX.

Of the City of Solleurre, being one of greatest name in Swetia.

Solleurre is one of the most ancient cities or townes in all Swetia. It is called by many, the Sister of Treuer, which was builded (as the ancient Annals doe make mention) in the time of Ninus. The olde Romanic inscriptions, which are yet to be seene at Solleurre, do testifie the antiquity of the city. But by the warres and courses of the Allemaignes, Hunnes, and Francians in Gaul, vpon the declination of the Romanic Empire; Solleurre was ruined, as many other cities and townes were in like manner. But after that the Francians became Lords & Masters, it was rebuilt, and yeelded in subiection to the Bishop of Geneua. For it is said, that in the Church or Temple of S. Vi-

tor, neere to Geneua, these words are found written.

Alta sunt hac regnante Domitiano, Episcopo Genensensi, quo tempore etiam Castrum Salodorense Episcopatus Genensensis subditum erat, &c.

These things were made and done, in the time of Domitian, Bishop of Geneua: during which time, the Castle of Solleurre was subiect to the Bishop of Geneua, &c.

In the times of the Allemaigne or Germane Emperors, Solleurre was daily numbered with the Imperial cities & townes: yet (notwithstanding) in such sort, as the college of the chanons enjoyed the principal priuiledges and franchises. And it is said, that they haue the same rights as the chanons of Zurich.

The Dukes of Savoy were Provoests or Governours of this city, as likewise of other Imperial townes in Swetia. They of Solleurre (in ancient times) made an alliance with the Bernians, I cannot well tell in what yeare; but since that time, the two cities haue borne good and loyall amity together. And (almost) in all the warres the Bernians had: the men of Solleurre euermore succoured them with happy successe.

Vpon the contention moued betwene Lewes of Bauaria, and Fredericke of Austria, which should be Emperor of them both: they of Solleurre tooke part with Lewes, by which occasion, the Pope excommunicated them, and then they were afterward besiedged by the Duke of Austria: But they of Berne sent them foure hundred men for their Garrison. Moreover, they had warre against the Count of Kybourg, who wonne a battaile of the, by treason of one of their citizens. Finally in the yeare, one thousand, three hundred, fifty and one, they made a perpetuall alliance with them of Berne, & continued alwayes good friends with the other Cantons. So that after the warre of Austria, wherein Leopold was slaine; they made peace and alliance with the house

CHAP. X.

Of the Switzers wars against them of Millaine, against the Venetians; and at the conquest of Naples.

War made by the Switzers, against the Millaine.

Succour sent against the Venetians.

They forced the King of France for pay in many places.

of Austria. But it was vpon those famous conditions, that the other Cantons, with whom they were ioyned in letters and contracts of alliance; by generall and common aduice, should establish and sweare them together in the Military ordinances. Then after that the war against the Duke of Bourgogne was ended, wherein they deliuered true testimony of prowesse and valour, in the iudgement of all men; they were accepted and received (with them of Fribourg) into the number of the Cantons.

dred, & ninety, another ciuill warre kindled it selfe in Swetia. The Abbot of S. Gall had begun to build a new Abbey at Rosack. The citizens of S. Gall, they of Appenzell, and the subiects to the Abbot (partly moued by a kinde of deuotion, as vnwilling that the bones and reliques of S. Gall, should be carried any where else; and partly also for their owne profit, fearing lesse the packs of linnen cloth (which grew to great gaine among them) should be transported to Rosack, conspired together, and at vnawares, went out in Armes, and ioyning together in troopes, went to beate downe the new building, which was not (as then) fully finished. The Abbot not a little moued with this injury, called the foure Cantons, wherto he was allied, to aide him. The sixe other Cantons, mediators for peace, exhorted the of S. Gall, to decide this difference with the Abbot, by course of right in law. But because the confederates alledged, that great wrong was done them, in building a new Abbey, and (by that means) abolishing their ancient priuiledges; therefore consequently, they had iust occasion to vndertake Armes, and would not haue it debated in iustice. The foure Cantons with some other people of their allies, brought their troopes to Turgau: but this warre was appealed without blows. For first of all, they of Appenzell made peace with the Switzers, who took from them the Valley of Rheussce. Then afterward, the city of S. Gall being besiedged, peace was made betwene the citizens & the Switzers; by the means of George, Count of Sargans, Gudentius, Count of Meisch, and the Lords of Gentiane. In like manner, the subiects to the Abbot were reconciled, after each one had paid his fine.

Some short while after, followed the last warre against the house of Austria, which the Switzers called, the warre of Savoy; the Emperor Frederick did spread the seeds abroad, but after his death, his Sonne and Successor Maximilian, gathered them together. Frederick had provided, that certaine Princes, Lords, and Townes should make an alliance, which they termed, The great league of Savoy; and (among other matters) to oppose especially (as was conceiued) the liberties of the Switzers. The Emperour was chiefe of this league, which was beneficiall to Germany in one kinde: for by that meanes, the wayes were more safe & assured, the cues were taken and punished, and their castles and places of retreat beaten to the ground. There had bene (long time before) some enmities betweene the Switzers, and some of their neighbours, vassalls to the house of Austria.

Day by day the fire lay kindling, and the Switzers suffered insupportable injuries and outrages. On the other side, they of Austria, grieved the Grisons with nouell charges, and had cast them out of their ancient possessions in some places.

Vpon this occasion, and to provide for their owne security, against the violence of their enemies; the Switzers and the Grisons made a perpetuall league together.

Moreover, King Lewis the twelfth, desirous to recover the Duchy of Milaine, which he auouched to belong vnto him: purchased the amity and alliance of the Switzers, who in such a perillous time, thought good not to refuse it, neither to let for sit and apt occasion slippe them.

Many goings and commings were betweene them, to pacifie this businesse, and the parties on cyther side took arms, in the year, one thousand, foure hundred, ninety nine. Many encounters they had in this warre, and the Switzers still remained victors: except once, when they were put into route, neere to Comstance.

But they recovered their honour againe the same day, hauing freshly recollected their forces, and then giuing battaile to the enemy, enforced him to forsake the place. Moreover, they and the Grisons, in eight other as great encounters as skirmishes, had still the aduantage: as at Mont de Luc, at Treffe, Harden, Erastenz, on the plaine of Malsa, neere to Basile, in the Forrest des Freres, in the vale of Leime; and lastly, at the Castle of Dornach, appertaining to them of Soleure.

They of Austria, being tired and spent with so many losses, came finally to a composition; by the intermise of Lo- dowicke Sforzza, Duke of Milaine, who sent thither the Vicount Galezso. And so peace was made, vpon this condition, that the liberties of the Switzers should remaine in their integrity, and they were confirmed in the possession of all those places which they had taken before from them of Austria. In like manner, the iurisdiction in criminall causes, at the command of Turgaw, which they of Comstance had enjoyed vntill that time, was giuen to the Switzers.

Thus you see the last warre (except that of the Grisons against Iohn Iagues de Medicis, Lord of Mus) that the Switzers had to this present time, to maintain the liberties of their countries, against the violence and force of forraigne Princes. They were afterward present in many other warres, and wonne renouue of being hardy and valiant men: but those warres were made partly in Italy, partly in France, vnder authority and command, eyther of the King of France, or of Popes, or of the Dukes of Milaine. For immediately after the peace made with them of Austria; the Vicount Galezso began to make secretly a leuie of Switzers.

Contrariwise, the King of France demanded succour all openly, according to the tenour of the league, which was granted to him. Notwithstanding, contrary to the will and Edicts of the leagued Lords; Galezso enrolled five hundred Switzers, by the aide of whom, together with an army of Lance-Knights, which he had got together, Duke Lodowicke recovered Milaine.

Soone after that, the Frenchmen being come with a puissant Army to besiege Nouara, the Switzers that were then in Garrison, perceiving it to bee a place, not of defence, nor well munit, nor wherein they could any way resist the enemy; agreed to depart; and repaired home to their owne country. The Duke tooke the habite of a Switzer Soldier; and mingled himselfe among the rest, only to escape: but happening to be knowne and discouered, by a certaine man named Thurman (who afterward was hewed in peeces) he was taken and led prisoner into France, and kept in the Castle of Loches. great wrong to the Switzers, that impure to the whole Nation, the faulte of one man onely. If they will charge all them that were with the Duke, because (maugre his will) they composed with the French: yet (for all that) they must not couple the whole Nation of Switzers, with them in that action. Considering, they that did the deede, were not sent by their Cantons, to succour Duke Sforzza; but followed his faction, against the Edicts of their Lords. Hereto may be added, that they appeared not to be partiall, or hare-brained in the busines, when they departed by composition.

In the same year, when these things were done beyond the Mountaines; Hedrich, Duke of Wirtemberg, made an alliance for twelue yeares, with the common-wealth of the Switzers. In like manner, the Emperor Maximilian renewed the hereditary alliance made formerly by Duke Sigismund, with the cantons of Zurich, Berne, Vri, and Vnderwald. In the year, one thousand, five hundred and one, two potent cities on the Rhine, namely, Basile and Schaffhouse, were ioyned to the number of the Switzer cantons.

CHAP. XI.

Of the City of Basile, and diuersity of opinions, how it receiued that name: As also the originall and antiquity of the City.

HE City of Basile, capitall & cheefest in the country of the Rauracians, is the very greatest of all the cities and townes in Switzerland. It is not knowne at what time it was first of all built. Amianus Marcellinus maketh mention in his history of it, calling it Basilia, and testifieth, that the Emperor Gratian erected a Fort hard by it, to bridle the courtes of the Allemans. There are some other, who do thinke that it tooke name of Basilica, Mother to the Emperor Iulianus Phlegonius, the enfranchised seruant of the Emperor Adrian, maketh mention of Basile, in a little Tract which he wrote of admirable things, and of people that liued long: but it is not well knowne, whether hee meant this city or no, whereof we now speake. But the opinion of them is most probable, that hold the city of Basile to take name, from one of the Romane Colonies, sent by Augustus into the country of the Rauracians, before named.

But Basile is in the number of the free cities of the Empire, and hath obtained (for very long time) very franke and liberall priuileges, from the Romane Emperors. The Bishopricke and Vniuersity encreased the renouue thereof. And as it is a neighbour to the Switzers, so hath it bene likewise very careful for maintaining it selfe in amity, long time before it came to bee allied with them. For after the Pope had excommunicated the Emperor Lewis of Bawaria (in which case all Germany was combuled with great troubles) they of Basile made alliance, and promise of mutual succours, with them of the three first Cantons; and afterward, in the year, 1327. with Zurich, Berne, and many other cities and townes of Germany. In the year one thousand, three hundred, forty five, they made a particular alliance (for 2 yeares) with them of Zurich, and then renewed it for three yeares after. Againe, in the year 1365, by the procurement of Leopold, Duke of Austria, an Army of Englishmen came and foraged the country of Halatia, besieged Strasbourg, and threatened Basile with the same behaviour, because the citizens of the lesser Basile, engaged by the Bishop to the Duke of Austria, would not submit themselves wholly to his will.

On the other side, Basile being not strong for resistance of an enemy, by reason of an earth-quake, which had cast downe the walles and many houses, and fire had consumed and done as great harme: Zurich, Berne, Lucerna, and Soleure sent a strong Garrison to Basile: so that the Englishmen durst not besiege the city, but retired thence, because the Emperor Charles the fourth, also brought an Army against them. In like manner, in the warre of them of Basile, against Katherine of Bourgongne, the widow of Leopold, in the yeare one thousand, four hundred, and nine, the Bernians & they of Selleurre sent succour: the other Cantons imploying themselves carefully, to accord them with the house of Austria. Moreover, at the time of the councill of Basile, when as Lewes the Dolphin of France, brought a great Army into Germany, to breake the councill, and made warre on the Switzers, by the instance & working of the Duke of Austria, who had procured him to come: the Switzers maintained and defended the city and councill, against the encountering of a strange enemy; as an example very remarkable, it being not above sixteen years, since they had cooped with great troops of the French: True it is, that they all (well neere) lost their lives there: but yet they did so weaken their enemies troops, that he tooke part with the which fled fastest.

They being thus auoyded, the men of Basile ioyned their forces with the Switzers, and so made warre together on the Duke of Austria. In like manner, when Charles, Duke of Bourgongne, made himselfe so terrible, and affrighted all the world, they of Basile ioyned in alliance (for ten yeares) with Strasbourg, and other cities on the Rhene. Afterward, with Sigismund, Duke of Austria; René, Duke of Lorraine; and with the Cantons. In this warre they shewed themselves both faithfull & valiant; for their confederates. Finally, a great warre being moued betweene the Emperour Maximilian, the Switzers and Grisons: they of Basile remained neutrals, without giuing succour to cyther side, nor received their Garrisons; but they furnished them both with victuals and munition. In this war there was a battaile giuen (almost) against the walles of Basile, afterward at Dorneck, where the Switzers wonne a faire victory over the enemies, whom they did beat backe to the gates of Basile. But during all this war, the citizens of Basile fauoured equally both the one and other side. To conclude, by the diligence of Lodouico Maria, Duke of Milaine, the Ambassadors on both sides met at Basile, & peace was made betweene the Emperour and the Switzers.

The Switzers allowed well of this expedient, in the men of Basile during this warre, and the Emperour Maximilian (for his part) seemed not to improoue it. But the Noble-men, who were deadly enemies to the Cantons, held Basile (almost) in the ranke of a foe, because the city did not then shew it selfe openly, as an enemy to the Switzers; and not onely the subsidies to the house of Austria, but many more, who till then had beene citizens; with-drew themselves to the Count of Ferrara, and about Mombelhard, into Halsatia, and to Brisgow, countries appertaining to them of Austria. Being in those places, they ceased not to outrage (both with words and deeds) the inhabitants of Basile, who being moued with such indignities, the yeare after the war ended, to wit, one thousand, five hundred and one, made a perpetuall alliance with the Cantons, and so were left in peace with their neighbours, who stood in awe of the Switzers succour.

CHAP. XII.

At what time Schaffoufe was received into the number of the Cantons; and the antiquity thereof.

Schaffoufe, accepted the very same yeare, to be numbered among the cantons, is not of so great age and antiquity. It is seated on the Riuer of Rhene, within Germany, and yet notwithstanding, the Bridge is in Swetia. In the time of the Emperour Henry the third, the Counts of Nellenburg builded there an Abbey, which standeth yet to this day, and it is thought, that it gaue a beginning to the citie: as likewise the cities of S. Gall, Lucerna, and many more in Germany, haue deriued their original from Abbeyes. The Rhene is also another cause of the cities encreasing, continuing so for some thousand of yeares since, beneath the city, where wherewith it is (in a manner) enclosed. It falleth downe from a very great height, with such a dreadfull noyle; and remounting vp againe into the ayre to vehemently, that it maketh there a continuall fogge or myst. And for this cause, and the incapableness of any Boates to passe there, all such as descend downe the Lake of Constance, and from Cella on the Rhene, are constrained to discharge at Schaffoufe, which hath beene conceived by many, to giue that name to the City, to wit, of a Squiffe, or of a Boate, which the Germans call Skiff, or Schiff, thence to be termed Schaffoufe. Neuertheless, the vulgar sort, taking vp a false etymologie of the word Schaff, which signifieth a Sheepe; haue grounded their opinion strongly thereon, and forged Armes also of the same nature. There is a great tole or custome gathered in this City, especially for the passage of Salt: which appertained in ancient times, and before the foundation of the City, to two Noble Families, to wit, of Turn, and of Stad, which remaine yet to this day at Schaffoufe.

At the beginning, the principall dominion or sway of the City, belonged to the Abbot, who elected and chose one halfe of the Magistrates; but (by little) and little, they exempted themselves from his gouernement, and obtained many good priuiledges and franchises of the Emperors. But Lewes of Bamaria (weakened by long warres) could not pay the Duke of Austria, such monies as he ought him, according to an agreement made betweene them, which caused him to alienate and sell Schaffoufe, together with some other Townes, and so (by that means) it became dismembred from the Empire. After that time, Schaffoufe remained subiect to the Dukes of Austria, for the space of fourecore and five yeares, euen vntill the councill of Constance: for then Fredericke of Austria, because hee brought Pope John the two and twentieth out of the councill, was banished by the Emperour Sigismund, who caused him to bee so narrowly pursued, that all his goods were partly pilled, and partly confiscated to the Empire, without any other meanes of helpe.

In this warre, Schaffoufe became reuinited to the Empire, and the citizens (hauing giuen a good summe of money, to the Emperour) obtained great priuiledges vnder Letters patens: and therein was plainly expressed, that (thence forward) their City should not any more be alienated from the Empire. But Fredericke the third, of the house of Austria, being Emperour: laboured to subiect it againe, and that the city of Schaffoufe might remaine to his successors. And therefore hee permitted Duke Sigismund, to compell the citizens to swear fidelity to him; which they refused to doe, but with exception of their priuiledges, and they would not receive the Princes Ambassadors into the city, but vpon that condition. Contrariwise, the Ambassadors pressed them earnestly, to oblige themselves to the Prince, without any exception, and propounded certaine Articles for the maintenance whereof, they required oath: threatening the citizens with very great harmes, if they would not yeelde to that which they demanded of them.

The men of Schaffoufe, seeing the Ambassadors persist still in their opinion: to make good their owne part, received the Switzers Ambassadors into their city, and made alliance (for some yeares) with them of Zurich, Berne, Lucerna, Swits, Zug, and Glaris, so that the Ambassadors of Austria returned backe, and performed iust nothing.

Before this, they of Schaffoufe were in good amity with the Switzers, and from the yeare, one thousand, three hundred, forty five, made alliance (for some time) with them of Zurich. But because they were Subiects to the house of Austria, against whom, the Switzers had (well neere) continuall warres: they could not then entertaine firmly this amity, but were compelled, to go in war against the Switzers, vnder the Ensignes of the Austrians. But after this last alliance, they were very good and faithfull friends vnto the Cantons, and bare them company in many warres and battailes. For immediately after the alliance began: the Austrians came and assaulted the Switzers, and namely them of Schaffouse.

The Cantons made war on Sigismund of Austria, by the Popes command.

The men of Schaffouse accused by Peregrin de Hendorff.

It came to passe, that the Cantons (obeying the command of Pope Pius) made war with Sigismund of Austria, which being pacified, they of Austria took Arms againe, because Mulhouse and Schaffouse had joyned themselves with the Switzers, who ledde a great Army to the Count of Ferrara, and into the quarters about Montebeliard. At the same time, Peregrin de Hendorff accused them of Schaffouse in the Imperiall chamber of Rothuile, and solicited so much, that they were put to banishment from the Empire. Among others, he charged John and Conrad de Fulach, brethren & citizens of Schaffouse, of a noble and ancient Family, who sometimes possessed a Castle, neere vnto the downefall of Rheine, whence Albert of Austria had expelled them, but soone after they entred it againe by intelligence. In regard whereof, they & the other citizens that maintained their iust quarrell, were proscribed. In this war the Cantons sent a good Garrison vnto Schaffouse.

Incurfions made on the Austrians lands, them of Schaffouse.

While these helpes and succours lasted, the citizens made diuers courses into the lands about, appertaining to the house of Austria; as in the Mountaines of the black Forest, in Negow, Kleckow, and other limittrophing lands of Snaba and of Basle. Finally, hauing laide siege before Waldshout, which is a Towne at the entrance into the Blacke Forest, where the Riuer of Ar falleth into the Rheine, and which was vnder the Austrian gouernment, peace was made; wherein they of Snaba were exempted, & stood banished from the Empire, at the pursuite and charges of Sigismund. Thus then the Cantons hauing experimented in these warres, the faithfulnessse of them of Schaffouse, and knowing well withall, what commodities they receiued from such a city, seated in so apt a place on the confines of Suetia; And reciprocally, themen of Schaffouse, feeling themselves to be deliuered from their enemies, by the good assistance of the Switzers; they thought it very expedient, both for the one side and the other, to prolong the alliance. And accordingly, in the year 1479. they made an alliance for twenty five yeares following: wherein were comprehended, the men of Fri and Vnderwald, with whom Schaffouse (still then) had not any particular acquaintance.

The tenour of this alliance, is (almost) answerable to that of the ancient Cantons. For in the first place, they binde themselves to aide one another. Afterward, they establish a forme of iudgement, for reconciling or auoyding such differences, as should happen between them of Schaffouse and the Cantons. Then followeth in what manner debts ought to be paid, & what meanes are to be vsed in such cases. Then for the punishment of homicides, or men-killers. The last Article concerneth the new & ancient alliances, to wit, the one side shall make no new alliance, without the will and consent of the other: And that the ancient alliances shall alwayes be esteemed of most aduantage, & to preceede all the other.

After all this, the warre of Bourgonne happened, and some yeares consequently, that of Snaba, moued by the Emperour Maximilian, against the Switzers. In both these warres, they of Schaffouse did their duty exceeding well, furnishing men and money for the weale-publike: by which meanes, they entred into the good grace of the Cantons, much more then euer they did before, and wonne great honour. Also, the year after the last warre, to wit, 1501. they made perpetuall alliance with the Switzers, and were enrolled in number of the Cantons, obtaining the 12. ranke or roomes.

After that Basle and Schaffouse were numbered with the cantons, and that they were 12. during the alliance which they had made with King Lewes the 12. in the year, 1503. some among them (in great number) went for him in the war of Naples, without leaue neuerthelesse, and against the Edicts of their Magistrats. Naples, vnder King Charles the eight: so their fortune proued little better in this last warre. They, who (during the first warre) were left in Garrisons, in strong places and Fortresses of the Kingdome; dyed of diseases for the most part. Such as escaped in this warre, in recompence of their traualle, brought home to their owne houses, that villainous contagion of the Pockes, which afterward was termed the Spanish disease, the Neapolitane euill, and the French Pockes: At the last war they were overcome in two batailles, and lost a great number of their men. The year 1507. the Cantons sent succour vnto the King, who (by their meanes) made himselfe Master of the field, which the Genewages had planted in a Mountaine, that commanded ouer their city, which (soon after) yeelded it selfe.

The Spaniards brought it first out of the Indies into Christianisme, & bestowed it on the French, at the siege of Naples.

An honorable minde in the Switzers, not to beate arms against their Alie.

The Cardinal of Sion a warlike and capall enemy to the French.

The year 1507.

At the same time, the Emperour Maximilian demanded men of the Switzers, and they promised him a leuée of 6000. men, prouided, that he should not leade them against the King of France, their alie: but because he would not accept this condition, the leuée remained: and was not made.

Soone after, to witte, in the year 1509. the league of alliance between the King of France & the Switzers, tooke ending, and the Emperour, Pope Iulius the 24. the Kings of France and Spain, leagued themselves together, and made warre on the Venetians, wherein the Switzers serued the King of France for wages. The year following, Pope Iulius made alliance with the Switzers, by the meanes of Mathew, Cardinal of Sion, who immediately after the alliance concluded, led fixe thousand Switzers into Italy, vnder pretence of defending the lands of the Church, against the Duke of Ferrara. But his true intent was to surprize and expell the French out of Millane. The Switzers hauing discovered his purpose, would not follow the Cardinal: against the French, and their Lords had likewise forbidden them: so that the Pope sent them into Suetia, without paying them their wages, wherat they were very highly discontented.

In the year 1511. perpetuall alliance betweene the Switzers, the houses of Austria and of Bourgonne, was renewed. On the other side, the Ambassadors of France desired the Switzers to renew the alliance with their King: but the most part of them were displeased, because to soone as the first alliance was expired, the King had denied them all their payes and yearly pensions.

And albeit that a very great number among them, were no found well-willers or friends to the Pope, who likewise had not payed them: yet notwithstanding, fearing lesse hee should extortunuate them, they durst not alie themselves with the King of France, who then was enemy to the Pope. Heereupon, hapned a disgrace to be done them by the French, for they had taken at Lugano, a Herauld of the Switzers, with letters from the Seigneury about him first, they drowned him, and to despight the Switzers, the Coate of Armes, which the Heraulds and Officers to the Cantons vse to weare they fold at open port-sale, or out-criy, as we commonly call it.

The Switzers, in the very strongest of winter, led their Army ouer the Alpes, where hauing burned some Villages, they returned backe againe, without performing any other memorable deed. But the year following, Pope Iulius (who had lost a great bataille at Rauenna, at encountering there with the French) called them to helpe him: and therefore they sent into Italy, an Army of twenty thousand me. They beeing ioyned with the Venetians (then reconciled to the Pope) tooke at their arriual Cremona and Paria, driving the French out of the whole Dukedome of Millane, so that nothing remained to them, but onely the Castle of Millane. In regard of these worthy exploits, the Pope gaue the Switzers the title of Defenders of the Church, enriching their Standards with diuers Images; and publicly gaue to the whole Nation of the Switzers, two great Standards; which they call, Plume, that is, The sword and Bonnet, as a noted mark of liberty. Maximilian Sforza, re-established in his paternall dominion by the Switzers, Federus made alliance with them, and gaue to the Cantons Daguno, Dokarno, Mendryse, and the Vale of Madusa.

He gaue also to the Grisons, their confederates, the Vale Telma or Valturna. Likewise Charles, Duke of Sauoy, whose predecessors had particular alliance (long time before) with some of the Cantons:

The victorie of the Switzers over the French at No uara, very famous.

An Armie of Switzers, by counsel of the Emperor, entered into France thorough Bourgogne.

In the same yeare, the King of France solicited the Switzers, to become agayne allied with them: but because hee would not let free the Castle of Millaine, and some discovery was made beside, that his Ambassadors laboured to corrupt some particulars by gifts, and to buy their voices for faire money layde downe: they were commaunded to depart out of the Leagued countries; and so the warre was renewed again. For the King sent a great Army into Italy, vnder the conduct of the Lords of Trunse and Trimonille, who besieged Maximilian Sforza in Nouara. Hee was then accompanied with foure thousand Switzers, to whose ayde, eight thousand more were sent. Their vanguard being arrived at Nouara, and they within being ioyned with them, they gaue the battell to the French, vanquishing & driving them out of Italy. Guichardin the Italian, an Historian much renowned, writes that the Switzers won such honor by this victory, as many haue made no difficulty in equalling this happy successe of theirs, with (almost) all the braue exploits of the Greekes and Romanes. Notwithstanding, the field was deere enough bought by them, because fourteen hundred Switzers were there slaine, and the most part of them by the Cannon, before that they could come to handie strokes. Which made the people of Swetia to murmur in many places, and all blame fell on them: that tooke part with the French: so that diuers withdrew themselves from Swetia for a time onely, and two only had their heads smitten off in those mutinies and commotions; for the rest, all was well pacified, without any effusion of blood.

After this victory of the Switzers, the Emperor Maximilian, quitting the amity and alliance of the King: aduised the Switzers, to enter France by Bourgogne, with an army of six thousand men; where to (well-neere) sixteene thousande other voluntary ioyned themselves, together with some troopes of horse belonging to the Emperor, vnder the conduct of the Prince of Wirttemberg. There they besieged Dijon, the capitall City of all Bourgonde. But the Lorde of Trimonille, an olde Captaine, being not of strength to defend well the place, agreed with the Switzers, on conditions, that the King should acquit whatsoever he pretended to the Dukedome of Millaine, and paye them (at certaine appointed times) fixe hundred thousand Crowns for assurance whereof, he gaue them foure Lordes of marke, as hostages, with whom the Switzers departed thence immediately.

Nowe, although it was a matter most palpable and notorious to all men: that this composition warranted the kingdom because that Dijon being taken, the Switzers might haue run vp so faire as to the gates of Paris, or ioyned themselves there with the English; and beside that king Leues hadde not a sufficient Army to make head against them; yet notwithstanding, he would not ratifie his composition. For he would not admit (by any meanes) that his rights to the Dukedome of Millaine, should be so much as talk of. The Switzers seeing themselves thus handled, and highly offended with such slye trickes: threatened to kill the Hostages; except the confirmation might be brought within a certaine time. Neuerthelesse, the winter grew extreame vpon them, and yet they resolved to re-enter France in the month of November: But the King sent his Ambassadors, who laboured (by all meanes) to make a perpetual peace with the Switzers. In the meane while, they coule no way ioyned, because the conditions which the King propounded, were so very vnreasonable: which was the cause that the time spent in selfe indayes and deliberations, in meere take and situlous disputes, whereby the enterprise of making into France, was quite broken. Concerning the rest of these meetings and assemblies, they were thus considered on: that in the month of December, the thirteenth yeare, they of Appenzel were added to the Cantons number, and held the thirteenth place.

CHAP. XIII.

Of the Originall of Appenzel: how it tooke that name. The Lawes, Customs, & manner of government there obserued.

Appenzel is the name both of a Country, and of a Village. The country is situated somewhat about S. Gall, betweene the high Mountains, and on the Frontiers of the Grisons country. The inhabitants liue (scatteringly) in Villages, and among the number of them, there are eight chiefe and principal, which haue euery one their Temple or parish church. The maine head of all is the village of Appenzel, whereof all dwel in the chieft town or village, where they buile a very strong Castle, named Claux: the village was therefore cald Appenzel, which in Latine is, Abbatis Cella: that is to say, The Chamber or dwelling of the Abbot.

The people of Appenzel aimed at liberty, first by armes, and after peace made, they bought liberty for themselves & their children, by meanes of a great sum of mony, which they paid to the Abbot. They had wars which continued seuen yeares, against Cuno de Stouffen, Abbot of S. Gall, to whom the townes about the Lake of Constance, and belonging to Frederick D. of Austria, the bishoppe of Constance, the Count of Wirttemberg, & many Counts & Gentlemen gaue succour. Yet they of Appenzel would not yeeld themselves for all this, but being ayded by the Citizens of S. Gall (who, at the beginning, were partakers with the Abbot, but afterward ioined with them of Appenzel, won some battels, tooke fixe Townes, and more then sixty Castles, part whereof were quite ruined. In this war, they leagued themselves with the Switzers, who were enemies vnto the house of Austria. Some say, that they allied themselves with Suits and Claris onely; but others doe maintaine, that it was with Lucerna, Vri, Suites, and Vnderwald. This Warre tooke ending in the yeare, 1408. and by meanes of the Emperour Rupert, agreement was made betweene them of Appenzel and their enemies, in the City of Constance.

This being done, the men of Appenzel framed a forme of government to themselves, which yet they hold vnto this day. For till then, each village had her ensigne, and her estates apart, or by it selfe. Now there was but one Ensigne, one assembly of their estates, and one Councell, composed of the most honest people, and the notablest persons in all the Villages throughout the country. Then three yeares after the peace was made, the Abbot of Saint Gall attempted a new suite against them: but then they made alliance with Zurich, Lucerna, Suits, Vnderwald Zug, & Claris, which so offended the Abbots of Saint Gall, as, about the yeare one thousand foure hundred twenty five, Henrie Manndorff (then Abbot) preuailed so far, that they of Appenzel were proscribed by the Emperour, and excommunicated by the Pope. Banishment was no great hurt, or inconuenience to them in any manner whatsoever, because the country (being round engirt with Mountaines, and not Trafficking almost with any bodie) no inuasion could bee made vpon them. As concerning the excommunication sent from the Pope, they resolved in an assembly of all the country, not any way to care for it. And therefore they expelled all the priests (that obserued the command of the Pope) out of their Country, and would not permit them to administer the Sacraments: amongst all which they killed but one.

The Abbot of Saint Gall, perceiving that this course did him not any seruice; and that (on the other side) the men of Appenzel ranne verie fiercely vpon such, as durst teare them to bee excommunicate, and ruined the Castellles of manie Gentlemen. Finally, by helpe of the Bishoppe of Constance, and the Noblemen of Swabia, hee accused them before the Electours of the Empire, imploring theyr helpe and aide in this extremitie. The Electours sent to the Switzers, and to their league with the Switzers.

the Citties of Suaba, that they should bring them of Appenzell vnder obedience. But the Switzers would not make any war on their neighbours and fellow citizens: but rather laboured to make peace, which was agreed on foure yeares after this ex-communication, the men of Appenzell hauing bene (before) ouercome in two encounters, by the Count of Toggenbourg.

This peace lasted not long, for the Gentlemen, neighbours to Appenzell, about the Lake of Constance, assembled a great number of horsemen, wherewith to invade them of Appenzell. But they disappointed their hope, and got before them; possessing themselves of Rineck, & of the Vale of Rheynse, in the year, 1445. The Lords of Hagenwill, who helde that country in pawne or pledge: caused them of Appenzell to be censured with banishment, by the Imperiall Chamber established at Rottnille. But gaining nothing by the bargain, they sold them their right, for the summe of fixe thousand crowns, and tooke off the censure. In the year, 1452. they made perpetuall alliance with seauen of the Cantons, and (after that time) ioyned themselves with the Switzers, in the warres against the Dukes of Austria, of Bourgonne, and the league of Suaba, wherein they shewed themselves both faithfull and valiant. Afterward, in the yeare, 1513. they were receiued into the number of the Cantons.

CHAP. XV.

Concerning the alliance made betwene the five last Cantons; And a breuiate of their Articles, binding them together in confederacy.

ALL the latter cantons, except Basle, long time before their receiuing into this ranke, were allied to the other ancient Cantons, and then afterward, at sundry times they were receiued and numbered with the cantons, according as wee haue noted already.

Now those Cantons doe hold this right about their confederacies, that they deliberate, and giue aduice in their dayes of consultation, for all occasions concerning (in common) the common-wealth of the Switzers. They haue a share or part, in all commodities and discommodities of the commonalty. They gouerne (in equall authority) all the Baliwicks by them obtained, and partake equally and publicly, all booties gotten in warre. For the rest, the Articles of alliance of the old Cantons, and latter with the first, are almost alike.

The first and principall Article, concerneth mutual succour or assistance, wherein there are diuersity of clausies. The Cantons which shall be called, ought to succour their associate or companion, without any fraud or delay. If a Canton beso suddenly engirt by the enemy, as he cannot call the other, neither by Letters nor Ambassadors; yet shall not they forbear (for all that) from giuing succour, and in as speedy manner, as if they had receiued expresse aduertisement. If the latter Cantons doe conceiue, that a wrong is done vnto them; yet notwithstanding, they shall moue no warre against any person, without the will and consent of the olde Cantons. If their enemies will debate their cause in iustice, and accept the Switzers for their Iudges, or others of equall and indifferent iudgement: the Canton may not attempt to pursue his right by Armes. Euery one of the Cantons, at their owne charge and expences, shall come to succour the other, and send such numbers of men as they would haue, and according as they shall see it commodious, wherewith the other Canton must content it selfe. In like manner, the limits are prescribed, wherein the auncient Cantones stand bound to send helpe to the new: And the limits are the confines of the Cantons, as they then stand. There is likewise mention made, concerning charges and expences, at the besiedging and battering of Townes and Castles. And the Lawes agreed vpon at Stantz, touching the partage of booties, which also are hereine confirmed.

Moreover, there is mention made, concerning actions in cases of iniuries betwene particulars, and what Iudges they are to take note of in that kind. Then for the exadging of names: Concerning commerce, and free Traffike, and what bargaining ought to stand free for buyers, as well on one part as the other. That no Canton shall receiue the citizens and subjects of another Canton: till they be first left at liberty, by them vnder whose dominion they were before. That the new Cantons shall not make alliance with any whose euer, without consent of the olde Cantons. If war is moued betwene the old Cantons, the latter shall remaine as newters, and labour onely to agree the parties. Each Canton shall keepe his or her ancient priuiledges, rights, and customes in their true integritie.

Behold the principall conditions of the latter alliances, wher namely it is decreed that the new Cantons shal not moue any warre, without aduice of the old, neither refuse that which is right, nor any honest condition of the country, and other such like things, concerning warre, are established fully. And because that the most part of the latter Cantons, are vpon the limits and euen out (as it were) of Suetia; they ordained, that no one shoulde attempt to make any warre, except it were for some matter of very great importace: and so much the rather, because it is very hard to conduct and maintaine an army in those quarters.

CHAP. XVI.

Here we are to speake of the Switzers wars in Italy, when the French undertooke to recouer the Dukedome of Millaine, &c.

The death of Lewis, the 12.
K. of France,
after whome succeeded Frances de Valois.

IN the yeare of our Lord, one thousand, five hundred, & fixtene, King Lewis the twelfth dyed. He had newly fought by his Ambassadors, the amity and alliance of the Switzers. Neuerthelesse, in the meane time, he made great preparation for war, pretending to recouer the dukedome of Millaine. Frances de Valois, his kinsman, and his sonne in law, came after him (as successor) to his crown, who following the deliberation of his father, had also his minde and eye fixed on the Millaineses. The Switzers (on the other side) allied with the Emperour Maximilian, Ferdinand King of Spaine, Sforza Duke of Millaine, and with Pope Leo the tenth: vndertook to defend Millaine against the French. Wherefore, after they vnderstood the King of France his preparation they sent (at their first leuy) six thousand men to the Duke of Millaine. Afterward, the tenth of Iune, they made another leuy of 13000. men, which they sent also to ioyn with the first.

King Frances passed ouer the Alpes in the meane while, by vnaccustomed waies, shunning the Garrisons of the Switzers, which were vpon the vsuall passages, and entered into Italy, with an Armie verie potent, of French and Germaines. This was the reason that the Cantons sent twelve thousand men more thereto, so that the campe of Switzers onely, consisted of one and thirty thousand men. Now, although the Kings troopes were well provided and resolued, yet they would not hazard any thing, nor set vpon so great an Army of Switzers as being such indeed as hardly (at any one time) had so manie euer before bene in the field. Hereupon by their Deputies, they began to treat on peace with the Colonels of the Switzers: who likewise (for their part) were not far off from it in disposition, because they considered, that their confederate princes did not march on roundie with them.

For first of al, their wages was not paid them, according to promise. Moreover the Emperour had not sent his companies of horsemen, as he stood bound to do by the confederacy. And contrarywise, he had not prohibited the Lance-Knights (which hee might haue done in regard of his authority) from going in seruice with the King: but suffered them (by troopes) to depart from Germany, and enter into France. Finally, although the forces of the Pope and King of Spaine were nere-

yet notwithstanding, they could hardlie be perswaded to passe the Pas, and ioyne themselves with the Switzers. Beside, there were messengers gooning and comming betweene the French and them, & from them to the French. Wherefore, the Switzers seeing themselves without money, and forsaken of their Confortes: made peace in the village of Galleras, with the Deputies to the King of France, vnder honest conditions. Which having bene confirmed by some Cantons, immediately twelue thousand Switzers took their way to Como, and returned home to their country, without carrying for the rest, who likewise prepared to depart the next morning. But the Duke of Milaine would not accept the conditions of this peace; and the Cardinall of Sion, (a great and perpetuall enemy to y French) laboured by oblique means, to breake & frustrate all.

It came to passe, that by cunning tricks and plottes, the thirteenth day of September, the Switzers of the Guard to the Duke of Milaine, and some others beside offended with the King, in the night time brake in vpon the French, sending worde instantly to aduertise their companions, in what danger they were, and intreated their present succour. The other, imagining that it would be a great shame vnto them, to forsake their friendes in such a neede, and being made to beleuee with all, that the French had begunne this broyle, went with all their troopes to assist them. The fight was very sharp on all sides; but the night parted them. In this charge was slaine Frances, the Lorde of Bourbon, the Lord of Imbercourt, also the Count of Sancerre, the Prince of Talemond, sonne to the Lorde of Trimouille, the Lords of Bully & Amboise, and manie other: which made some to holde opinion, that the Switzers were Maistres in this conflict, and a brute ran thorow Italy, that they remained conquerours. But the very same night, the King having mounted his Artillerie on their carriages, leuelled the battalions of the Gascogins and Germaines, re-assembling the horse-men vnder their Regiments, and sending Bertelmeo d'Aluiana with the Armie of Venetians: very early in the Morning, he gaue battaile to the Switzers, whom he vanquished, after they had lost manie of their men.

The Switzers seeing the victory in a contrary hand, withdrew them-selves to Milaine; yet in such fort, that their retreat fauoured not of fight. For, they brought backe the Artillery which came out of Milaine, and marched in ranke of battaile, hauing their wounded Men in the middle among them, and going but a very softly pace: yet in all the French Army, not a man, eyther Horse or Foot, durst pursue them. On the morrow, hauing lesse the Duke of Milaine fiftene hundred men, to strengthen his garrison in the Castle, they returned into Spretia, by the way of Como. But, by reason of their feile, the French recovered the dukedom of Milaine.

The Emperour Maximilian contested hardly to take it from them againe, & the yeare following, he ledde into Italy (to effect that hope) an army of Germans and Switzers; but he could doe nothing, and so was glad to come backe again immediately. As for the King of France, hauing well felt how deare a price this victorie cost him: he neuer ceased till hee hadde made peace and alliance with the switzers in the end. Perpetuall peace, betweene the French and the Switzers, was made in the yeare one thousand, five hundred, and eightene, the last day of November; and the alliance was confirmed three yeares after, to wit, in Anno one thousand, five hundred, twentie and one. The Articles both of the peace and alliance, are set downe in their due place, heereafter following.

Alliance with the K. of France.

Certaine reason why the King of Zurich refused to be allied with the King of France

The men of Zurich were peacefully minded, and little giuen to warre.

nestly sollicit by the rest, to ioyne in this league with them: yet for all that, they could neuer bring them to the point of yielding to this alliance. In the first place, the yeares going before, Mathew, Cardinall of Sion, who came verie often to Zurich: by his Orations and perwasive speeches, had wholly estranged them from the French. On the other side, Huldreich Zuinglius, being then a principal minister at Zurich, in his ordinary preaching and Sermons, ceased not to turne the people, from taking wages to goe in warre seruices. Shewing by arguments & remonstrences of great weight, that it was not lawfull for a Christian man, to fet himselfe to sale for a price of money, and go shed the blood of such as are (offensively) innocents, and neuer did him any manner of wrong. He sayd, they ought to follow the manners of the ancient Switzers, who (by their manhood) had planted liberty in their country. All which while, they wholly estranged themselves from such course of liuing: their liues were maintained by their traffick; neuer binding themselves vnto any Prince, neither hadde they any freedome that was up be sold.

And as hee had words & reade at command, so hee approved by great store of found reasons and arguments: that such alliances did but enserue & mercerly prostitute the liberty of the Switzers to forraigne Kings and Princes. So that the men of Zurich, being (otherwise) people of peace, and little addicted to martiall affaires, were much moued with his speeches, and abhorred this new League. On the other side, the Capitaines that hadde bene in the warres in the time of King Charles the eighth, and Louis the eleuenth, dissuaded them from the league, as being farre vnlike to the alliances with former Kings. For in precedent times, after that the Switzers had well vnderstood & comprehended the occasion of the war; they made choise of such Capitaines and soldiers as they should send to the King, according to their promise. But the Newe League, the Cantons neither choise Capitaines nor Soldiers, neither cared what became of all, what the occasions of the warre were, nor whether they were iust, or no. But, if the King were to deale with any people, hee choise such Capitains of the Switzers as himselfe pleased, and caused them to come whether he thought good. By which means, the Cantons had not any power ouer their Men for warre, except they might counter-mand them, when any warre was moued in the country.

Moreover, many saide, that this newe League was contrary to the ancient and perpetuall alliances of the Switzers. For, in the first Article they stand bounde, to guard all the Prouinces of France, against all enemies whatsoever they are. True it is, that the first alliances were exempted; but immediately is added, that if the ancient allies begin to make warre vpon the French, the Cantons ought to send succour to the King, against the other whereon ensued (as it seemeth) that if any one of the Cantons, or of the Confederates, could not haue reason (in friendly manner) of the King of France, and would pursue his right by Armes: the other Cantons are bound to warre on him, according to the new League, and contrarie to the promises of the ancient alliances.

Moreover, it is not any long time, since the Switzers denied their troopes to the Emperour Maximilian, alledging for their excuse, because he would haue had them serue at his Coronation: that they were occasioned (for many reasons) to keepe their men of warre (as then) at home in their owne country. Therefore it appeared to them vnto this, that they should then allye themselves with the King, who would make a League of them, so looke as the alliance was concluded.

They continued also, that it would be farre off from their ancient grantie and magnanimity, if they should league themselves so strictly with the King of France, of whom (but a yeare and an half before) they had written vnto the Electors of the Empire, that it was no way expedient that he should gouern the affaires of Germany: so that if he should be elected Emperour, they were not minded to giue him obedience. And, as concerning the commodities of the alliance, which many did make lowd proclamations of there were others of opinion, that the profite would fall into some particular purses, and especially of such, as enriched themselves by the pensions of France; but the Commonmonwealth of the Switzers would be no way benefited by the bargain, as very easily was to be proved.

For in the first place, the country had no need of any strange horsemen or infantry, having work enough to doe in nourishing their owne breed for that employment. Moreover, the hope of helpe, and money from France, robbed the Switzers of all their true force and courage. In following the example of their predecessors, they were best to let their hope leane and rest vpon God, to serue and honour him in sincerity of heart, and vprightnesse of conscience. That not onely hope in God, would faile and diminish by such a League, but also it was to be feared, that it would very strongly break and corrupt their ancient manners, cause all husbandry to cease, giue ouer honest trades and exercises, and engender nothing but idleness. And then is easily known what followeth: dissolution in diet and apparrell, drunkennesse, whoredomes, adulteries, thefts, and blasphemies. For these are the fruites of warre, and the Arts that are learned in the armies of strange Princes.

The fruites of war in forraign Princes serui-
ces.

For a small conclusion, the euent and successe of precedent alliances, haue both instructed and guarded many (especially the men of Zurich) to weigh well & consider on nouell combinations. For, albeit that some fewe did sufficient seruice to the nation, as that which was made against the Duke of Bourgogne: yet notwithstanding, the most part of those alliances, brought it into great extremities. Because in such strange wartes they lost many of their people: or els in those contentions, they were rudely hurried and agitated, by factions and seditions. For these reasons, and diuers other considerations, the inhabitants of Zurich could not (as then) be induced to ally themselves with the king of France.

But the other confederates, who were not of any such opinion, maintaine what they did, by reasons enow. First, they declared, and would proue it, that euery voyage in war was not condemned by the word of God: but that many holie persons had made wars; wherein they were ayded and succoured by others, as in like manner they had assisted their Allies. Secondly, that the war of the Switzers was not mercenary nor vendible; because they went to the seruice of a King onely, (with whom they were ioynd by an honest alliance) with the will and consent of their Lords.

Thirdly, that if the King should moue a warre, which all men knew to be vniust; then it remained in the power of the Lords of the Leagues, to deny him succour. But if the occasion were doubtfull and vncertaine, the souldier had nothing to doe to make any curious inquisition thereof: it only appertained to the King and his Councell, to render a reason for it. Fourthly, that the Switzers Countrey was greatly peopled, but narrow, hard, & barren in many places, and could not furnish so many men with nourishment: wherefore the commodity was not to be condemned, which the King had offered voluntarily.

To these we will adde, that the Switzers ought to consider, with what neighbors they were enclosed, from wherof enuyed them, and others pryed into their Liberties: so that it was both well and wisely done, to fortifie themselves with strange succour against them, and that trust and hope in God, did not prohibite the vie of humane assistance. Also, this was a means to traine vp the Switzers in martiall discipline, which is necessary for all Commonwealths: and in regard whereof, warlike people haue euermore bene highly respected. Finally, although that some alliances haue discommodited the Countrey; yet notwithstanding, the Switzers haue sped well in the more part, especially in those which they had with the kings Leues the eleuenth, Charles the eight, and Lewis the twelfth. And therefore they must needs expect a happy yssue of this which they contracted with a King powerful & fortunate.

This was the discourse then made concerning alliance with the Frenches I learned of my predecessors, which liued in those times. The selfsame question hath bene often and seriously debated & handled, euery in my time, by men well grounded in the Maxims of State, to whome (as yet) I referre the further knowledge of the case.

Now we will discourse of the associates of this Commonwealth, according to the same order: and we will heere shew, wherefore, when, and vpon what conditions they allied themselves with the Cantons. The City of S.

of one Gallus,

of Scotland.

Gallus, of whom the city of Saint Gall hath taken name, was a Gentleman of Scotland, and Disciple or Scholler to an Abbot, named Colombanus, with whome hee came into France, and thence transported himselfe into Germany, to a place called Tuggen, neere to the Riuer named Limagne, at the mouth of the Lake of Zurich. There he preached the Gospel with great zeale and affection, to the people of the Countrey, then bewitched with diuers kindes of Idolatry. Hee continued (soone after) at Bregents, at the mouth opening of the Lake of Constance: next, at Arbonna, and in diuers other places of Swetia, for the space of sixteen years, or thereabout. Gonzo Duke of Snaba, hauing called him to bee Byshoppe of Constance, he would not accept that charge: but counselled the Duke to giue it to one of his schollers, named Iohn, whom hee thought to be more fit for the place. As for himselfe, about the yeare six hundred and thirty, he retired into the Mountaines, about the Lake of Constance, into a solitary place, and in the very same plot or square of ground, where the Citty and Abbey of S. Gall now standeth: hee builded a little Cell or house, wherein he spent the rest of his dayes, with some of his schollers, in the studye and meditation of holy matters.

After the death of S. Gall, his schollers liked well to liue in that place, and according to his manner of life: neuertheless, without making profession then of any certaine rule or order. But the Kings of France, and the Dukes of Snaba, taking delight in their deuotion, did them many kinde Offices: where by the number of these religious men encreased, & (by little and little) the small filly house of Saint Gall, became conuerued into an Abbey. For fourescore yeares after the death of S. Gall, they requested Counte Bertrand, Gouvernour of the countrey for the Kings of France, that hee would giue them an Abbot. He sent them a Priest, named Omer, bred and brought vp in a Colledge, called Caire of the Grisons, and towardes Pepin, Prince of France, sonne to Charles Martell: who following the aduice of his father, established this Priest the first Abbot of Saint Gall, and then (first of all) the Monkes made profession of the rule of *S. After that time, the abbey became verie rich and powerfull, so that the Abbot of that place, was sette in number of the Princes. And in ancient times he was vnder protection of the Emperours, who tooke the Gentlemen of Snaba to be Gouernours of this abbey. Afterward, warre being kindled betwene the Abbot, and them of Appenzel: the Monkes well perceived that their Conuent stood in neede of some good Protectours, because the Townesmen or Citizens of *S. and reprooued his aduersaries very stoutly. This association endureth yet to this day, and although al the Cantons are not at agreement with the Abbot; as concerning matter of Religion, yet notwithstanding, according vnto the articles of alliance, they send him a Capitaine, who manageth and gouerneth ciuill causes, conseruing (in this regard) the rights and priuiledges of the Abbot.

CHAP. XIX.

Of the Towne or City of S. Gall.

THE Cittie of Saint Gall, oweth her original and encreasing to the Abbey, and hath bene enfranchised by the Emperours, who vnto it to the Empire, and gaue it many priuiledges and immunities. In the time of the Emperour Arnould, the citie began first to be enclosed with walles: as fearing the courtes and surprizals of the Hungarians, and both it and the Couent were vnder the Empires protection. The citie was subiect vnto the Abbey in many things: meane while, the citizens had their rites, which they augmented by their industry, & by means of the Emperours liberalities.

The Abbey began and created the city of S. Gall.

Wealth and ease were the first causes of strife & civil contention.

Now, when the number of citizens, and the riches of the Abbey beganne to increase: many debates and contentions also tooke Original, betweene the abbot and the citizens. Oftentimes, the Townes round about it, and the Imperial chamber, would set them at agreement againe. Sometime likewise, they were glad to satisfie the Abbots demands with money, and encreased their liberties, by buying their rightes of him. But when they of Appenzel moued warre against Abbot Cuno de Stouffen, the men of S. Gall beganne to take part with the Abbot, and got nothing for their labour but blowes, vvhich caused them (soone after) to make alliance vwith them of Appenzel. This vvarre being ended, and some other after, Abbot Landberg being made a fellow-Bourgesse vwith with foure Cantons: the citizens of S. Gall, to maintaine themselves by the like expedient, entred perpetual alliance with Zurich, Berne, Lucerna, Suits, Zug, and Glaris. This alliance was sworne on the Eue of S. Iohn Baptists, in the yeare, 1454. And they of Saint Gall made a publicke banket for the Ambassadors of the Cantons, wherat were present about fiftene hundred men. Before this alliance, they were leagued with some Cantons for certaine yeares: as with Zurich, Constance, and Schaffouse, in the yeares, 1312. and 1347. And at other times often with Zurich and Constance. Afterward, with Zurich, Berne, Vri, Suits, & Vnderwald, in the yeare 1329. But I haue purposely omitted those alliances made for so short times, contenting my selfe onely with this last mentioned, which continueth to this day

CHAP. XX.

Of the Leagued Grisons.

IT is generally agreed on that the people of the Grisons are very ancient. For some ages before the birth of our Saviour Iesus Christ, the Tuscan being driven from their houses by the Gauls, they possessed the Alpes, vnder conduct of their capitaine, named Rhatius, for whose sake they called themselves Rhatians. Heretofore this country extended it selfe greatly in length & largenes, so that the Romane Emperors made two Rhetian Prouinces, named the first & second Rhetia: which comprehended not onely the Alpine regions, but also a great part of Snaba & Bauaria. Now it is well knowne, that this first Rhetia beginneth at y^e founte of Rhaine, & taketh a sufficient great quarter of the Alpes, and all the valles on both the sides. Almost all the people there are (to this day) called Grisons; and in former times they were tearmed Gris: as likewise the Almains gaue them the same name, & call them beside, Graw Wunder, that is to say, Leagued Grisons. For, in regard that these Rhatians are Leagued, not onely with the Switzers, but also among them time, we call them Leagued Grisons, & som times the Switzers names them simply, Wunder, that is, Confederates.

We are to obserue three leagues of the Grisons. The first tooke name of her antiquity, and of the situation of the countrey: for they called it, The High League, or high Grisons. It containeth nineteene Communities or Fellowships, among whom (heretofore) the Abbot of Dissentis, and the Baron of Rhatia, & the Count of Misauk held the cheefest ranke: but the families of the 2. latter are expired. Neuertheless, among them in common, they which possesse the Castle of the ancient Barons of Rhatia, are called Lords of Rhatians, a title which (some short while after) the Lords of Maribere took, and after them, they which are named Planters. They of Tauferscher, Luiner, and Mafaxeral are the principall people of this league.

The second is called, The league of Gods house. I thinke it to be so termed, because the bythop of Coire is comprized in this league. It also comprehendeth nineteene Communities; two whereof doe speake the Germane Language; the other, v^e the Rhetian or Grison, which is their mother tongue, & cometh neere to the Italian. The principall people of this league are the city of Coire, which is the bishops See. Also they of Fregual and of Engadin, out of which countries run two renowned riuers, to wit, Esch and Inn.

The third league hath ten Communities, and is called, The League of ten Iurisdiccions. Therein are comprized them of Rhuchenberg, and of Tunlesch. The former two leagues had (at the beginning) amity and alliance a certaine time, vwith the Cantons neerest to them. For, in the yeare, 1419. the bythop, the Chapter, & the citie of Coire, made Alliance vwith them of Zurich for one and fiftie yeeres. Also, they were sometimes allyed vwith them of Glaris. And the Grisons of the high league, wer long time confederated with them of Vri. Then after, with them of Gods house they made a perpetual alliance vwith feauen of the Cantons. But the thirde League is not comprized in this alliance, and yet notwithstanding do entertaine this amity and society with the confederates, euen as firmly and faithfully, as if they stood solemnly bound thereto.

First then, in the year 1497. the high league, more properly called, The Grifon league, made perpetuall alliance with seauen Cantons: and the year following, the league of Gods-house ioynd it selfe with them, by this occasion following. Some years before, the league of Gods-House had had certaine great differences, with the dwellers in the county of Tyrol. In the end, by the will of the Emperour Maximilian, it was decreed; that the parties should chuse an equal number of Iudges, to take knowledge of their variance, and that Thomas, Bishop of Constance, should be Arbitrator aboue all the Iudges. But while the Councellers to the King delayed to end this discord, the Bishop of Constance dyed: and in his stead, Maximilian subrogated Fredericke, Bishop of Ambourg. But the Kings councellers taking no knowledge of this other Arbitrator, prolonged (from day to day) the decision of the suite, as before they had done: all this while mollesting the Grisons, and charging them still with uell impositions.

They perceiving no cessation, deputed two of each league, and sent to Innspruck, insisting, that this difference should end, according to the order of the Emperour Maximilian. Which the councellers pretended not to know, albeit churcs of them, and (among the rest) the chanceller was present when the decree was set downe. Yet notwithstanding, because the Deputies should not be sent backe without answer; they assigned a day at Velceure, in Lent the next year ensuing. In the meane while, they of Austria planted Garisons vpon the Frontiers, and strong Artillery in diuers places, making (vnder hand) their preparation for warre. For they had appointed that day expressly, because they would set vpon them at vnawares, & vterly overthrow the Grisons, no way standing on their guard: wherein the Bishop of Coir lent his helping hand to them of Austria. But the league of Gods-House, hauing discovered the enemics intent; sent men to the cantons, who kept then a day at Zurich, and gaue them to vnderstand this eminent danger.

The Ambassadors declared, that beside the olde quarrels, new differences were moued, betwene them of Austria and the Switzers, so that there grew an appearance of warre: therefore for the profit & security both of the Switzers & Grisons, it seemed good, that they should be allied together. For by that meanes, the Grisons should easily expell the enemy out of their country: although they gaue them but little ayde, or almost none at all. On the other side, the Switzers should haue a Bulwarke to back them, and so might the more strongly make head against the enemy. The Cantons, who had bin well affected to the Grisons before, and knew those Mountain-bred men, to bee a warlike disposed people, and how beneficiall this alliance wold be both to the one and other: concluded and established a perpetuity of loue with the Grisons, in the year 1498. and the Moneth of December, and the Articles of the alliance are these that follow.

The Articles of alliance, betwene the Switzers and the Grisons.

1. First, that they shall be friends, & giue mutual succour one to another.
2. The second Article concerneth the agreeing of differences, which may happen betwene confederates.
3. The third is, that no man shall giue or sell away, those actions that he hath against his debitor, or the answerer, or surety for him.
4. The fourth concerneth victualles, according to one anothers trading: And to bee freely in the Markets, without standing bound to pay any new tributes.
5. That neither the one nor other side, shall make any new alliance, wherein these Articles shall be comprised, but with exceptions: And that in times of warre, the one side shall not make peace, except the other be therein comprehended also.

These are the Articles and principall points of the alliance. But the year following, the warre of Suaba happened, wherein the Grisons valiantly defended their Frontiers, against the men of Austria. And by the ayde of their people, many times in like manner, and by the assistance of the Switzers, diuers braue battailes were wonne against the enemy. Yet after these victories hapning on either side, peace was (at length) made in the city of Basle, with the Emperour Maximilian; in which peace, the Grisons are also comprised. By this meanes, the beginning of the alliance was wholefome and happy to both parties, and afterward, in many wars where the Switzers were present, vnder wages of strange Princes their confederates: the Grisons alwayes marched as kinde companions with them.

It came to passe, that in the year one thousand, five hundred, thirty and one: John Iaques de Medicis, who afterward was Marquisse of Marignano, getting vnto possession of the Castle of Musf, vpon the Lake of Coma, and hauing taken Clauenna from the Grisons, foraging the country thereof: many Cantons, according to their league of alliance, sent succour to the Grisons: by meanes whereof, the enemy was overcome at last, and driuen far off. In our time, the Grisons were allied with the French, and with the cantons of Swetia, and went to warre together for the King: yet in such sort neuertheless, that they send oftentimes a regiment separated of the Switzers, & which hath his Colonell & Captaine in chiefe.

CHAP. XXI.

The Alliance of the Valaisians, or people of Valois.

THE name of Valaisians, or them of Valois, comprehends three distinct people, enclosed within the most high Mountains, and dwelling in the Valley, from the fource of Rheine, so farre as the Lake Leman is. They were anciently called Viberines, Sedusians, or Segusians, some say, Sebusians, and Peragrians. At this day, the Viberines and Sedusians, are called the high Valaisians, and are diuided into seuen Dioeces, or Wards of ten Parishes. The Peragrians, or lower Valaisians, are subiects to the other: but the Bishop of Sion is Prince of all the country, hauing the sovereignty both temporall and spiritual, and he is called Count, or Governour of Valois. We haue described in another Tract, apart by it selfe, not onely this Valley, but likewise all the most remarkable things of the Valaisians.

Five Wardes or Dioeces of the Valaisians, made first alliance with Lucerna, Vri, and Vnderwald, in the year 1417. They were then in warre against a Bishop, named William de Raron, and his Father Guiscard, whom they had (by a popular tumult) forced from their houses. The Bernians gaue assistance to the Bishop and his Father, who were of their Bourgeois: And for this cause the Valaisians desiring to haue succour elsewhere: allied themselves with the fore-named 3. Cantons. Now fearing lest this might be an occasion of breeding quarrell betwene the Bernians, and the three Cantons allied with the Valaisians: the other cantons, who were as neuters to the business, laboured so earnestly, that the difference was pacified, and the Lords of Raron re-established in their goods. Before this alliance, the Valaisians had made one (for the space of ten years) with them of Berne, in the year 1250. Again, after this warre, they contracted another alliance (for certaine time) with the Bernians. But in the year 1475, they made a league defenseue and offenseue. And in the same year when wee wrote this History (to wit, 1575) an hundred years being expired, after the beginning of this league: they renewed and confirmed it on eyther part, by magnificent Ambassadors. Two years before they were leagued with the Bernians, they made a certaine agreement with them of Vri, Suits, and Vnderwald.

To conclude, in our time, vpon great differences moued, concerning matters of Religion, Ceremonies, life and manners of the Cleargy, whereof reformation was required, Swetia being diuided into contrary parts; Adrian, Bishop of Sion, and seuen Wardes of the Valaisians, in the year 1533. made alliance with seauen Cantons, in the Towne of Erlibourg, which Cantons made profession of the Roman Religion, as namely, Lucerna, Vri, Suits, Vnderwald, Lug, Erlibourg, and Sollenre. CHAP. XXII.

Of Rotwill, or Rotuill.

Opinions concerning the name of Rotuill, or Rotuill, which is an Imperiall Towne or City.

Some haue imagined, that Taxagatium, whereof Ptolomy speaketh in his Geography, was Rotwill or Rotuill, which Clareanus calleth Erythropolis, hauing changed the Aleman or Germane word, into a Greek word: but they much deceiue themselves. For Ptolomy placeth Taxagatium in the country of the Grifons, and Rotuill is feituared beyond Danubius in Germany, on the left side of the Riuer Nicra, and very neere to the Spring-head of both those Floods or Riuers. This city is sufficiently renowned among the Imperials, for therein is a chamber of the Empire, which is vulgarly called Hofricht, wherunto all the round neighbouring countries resort, for causes of appeal. Such as are contumacious, and fayle of their appearance there; are sent (by sentence of the Iudges) into banishment from the Empire. It is said, that this chamber was established by the Emperor Conrad the third, and that it is 424. yeares since.

The first alliance of them of Rotuill with the cantons.

The first alliance that they of Rotuill made with the Switzers, was in the time of the Emperor Fredricke the third, in the yeare 146. This alliance was renewed diuers times betweene them. At last, in the yeare 1319. they contracted perpetuall alliance with all the Cantons of the Switzers. During the warre of Suaba, they of Rotuill (engirt with enemies on all sides) shewed themselves alwayes faithfull to the Switzers; offering them amiably and liberally all their riches and men: which the Switzers could not accept, but onely desired them, to defend their city against the enemy. Now in regard that Rotuill is situated along the limits of Swetia, and that succour cannot bee brought to one another, but with danger, considering, they must passe through other mens land, the alliance speaketh expressly, that they must be careful for drawing any war vpon them, or vpon any of their confederates.

And first of all, It is said, that they may not make war with any whoeuer, without the knowledge and consent of the Cantons. They shall giue no succour to any person out of Swetia, without the will and consent of the Cantons. Moreover, if they would haue reason by Arms, for any iniury or out-rage done vnto the; they must attempt nothing, but by aduice of the Cantons. If their enemies will vndergoe iudgement, such as the Cantons shall thinke to be honest and equall: the men of Rotuill must also consent thereto. If warre chance to be moued among the cantons; they of Rotuill are to follow that part, which the most part of voyces do allow. The cantons are to conferre (with all their power) the Imperiall chamber of Rotuill; which (in the mean while) shall vse no authority against the Switzers, or any of them. And if any stranger shall cite or summon thither a Switzer; they are to make knowne, and helikewise, how farre he is to bee defended by priuiledge. In breefe, they are not to molest any Switzer in that iurisdiction.

CHAP. XXIII.

Of Mulhouse.

Mulhouse is a Towne in the county of Ferrara, or (as some doe hold opinion) in the Territory of Basile. It is thought that in ancient times it was called Ariabium. For in the Guide or Director of wayes, appointed by Antonius Augustus; this place is set betweene Augusta Rauraca (which is Basile) and Vruncim, which some do thinke to be called at this day, Ensbeym; then Mount Brissac, Heluetum, and Strasbourg are named. In times of antiquity, Mulhouse was in number of the Imperiall townes: but the Bishop of Strasbourg was Gouvernor thereof, also of the Towne

Rotuill is situated through the midst of Swetia.

Towne of Colmar. It came to passe, that warre happened betweene Raoul of Habsbourg, and the Bishop of Strasbourg; wherein Mulhouse was taken from the Bishop, & the Castle ruined. After which time, Mulhouse was againe re-obtained, and numbered among the Imperiall Cities and Townes.

Her first alliance with the Switzers, was made about the yeare 1464. For in regard that the neighboring Gentlemen molested the Towne, and narrowly watched all occasions to assault it; the citizens made alliance with them of Berne, for fifteene yeares, as also with Fribourg and Sollemure, and by means of the Bernians intercession, the other seuen Cantons tooke the Towne into their protection. Which proued to displeasing to the Noble-men, that these priuate enmitities conuerterd themselves (soone after) into open warre: which caused the Switzers immediately, to send and plant Garrisons in Mulhouse. Afterward, all the Cantons brought their troopes into the field, and came with great assistance to releue Mulhouse.

In the end, hauing besiedged the towne of Waldshut, appertaining to the house of Austria; they compelled the Gentlemen, to come to some equall conditions of peace. Afterward, they of Mulhouse were receiued for fellow-Bourgeses with them of Basile, and thereby more strictly vnited to the Switzers. Nine yeares after, the 19. day of January, they made alliance with all the thirteene cantons. The conditions were all alike to the alliance of Rotuill, as well in regard of warres, as leagues with strangers.

CHAP. XXIII.

Of Bienna.

Bienna is at the ende of a very pleasant Lake, abounding with plenty of fish & round engirt (on all sides) with goodly Vineyards. It is vnder the government of the Bishop of Basile; and yet it enioyeth lawes and regiment a part by it selfe, as also liberrall franchises and priuiledges.

The first alliance of the of Bienna, was made with the men of Berne, in the yeare 1303. to ridde the country of certaine robbers and theues, which wandered there in fo great numbers, as almost no way had any security for passage. In this alliance, they of Strasbourg, Basile, Fribourg and Sollemure were also comprized. Three yeares after, in regard of some great differences, which they had with their neighbours: they made a particular alliance with the Bernians. Their third alliance was made in Anno 1352. and fifteen yeares after, because John de Viana, Bishop of Basile, (a man of turbulent spirit) would not suffer any of his neighbours to liue in quiet: they of Bienna, desirous to provide for their owne ease and tranquillity, ioyned themselves more strictly with the men of Berne, by giuing each to other the right of fellow-Bourgeses. The Bishop very angry at this vnion, mustered together some troopes of horse, and (at vnawares) ranne vpon them of Bienna, and clapt vp in prison the Authors of this association.

When the men of Berna heard of this deede, they came to succour their fellow Bourgeses, tooke (by force) the Castle, which the Bishop had in Bienna, set the prisoners at liberty, and made warre vpon the Bishop, as also on them of Sollemure, his associates. In this warre, they tooke and ruined many places, which were in subiection to the bishop.

The ſituation and antiquity of Geneva.

It is neere to the limits of the Switzers, at the end of the Lake Lemanus, and an iſſue of Rhone cometh into it. Not onely the words of Julius Caſar, but alſo many antiquities there found, do teſtifie the ancientneſſe of the city. Many famous Monuments might haue bene ſcene there, but that the city was oftentimes ruined by enemies, and much deſtroyed and deſaced by fire. For I finde in ancient chronicles, that in the time of Helioſabalus, Geneua was embraced with ſo fierce a fire, as hardly was any one houſe to be found, that ſtood free from it. The Emperour Aurelianus reſtored the city againe, being ſo pitifully diſfigured, granted it great priuileges, and gaue it the right of Fairs, and of the Empire, becauſe it was ſituated moſt commodiouſly. Hee called it Aurelia, according to his owne name: but after his death, hee took her ancient name againe. Afterward, it was forraged (as many other cities were) by diuers barbarous Nations, intruding themſelves into France. And ſome 250. yeares after, or thereabout, within the ſpace of 7. yeares, fire tooke it in ſuch terrible manner, as the moſt part of the city was quite ruined.

The Biſhoppricke of Geneua, in former times had very ample priuileges & franchises: yet notwithstanding, the citizens held their liberties to themſelves, and alwayes carefully conſerved their leagues perperuall with the Biſhop, according as they were left vnto them by their anceſtors. The Counts of Geneua were great enemies to their liberties: who (neuertheleſſe) were vafiſſales of the Biſhoppricke, and held their Earledomes of him by fealty. So in like manner were the Counts of Sauoye; but the citizens maintained their rights and priuileges couragiously againſt the Counts.

In the yeare 1420. when Amias, the fiſt Duke of Sauoye, laboured to obtain of Pope Martin, by way of interchange, the right and ſuperiority (as they call it) ouer the city of Geneua: the Biſhop named Iohn de Pierre-ſeize, made an agreement for him, and all his ſucceſſors with the citizens, that he nor they ſhould at any time conſent, that the liberties of Geneua ſhould be exchanged or alienated. If either he, or any of his ſucceſſors did otherwiſe; the citizens might hold and ranke him or them in the number of traitors and conſpiring enemies. Some while after this, the Emperour Maximilian, hauing amply publiſhed his Sonne in law, Philibert, Duke of Sauoye, Vicar of the Empire in thoſe parts: then againe, Philibert and his brother Charles, ſtroue to ſubiekt Geneua vnder their awe, pretending the title of this new right, and priuileges of the Vicariſhip, giuen in former times to the Counts of Sauoye, by the Emperour Charles the fourth. Who (notwithſtanding) tooke from Count Amias, all action, power, iuriſdiction, and preheminance, ouer the city and territory of Geneua.

While theſe praſtiſes and conſpiracies of the neighbouring Princes laſted, they of Geneua maintained themſelves heedfully in amity with the Switzers, and (diuers times) made alliance with the Bernians and Fribourgers, for certain yeares. At length, they combined alliance and fellow-Bourgeſhip perpetually, with the of Berne, and confirmed it more ſtrictly, in the yeare 1536. Then in regard of the religions alteration, the Duke of Sauoye, and the Biſhop of Geneua, made war vpon the citizens, they being ſuccoured by them of Berne. This alliance hath bene (ſince then) renewed, and many friendly motions made, to allie Geneua with the Cantons: but I know no reaſon, why it is nor executed and done.

Of New-Caſtle.

THE City of New-Caſtle, is ſeated in the country of the Anantiſ, vpon the lake which is called the Lake of New-Caſtle, at the head whereof is another little Towne, called Tuerdun. New-Caſtle is both a city and country, and the Count thereof was choſen by ſucceſſion of the Counts of New-Caſtle: but ſince, ſaine to the Count of Hochberg, the Marqueſſe of Roſſin, and to two Dukes of Longueuille. This order the other cantons continued, except that of Zurich, who hauing loſt their ranke: at the returne of it to their time againe, they ſhould command at New-caſtle two yeares together.

But when the time drew neere, Jone of Hochberg, widow to the Duke of Longueuille, preuailed ſo much, as (with certain conditions) the county was ſurrendered back againe, in the yeare 1529. Sometime before, this county had bene alloted from the Cantons of Berne, Lucerna, Fribourg, and Saltzburgh by meanes of ſome Articles, which were confirmed againe vpon this reſtoring or ſurrender. At this day, the counties of New-caſtle are particularly allied with the men of Berne, or the Bernians.

CHAP. XXVII.

Of thoſe people that are gouerned in common by the Citizens of the Switzers.

WE haue appointed for a third-part of ſue Switzers common-wealth, thoſe people that are gouerned (in common) by the Switzers. It is neceſſary then, to ſay ſome what of this time, and by what title, they became ſubjects to the Switzers. Among them there are ſome Townes, which wee may rearme ſtipendiaries becauſe (at their own proper coſts and charges) they march along in warre with the Switzers. Neuertheleſſe, they gouerne themſelves by their owne lawes, and make election of their Magiſtrates; & yet the maine ſouerainety appertaineth to the Switzers, to whoſe Lawes and Edicts, thoſe Townes ſtand bound to obey. Anciently they belonged to the houſe of Auſtria; but during the warres againſt that houſe, the Switzers became Maſters of the neighbouring countries, and theſe Townes yielded theſelves to them vpon certain conditions; to wit, that they ſhould be as well ſubiect to them as to the houſe of Auſtria, their ancient priuileges ſaued and excepted. Thoſe Townes are Bada, Bremgarten, Frauenfeld, Mellingen, and Rapſwill.

CHAP. XXVIII.

Of Bada.

BADA is a Towne vpon the Riuier Limagus, or Limathus, and ſo called, in regard of hot waters, whereof there are many Welles or Fountaines in that place, wherunto men and women vſe to reſort (in great numbers) from diuers countries. For this cauſe ſome haue called it the Towne of Baths, others, the Caſtle. According to cuſtome of our Elders, who called Baths, thoſe places where there were hot Springs and Fountaines: ſo may wee rearme this, the Switzers Baths. As in Italy there are the Baths of Stratiell, and others: In France, the Baths of Arles, of the Comenues, and of the Tarbes. In Germany, the Baths of Spach or Spam, and of Aix. In like manner, Bada a Towne of the Marquiſate of Bada, in a certaine inſcription, is named The Baths: And in the inſcription of Wettingen, they of Bada are called, The citizens of the Baths.

This Towne is one of the moſt ancient of Suetia, by the teſtimony of Cornelius Tacitus, who tearmeth it a Towne of Cantu, hauing in abundance, and with great pleaſure, very wholeſome waters. The ſame Author ſaith, that the Romans took notice of a Garriſon in the Caſtle of Bada, and reputed it ſelfe to be a Garriſon for the Mountains, which cloſe & ioyne together in that quarter, do locke vp this country. To paſſe out of Germany and Suetia into France, and into Italy, wee muſt goe through Bada, then ouer the lands of Zurich, from thence into the country of Ergow, and thwart ouer Suetia. In ancient times, this Towne had two Caſtles, one ſeated vpon an high Rock, which is nothing now at this day, but old decayed ruines (being ſpoyled and deſaced by the Switzers, as we ſhall declare anon.) The teſtim-

Bada.

Bada ioyned to the house of Austria, & resolved to the Switzers.

By what means Bada came into the power of the Switzers.

A Council of war, & their answer returned vnto the Switzers.

In the false-came council it was decreed, that men did not stand bound to keepe Faith with them that were cal led heretics.

where (in our time) dwelt the Bayliffes or Gouernours, which were sent thither by the Cantons. Bada hath had (in former times) Counts, the race whereof are quite extinct, and their successors haue bene the Lords of Habsbourg, who ioyned that County to the house of Austria, and diuers other goods. But from the house of Austria, Bada came into the Switzers hands, at the time of the Council of Constance, in manner following.

Fredericke of Austria, brought Pope John the 22. out of the Councell, & maintained him against the Emperour and the Councell. For which cause, by the Decree of the Councell, he was excommunicated, banished from the Empire, and his goods confiscated. The Emperour himselfe, with an assembled Army, from the Townes and Citties of Germanie and Swabia, the Duke of Bawaria, and some others, made warre vpon him. Also commandement was giuen to the Switzers, on behalfe both of the Emperour and the Councell to assaile Fredericke with all their forces. Whereof they made refusal, alledging that they could nor doe it, and their honor saued: in regard of the peace formerly made (for fifty yeares following) with them of Austria, confirmed by Oath and Letters Patents. The Fathers of the Councell made answer to this excuse of the Switzers: that Fredericke was an enemy to the Church, excommunicated and banished by publike order: This warre concerned the good of Church, who was offended and iniured (in her members) by Fredericke.

Wherefore, if in this cause the Switzers undertooke Armes, according to the command of the Emperour, they should doe a good and holy worke. They should also well consider with themselves, how much it would wounde their honour; if (in contrary opposition) they continued idle excuses, which would wrap them vp in the same censure and condemnation with Fredericke. Ouer and beside all this; according to the aduice of the Ambassadors of England, Denmark, Sweden, Norway, Bohemia, Polonia, and Princes, Gentlemen, and Lawyers, the Emperour declared, that the Switzers might (with a good and safe conscience) make warre vpon Fredericke, notwithstanding the peace made. Because that the Subjects of the Empire, in all actions doe except expressly or covertly, the right and Majesty of the Emperour.

The Emperour sent a copy of this arrest and decree to the Switzers, enioyning them againe to make war on Fredericke, and by the same means adiudged to the empire, all that which they of Austria had engaged to them before. Promising also, nor to make any peace with Fredericke, till the Switzers were first reintegrated into their former agreement. The Switzers being then perswaded with such reasons, leuied their Armes; but because they were to Warre in the name of the Emperour, and of the Romane Emperie, they demanded wages of the Emperour: declaring, there was no reason, that they should furnish themselves at their owne charge; and the fruit of the victory fall into other mens hands; and that theire wealth was not sufficient to furnish such expences.

The Emperour thought this demand to be made in equiuy; neuertheless, because he was somewhat empty of money, hee agreed with the Switzers, that all the goodes of the house of Austria, which they possessed already, or could conquer in this warre; they should enioy in the Empires name, vntil they should be paid their wages, and charges during the war. By especial Letters, the Emperour exhorted them of Zurich to enter the field, and granted them (in title of Fee) the Countrey which is beyond Mount Alpys, named the Frise Prouince, which they of Austria held. According hereto, the yeare one thousand, foure hundred, and fiftene; about the fifteenth day of April, the men of Zurich, with their troops well prepared, went to besiedge a Towne seated on the Riuer of Rous, named Mellingen, and on the third day took it by composition. From thence they went to Bremgarten, where the Cantons of Suits & Zug ioyned with them. They of Bremgarten, (by example of the other) yielded themselves to the Switzers, vnder protection of the Empire.

At the same time, the Lucernians tooke a Towne named Sursey. The Bernians, assisted by them of Sollemure, Bienna, the County of Nem-castle, and some others beside, got into their power Zofingen, Arberg, Aron, Lentsbourg & Brig, to-together with the country of Ergow. As for them of Zurich, after they had taken the forenamed Townes, they besiedged Bada. All the other Cantons, except Bern ioyned with them, for they of Austria held no place in Swissia of greater strength then this: and the Garrison of Bada had much ouer-travelled the Switzers, especially them of Zurich, and this was the reason, that the Cantons resolved to force both the Towne and Castle. As for the towne, after it had bene beaten with the Cannon, for the space of three weekes, without ceasing, it yielded. But the soldiours still defended themselves in regard of the fortresse, and held our well, after reddition of the Towne. The Switzers on the other side, hauing receiued succour from them of Berne, did dayly beate the place, and pressed the Garrison to yeelde themselves. At length, the Souldiers hauing no more stones, arrows, darts, nor any other munition proper for defence, truce being granted for some dayes: vpon condition, that if within a limited time Fredericke of Austria did not deliuer the from this siege, they would quit the place, and deliuer the castle into the power of the Switzers.

While these things were in working; by the intercession of the Duke of Bawaria, and the Burggrau of Nuremberg, Fredericke was reconciled to the Emperour Sigismund, who sent immediately his Ambassadors to the campe of the Switzers, to giue them command for the ceasing of warre. But the Switzers feeling yet the outrages which the Garrison of Bada had done vnto them, so soon as the truce time was expired, so pressed them within, that two dayes after Pentecost, the castle was deliuered to them, which they burned and quite ruined, as soone as the enemy had auoided it. On the Morrow, the Count of Togge, Ambassadour from the Emperour, being arrived at the Switzers campe, to command them agayne, that they should giue ouer armes, found the castle to be taken and spoyled. This strooke somewhat deadly vnto the Noble mens hearts: but they had no occasion to complaine, because the Switzers had done nothing, but in case of open & lawful warre.

Then, as the Emperour was ready to go for Spain, to fetch thence Pierre de Lune, that he might be Pope, who afterwards was called Bene the eleuenth; being in need of money, because his cofers were emptied (hauing disbursed great payes, without any intermission in the precedent warres, and for the affaires of the Councell) he engaged to them of Zurich, Bada, Bremgarten, Mellingen, Sursey, and the Lands to them belonging. Also to them of Berne, the country of Ergow, which they had taken, as already hath bene declared: yet paying a great sum of crowns. At this day, the country of Ergow is possessed by them of Berne only. The yeare following, they of Zurich made a part of that which was ingaged to them, ouer to the Cantons of Lucerna, Suits, Finderwald, Zug, and Glaris.

From the beginning, the men of Vri would not haue any part; as thinking, that the detention of these places, contradicted the treaty of peace made with Fredericke. But after they vnderstood the reasons of their confederates, who protested (in themselves) the same desire of obseruing the peace: but that by command of the Emperour, and of the Councell, they undertooke armes. Next, that by the will and consent of them both, they possessed now those places for wages, and price of warre-seruice, and held them on the faith of the Emperour, the soueraigne Lorde; yet for a great summe of money, which they had layd out & disbursed. The men of Vri hauing heard these Reasons, and other of the like Nature, entred into part of this engagement. The Bernians also were receiued in at the length.

CHAP. XXVIII.

Of Bremgarten, and Mellingen.

Bremgarten is a Towne, situated on the Riuer of Rous, which enloseth it in the midst almost, in forme of a demy Island, a great Germane mile beneath Lucerna. It appeareth by the ancient priuileges of this Towne; that it was (heretofore) numbered among the Imperials. Neuertheless, it became (afterwards) subiect vnto the Counts of Habsbourg, then to the Princes

The Emperour engaged Bada to them of Zurich and of Berne.

Vri stood free from all these partakings, till further information from their confederates.

Vri and Berne accepted into this combination at last.

of Austria descended of them. But it is not well knowne at what time, neyther by what title, they came to make themselves Lords thereof.

Mellingen is a little small Towne vpon the selfesame Riuer, about halfe a German mile below Bremgarten. It hath alwayes beene vnder the dominion of the Counts of Habsbourg. These two Townes were taken (as Bada) in this war which the Switzers made vnder the Emperours name, and then afterward, the Emperour Sigismond pawned it to the Cantons: vpon condition, that all their ancient rights, priuiledges, and customes, should remain entire, and the Citizens to yeelde the same dutie to the Cantons, as formerly they had done vnto the Counts of Habsbourg, and Princes of Austria their Lordes. At this very day, both these Townes are vnder gouernement of the eight first Cantons.

CHAP. XXX.

Of Rasperwill.

The forme & situation of Rasperwill.

AS concerning Rasperwill, it is a town on the Lake of Zurich, wherein dwelt (sometimes the Counts of Rasperwill, who had to their successours the Countes of Habsbourg, that gouerned likewise in these quarters. In the year 1458, the Switzers became masters thereof. There were then two factions in this town, the one of Austrians, and the other of Switzers. Duke Sigismond, tooke some of the Switzers partakers, and brought them as prisoners to Impruk. The rest amazed at this deede, fled into Suetia; but by entermise of the Cantons, they all re-entred Rasperwill againe. For the Cantons protested out a lawde, that they would come and assault the towne, except the prisoners might be enlarged, and the banished receiued.

How Rasper-
will became loynd to the Cantons, and to afterward
continued.

It came to passe the year following, that the Switzers made warre on them of Constance, who had done them some deplorable outrages. Peace being made, as they of Vri, Suies, Vnderualde, and Claris returned homeward to their houses, they demanded victuals for their troopes, and passage thorow Rasperwill, which they easily obtained by the persuite of their partakes. But, being entred more strong, and in greater number then the Citizens (the most part whereof were Switzers in affection) they compelled the Citizens to sweare fidelity to them. So that from that time, Rasperwill remained in the power of those foure Cantons: who (neuerthelesse) left the citizens to the same liberty as they had vnder the Dukes of Austria.

CHAP. XXXI.

Of Frawenfeld.

How the town
came to be taken by the Cantons.

TWO yeares after the taking of Rasperwill, the seauen Cantons then being in warre against Sigismond, Duke of Austria, tooke Frawenfeld, the chiefest town in all the country of Turgow. There were reasons and occasions enow, whereby this warre was vndertaken and attempted. The Duke had imprisoned Cardinall Casano, byshoppe of Brescia, and because he did not release him, so soone as Pope Pius (who formerly was named Aeneas Syluio) sent him command to doe it, hee was therefore excommunicated. But, because this Thunder-bolte did not dismay him, and he appealed from that sentence, to the next Councill: the Pope commanded the Switzers to defend the Churches rightes, and to set vpon Sigismond. The Cantons, who had as much credite with the one, as with the other, obeyed the Popes command: but there happened other occasions to induce this warre.

The towne of Winterduer, in the countie of Kybourg, appertaining to the Canton of Zurich, was subiect to the Duke of Austria. There is euery year in that place a Fayre, on the day of Saint Gal, the fixe of October, whereat the Country people round about doe meete in great numbers. They of Kybourg being come thither, the gates were shut against them, vpon a sinister suspicion of the inhabitants, that they of Zurich would surprize the Towne, during the Faire time, & had therefore made some preparation.

Now, as the Bayliffe established by the Canton of Zurich in those quarters, required that the Gates might be set open, and that they of Kybourg might haue free trading, according to their accustomed maner, promising that the town should should receiue no endamage; nor withstanding all this, no credite would be giuen vnto his words. As a counterchange of this injury, they of Zurich prohibited their people from bringing either victuals or merchandizes to Winterduer. The Duke of Austria on the other side, standing vpon his guard, placed a garrison in the towne. These things happened before the excommunication from the Pope.

But yet there was another occasion for the moouing of this warre. There were two brethren, Gentlemen of mark, of the country of Stria, named Vigilins, and Bernard Gradlers. They of Austria had inforced them from their houses, and depoyled them of all their goods: without excepting so much as the dowrie belonging to Bernard's wife, who was of the house of Starckenberg. After they had solicited the Duke a long time, to restore their goods againe, and neuer could obtain so much, as that hee would admit but what iustice did allow: at length, they withdrew themselves into Suetia, and were receyued as Bourgeses into Zurich. Afterward, they brought a little town, called Egghow, they made warre on the Duke of Austria, assisted by the men of Zurich. The Duke placed a new garrison at Winterduer, but after the 4000s of Zurich were drawne thence: some difference fell betweene the Garrison, and the inhabitants of Kybourg. So that once more they of Zurich (hauing demanded succour of their confederates) went forth into the fields, going to besiege Winterduer. At this time then, to wit, in the year, one thousand, foure hundred and sixty, Diesfenbow, a Towne on the Rheine, in the country of Turgow, this country also, and Frawenfeld were conquered, and reduced vnder the power of the Switzers.

CHAP. XXXII.

Of the nine Baylywickes, or Governments.

THE common Baylywickes, are gouerned (in part) by the seauen first Cantons, and partly by some other with them. There are nine Baylywickes, or Go-uernments in all, to wit, the Countie of Bada, the three Prouinces, Turgow, Sargans, the Rhegnues, that is to say, the valley of Rheine, which they call Rimball, Lugano, Locarno, Mendrisio, and the vale Madia. The foure last are beyond the Alpes, in Italy, towards the Adriannesse, & speak Italian; the other the Germanes tongue. Sargans, and the valley of Rimball are on the Frontiers of the Grisons: the other 3 are seated within the confines of ancient Suetia.

CHAP. XXXIII.

Of Bada and Turgow.

IN this manner (then) were the Towne and Countie of Bada, Turgow, and Frawenfeld, by the Switzers conquered: at such times, and by those means, as formerly hath bene related. The Cantons of Zurich, Lucerna, Vri, Suies, Vnderualde, Zug, Claris, and Berne, commaunded at Bada. They are Lords of Turgow, except the Canton of Berne, which hath no part therein. As concerning the taking knowledge of criminall causes, the Emperour Sigismond tooke it from Frederick of Austria, at the time of the Councill of Constance, and engaged it to the City of Constance, which kepte it till the year 1499, when the Emperour Maximilian attributed that authority to the Switzers, by a treaty of peace which hee made with the. And therefore the seuen first Cantons a-boue named, are Lords of Turgow. But concerning the knowledge of crimes; appellations and fines or amercements, which may happen, as oftentimes they doe: that appertaineth to the tenne first Cantons, who made warre agaynst the Emperour Maximilian, and the League of Swaba.

Of the three first Prouinces.

NOW, to speake of the three Prouinces, which are along beyond the Riuer of Rust (to distinguish them from the free Prouince, beyond the Mountain Albino, which was giuen to them of Zurich, by the Emperour Sigismond, as we haue already declared before:) they were taken by the Switzers, at the very same time when

ces.

The reason why the name was thus giuen them, according to the authors opinion

when Bada was conquered. Heere let me tell you, that we call certaine Castles & Villages, which lye along the Riuer of Ruß, both aboue and below Bremgarten, free Prouinces. This name was giuen them (in mine opinion) because that the three villages, to wit, Meyenberg, Richen-see and Ergow, had anciently kept (each one) her iurisdiction, Magistrates, and Officers by themselves: so that they seemed as three seuerall Prouinces, now ioyned all into one. In times past, all that quarter was called the Countie of Rora, and so it was named by Henry the 5. Emperour, in a priuiledge of the Abbey of Aduren. The castle belonging vnto the Countes of Rora, was in the Towne of Arone.

Some difference among the Cantons, concerning the conquest of the free Prouinces.

As such time, as (by command of the Emperour and the Councell of Constance) the Switzers made warre on Fredericke of Austria, they of Lucerna conquered those places, which are along the Riuer of Ruß, and namely that countie of Rora. After the warre, when they contended who should be Lords thereof only: the Cantons of Zurich, Suits, Vnderwald, Zug, and Glaris opposed against them, and in diuers dayes held at Begkenried, Vnderwald, Suits, and in the campe before Bremgarten, they shewed, that (from the beginning of the warre) the Cantons had agreed, that they should be Lords (in common) of all places in the countie of Ergow, that should be won in that Warre. Now, although the Lucernians maintained, that they had giuen charge thereof to their Ambassadors; yet notwithstanding, after the testimonies were gathered both of the one side & other, the Lords of Berne being appointed iudges of the variance, pronounced, that these 5. Cantons had part in all the country.

The Lucernians pleaded their Title in right of their Ambassadors.

Tenneyeares after that, by consent of the sixe Cantons, they of Vri were ioyned with them, and hadde a great part also in that government. And therefore Zurich, Lucerna, Vri, Suits, Vnderwald, Zug, and Glaris, are Lords thereof at this day. The country is not great; and therefore, of what Canton soeuer the Bayliffe is, hee makes not his residence there: but when necessity doth so require, he comes once a yeare to iudge suites in law, and then he is lodged (most often) in the Abbey of Muren, which is rich enough, and well builded.

Vri ioyned with them ten yeeres after, & had a part in the gouernment.

CHAP. XXXV.

Of the Sargans.

Among the Grifons, the Sarmetes liued long time since; but at this day, both their towne and countie is vulgarly called Sargans, whereof diuers etymologies are made. But in the auncient Chartres, this Towne is named Sarmegans, which is a word deriued from the name of Sarmetes, whereof Pliny maketh mention. Now, because the dwelling of the Sarmetes was at the spring of the Riuer Inn, where now they of Engadin and of Munsterthal make their abiding; the inhabiting Sargans (now in question) it may be, are yssued from them: there or else might take their name of the Riuer called Sar, which runneth thorough the Towne.

In former times, this countie belonged to the Counts of Werdenberg, who in that respect were called Countes of Sargans. Afterward they pawned it vnto the Austrian Princes, and at another time to the Countes of Togge, but redeemed it againe, and possessed it til the yeare 1483. And then, George Count of Werdenberg, sold it to the seuen first Cantons, who sent a Bayliffe thither each one by his turne, that commanded the whole country, & kept in the castle where the Countes were wont to dwell. As for the Towne of Sargans, although it is subiect vnto the Switzers: yet notwithstanding, it enioyeth his priuiledges, and electeth Magistrates that administer iustice, and also deale in criminall causes.

But they on the hither side, as Rhine and Alstetten, two little Townes, and the valley tending toward the Count of Werdenberg, they are obedient to the Switzers. Heerefore, all this countie appertained vnto them of Austria, who pawned it to the Lords of Ion. But at the time of the Councell of Constance, when as Fredericke of Austria was banished by the Emperour Sigismund: the Count of Togge, the Emperours adopted sonne, seized on this valley of Rheine, and other places belonging vnto the house of Austria, by disbursing money for them, to whom they were engaged.

The valley sold to them of Appenzell.

Afterwards, this Count pawned this Valley of Rheine, for a great summe of money, to two Gentlemen, Huldreich and Conrad Beier, brethren. In the yeare, 1460. Jaques Beier, their Brother and heire, hauing some variance with them of Appenzell, and fearing his vnableness of keeping this valley against their strength: willingly sold them his rights, and resigned the engagement. After that, this valley remained in the power, and vnder dominion of Appenzell, for the space of thirty yeares, or thereabout.

How Rhimball came to belong to the Switzers.

But when it so fell out, that the men of Appenzell were troubled in warre, against the Abbot of S. Gall, his subiects, and the Citizens also, and the Abbey of Rosach (new built) quite defaced: the Canton'd Switzers, confederates with the Abbot, mustred vp their troops, and called their other allies to them, by whose helpe they maintained the Abbot, and condemned them of Appenzell in a great fine. Which made them to require peace, and beside, to offer them the rule of the Valley of Rheine: the possession whereof fell (as a recompence) to the Cantons of Zurich, Lucerna, Suits, and Glaris. After this, they parted with a portion of this Seignurie, to the Cantons of Vri, Vnderwald, and Zug, who had assisted the likewise to Appenzell, who indeed were ancient Lords thereof. So that (euen to this day) these eight Cantons, each after other) send a Bayliffe into this valley, who makes his abiding in a small Towne, called Rhine, at one end of the valley, somewhat aboue the place, where the Rheine enters into the Lake of Constance.

Baylywickes beyond the mountaines.

Lucarno or Luca the first Baylywicke.

Locarna the 2.

Mendrisa the third.

The vale Madia the fourth.

How and in what manner the seuerall Baylywickes came to be commanded by the Switzers.

FOUR Baylywickes do yet remain, which the Switzers call Baylywickes beyond the Mountaines, because they are quite ouer the Alpes. The first is Lucarno or Luca, a Towne vpon the Lake, which some call the Lake of Ganna; others, the Lake of Lugano. This Lake is in the midst of two other Lakes, to wit, that of Como on the left had, and on the right hande of the Lake Maior, whereinto it shutteth vp it selfe.

The second Baylywicke, and neereft of all to this former, is Locarna: a very pleasant Towne, at the head of the Lake Maior, sometimes beautified with verie goodly and strong Castles; and accounted the cheefest in Lombardie, next vnto that of Millaine.

The Baylywicke of Mendrisa, on the left hand of the Lake of Ganna, maketh the third.

And for the last, there is the Vale of Madia, which depended heerefore vpon Locarno, as Mendrisa on Lugano.

These foure Baylywickes fell to the Switzers, in the yeare, 1513. by the Donation of Maximilian Sforza, Duke of Millaine. For, hee hauing driuen the French out of Italy, by the counsell and authority of Pope Innius, and being holpen therein by the Venetians and Switzers, he made a present of these foure Baylywickes (abutting on the Frontiers of their country) to the Switzers. He gaue also the Vale of Tellinato the Grifons. But three yeares after, King Frances hauing vanquished the Switzers at Marignano, expelled the Duke, and re-venited to his Crowne the Dukedome of Millaine. By an accord made at Fribourg, he confirmed this donation of his owne royall authority, as his successors in the dukedome of Millaine did the like.

All the Cantons send their bayliffes thether by turnes, except that of Appenzell, which was nor in the number of the Cantons.

CHAP. XXXVIII.

Of Bellizona.

WE might ranke among these Bayliwicks of Italy, the Towne of Bellizona, which obeyeth to the Cantons of Vri, Suits, and Vnderwald. This Towne (in former times) appertained vnto the Countes of Misauk, who were reiecte by the Dukes of Millaine. Afterward, hauing found meanes to enter againe by intelligence; they fold it to them of Vri and Vnderwald. But the Duke of Millain recouered it againe, and tooke it from the Switzers, by the same subtle tricks which the Counts of Misauk had vsed to repofesse it. This hapned about the yeare, 1422.

After that time, the Switzers made many voyages ouer the Mountaines to recouer Bellizona. At length, in the yeare 1500. they got into possession of it agen. For, in regard of continuall warres betwene the Sforzaes and the French: the men of Bellizona willing to prouide for their owne safety, yielded themselves to the Canton of Vri. The French, becoming masters of the Millainnes, labored often (but all in vain) to regain the town. Finally, at such time as the Dukes of Millaine gaue the fore-named foure Bayliwicks to the Cantons, they were also confirmed in the possession of Bellizona.

The Switzers in full possession of Bellizona.

Three Bayliwicks in Bellizona, & how their gouernment is ordered equally.

The whole country is diuided into 3. Bayliwicks, to witte, Bellizona, the vale Brune, and Riniera; and in like manner gouerned (turne after turne) by those three Cantons, that they haue a Bayliwicke belonging to each one. As if Vri doe establish a Gouernour or Bayliffe at Bellizona: Suits placeth one also in the vale Brune, and Vnderwald one at Riniera. Then beginning againe, Vri commends one to Riniera, Vnderwald to the vale Brune, and Suits to Bellizona. And because that the Bayliwicke of Riniera is of the least reuenue, most commonly, he that hath bene Bayliffe at Bellizona, is established nexte after at Riniera.

CHAP. XXXIX.

Of the Alliances made by the Cantons, with Kings and Princes neere neighbouring to them.

Demosthenes, the most eloquent of all the Græcian Orators, a man wonderfully well acquainted with affaires of State, and (aboue all) a deare Louer of his Countreyes liberty, wrote thus. Ouer great familiarity with Tyrants, should be suspicious to ciuill and free Cities: And no trust is to be repofed in them, especially if they bee neighbours, because euery King and Tyrant is an enemy to liberty, and contrary to lawes. The euent and successe attending on such cases, did well witnesse, that this Learned man had giuen very wholesome counsell to the Athenians, yea, and to all Greece. For Phillip the sonne of Amyntas (against whom Demosthenes made head) and the succeeding Kings of Macedon oppressed the liberty of the Greekes, by a dissembled amity, and working certaine combinations and alliances, deuised onely for their owne aduantage.

The case standing thus, I thinke, that many stand thus amazed, what shoulde moue the ancient Switzers to make such alliances as they haue done with straungers, Kings and Princes, their Neighbours. But here is to be noted and obserued, that all alliances doe not hurt one like another in a Commonwealth. They are to be mistrusted, which do import a league offensive and defensive, & ouergreat familiarity. Otherwise, for the benefite of peace, it is needfull sometimes, that Princes and great Lords nere neighbouring, should ally themselves together, for the better vse of some rightes, and the easier manning of their affaires. The ancient Switzers made many such alliances of peace and amity. And if at any time they were knit more strictly to some King or Prince, it was not inconsiderately done: but, as appeareth by the tenour of the alliances, the conditions wer such, as their liberties could no waies be easily touched or wronged.

CHAP. XL.

Of the Alliance made by the Switzers, with the Dukes of Millaine.

I cannot well set downe what treaty or discoufite was anciently had, and at the first time, betwene the Duke of Millain, and the Switzers. But in the yeare, one thousand foure hundred sixty and fixe, Duke Galeazzo, and Blanche Maria his wife, made an accord and agreement with eight Cantons, vpon certain conditions: which yet vnto this day, are called, The Articles or Capitulations of Millaine. Wherein also, mention is made of other ancient capitulations, which shew and testifie, that long time before, the Switzers, especially they of Vri, which inhabit at the Alpes, had bene affociates with the Lombardes, vnder certaine conditions. But because the ancient Capitulations, are (almost) quite worne out of mens memories: I will propofe the Summary of the accord with Duke Galeazzo, and his wife, the Lady Blanche Maria.

The Articles of Agreement, betwene the Duke of Millaine, and the Switzers.

THE first Article, concerneth them of Vri. The Ordinary of the great church in Millaine, intended a Proceffe against them, concerning the Valley of Lwiner. By this first Article, the Duke agreed, with them of Vri, to haue free possession of that valley, in the regard of ciuill iurisdiction: renouncing his owne rightes, and promising to obtain the same of the Ordinary.

They of Vri, on the other side, shall pay a tribute to the Duke, & euery yeare, in the Moneths of Iune or Iuly, or before midde-August, shall send him foure Hawkes, and a Crosse-bow. As concerning the difference touching the Churches reuennues, betwene the Ordinary, and them of the Valley, each of the two parties shall nominate two Iudges, and to those foure Iudges, the Duke shall adde one, as an Arbitrator: and of him, he must and will make choyse among the Lords of Councell, and in one of the seauen Cantons. These Iudges, must nominate what it is, that the Prince and they of the Valley, should pay vnto the Ordinarie. And if there happen anie variance besides, for matters of Duties not payed: they also are to censure thereupon.

The second Article is, that the eight Cantons, their subiects, and all they that haue dwelt in their countries, the space of foure yeares, shall enioy the ancient liberty, to wit, that they shal stand exempt from all tributes, imposts, and tolles, throughout Millaine, euen to the ditches of the Towne.

The third Article, concerneth debts, and imprisonments.

The fourth is for such variances as may happen betwene the Duke and the Cantons, and of some particulars against the Duke.

The fifth, is for proceffe and suites of particular persons.

The sixth, matter of free Trafficke, and that it shall bee lawfull for the Switzers, to go and sell their Wares and Car-

Now, although (for diuers reasons) this agreement hath not bene renewed to this instant between the King of Spain , Duke of Millaine , and the Switzers : yet notwithstanding, both on his part, and theirs likewise, ancient amity hath bene carefully kept; and euen to this day, the Switzers enioy (almost) the same priuiledges, as in elder times they did among them of Millaine . Of the Switzers Alliances with the Dukes of Austria and Burgongne .
		Like as there hath bene no Prince or Princes, that haue made so much war vpon the Cantons, as the Dukes of Austria : so in the same manner, the Switzers did neuer make so many accords, treaties and alliances, as with those Dukes. At this time, I meane not to make mention of those	A strange course, that much contention should beget as many friendships.

To be plaine, Sigismund nor the Switzers were strong enough to make head against the Duke, and therefore some men, better sense and skil in such businesse, layd downe their opinion; that Sigismund and the Switzers were best to agree in vinity, and make war together vpon their common enemy. King Lewes the eleuenth pusht hardly at that point, and followe the matter very hotly: for it was his custome to prepare such diets for the Duke of Bourgongne , and to raise him for many enemies as might bee. To further these practises, he sent his owne tuncio with a Switzer , named Iustus de Silini , who soday after was byshop of Sion , and of Granoble also. Sigismund likewise fauored him, and gaue him as many good respects, as hee could receive by his byshoppricks. At length also by his moanes, and by authority of the King, an hereditary alliance was made, the substantiall points wherof follow thus:	Good advice in cases of extremity, much auails.
K. Lewes the 11. denied ayd to Sigismund against the Switzers.	This Sigismund , surnamed the Simple, was sonne vnto Fredericke , who brought Pope John the 22. out of the Councell of Constance , whereby he was banished from the Empire. Sigismund was a great Enemy to the Switzers , and had many warres against them, wherein he was continually beaten, as at Widerduer , Mulhausen , Walden , Sion , Turgow , and other places, & lost in these warres the countrey of Turgow , which is great, fertile, and well peopled, yet afterward conquered and kept by the Switzers . Seeing by Armes he could not quail the Switzers , hee withdrew into Fraunce , and required succour of King Lewes the eleuenth, which hee was flatly denied: because the King would not entangle himselfe in warre with the Switzers , of whose magnanimity hee had formerly made good proof, being Dolphyn when the battell was fought against them neere to Basile .	A breuiate of the Articles of hereditarie Alliance betwene the Duke of Austria , and the Switzers .	Iustus de Silini, byshop of Sion & Granoble .
Sigismund engaged Per via to the Duke of Bourgongne.	Hereupon, he made his recourse to the Duke of Bourgongne , and pawned to him the Countrey of Ferrara , and other Seigneuries on the Frontiers of Swetia , for the sum of fourscore thousand crownes: onely that he might finde busines for the Switzers , by means and help of the duke of Bourgongne . Lazius writes, that Sigismund sold Swetia it selfe, but therein he abused himself. This engagement did not aduance the matter, according vnto Sigismund 's expectation: for Hagenbach , gouernor in these pawned countries to Charles Duke of Bourgongne , began to tyrannize vpon all the people, violating women and children, and putting many innocents to death. By which occasion, Sigismund being moued to compassion, and incited by the continuall complaints of his subiects, redeemed the pawned countries, & assigned the monee to be paid at Basile . But notwithstanding all this, D. Charles would not forsake his possession, but strove still to hold the same by force. This first transaſion was made before the war of Bourgonne, in the year one thousand, foure hundred, seuentie & foure. In the same year, Sigismund bl Austria, Rene of Lorraine, the Byshoppes of Strasbourg and Basle, the Cities of Strasbourg, Basle, Colmar, Seltstad, Muhlthard, and some others, made alliance with the Switzers for certain yeeres: against the violence and tyranny of the Duke of Bourgonne, who being slaine 3. yeeres after in the battale of Nancy, Sigismund of Austria renewed the hereditary Alliance, and this first transaſion made with the Switzers, by the entermise of K. Lewis the eleuenth. This alliance was confirmed with the Cantons of Zurich, Bern, Lucerne, Fribourg, and Solothurn, with liberty to the other Cantons, to enter into the same alliance if they pleased. There was not any new Article added at that time: but onely the forme and meanes of mutual succour, which was couched in far more cleare and plainne termes. Some yeeres after this, Duke Sigismund not hauing any legitimate children, resigned his Dukedome to the Emperor Maximilian, reseruing onely to himselfe an annual pension. Maximilian required the Switzers to enter the forenamed alliance with him. But because they had bene at some variance with him, and hee with them, and there grew some apparance of warre (considering it seemed evidently, that Sigismund had thus depoyled himselfe, to iniury the Switzers) they would not enter into any new alliance, especially, because hee meant nothing else but fraudes in all this carriage, as the euent plainly declared. For immediately, they of Austria, and of the league of Swabia, moued warre against the Switzers and Grisons.

If two sentences be giuen, hauing as many voyces on the one side as other: the Iudges shall elect a subarbitrator in one of the cantons, that shall haue no part of interest in the Process. As for causes betwene particular persons; they are to be decide d by Iudges of the places.

In like manner, if the Duke haue any warre in his owne hand, & demanndeth succour the Switzers shall send him fixe thousand foot, or more, to each man whereof the Duke shall pay 6. Liures Tournois, for wages euery Moneth. If (ouer and aboue this number) hee demanndeth some other Switzers, that desire to goe to warre vpon their owne good will towards him: hee shall not stand bound to pay them any wages, but what he will do out of his owne liberality.

The Duke may demand no seruice of the Switzers, in any nauall warre, nor cause them to passe the Seas: but onely to defend the countries, which they possesse at the day of making this alliance.

To the end that this accord may bee fitly kept, the Duke nor the Switzers shall meddle with any affaires of strangers, to debate any thing to the preiudice of their alliance: neyther shall they giue right of Bourgeship, to any subiects of Swetia or Sauoye, but onely to such, as shall haue their persons and goods transported into eythers countries.

While this alliance endureth, the Duke shall yearly pay in the City of Berne, to each Canton, the summe of two hundred crownes.

Vpon the ending of this alliance, which lasted almost 25. yeares, the King of France, Frances the first, despoyled Duke, Charles of the most part of his countries. And in this warre, the Bernians taking in hand the cause of their fellow-Bourgeses of Geneua, with them of Fribourg and Valois: tooke all the Dukes places in the countries of Faut, county of Romont and Tuain. After this time, the Emperour Charles the fift (in the protection of who the Duke of Sauoy was put) was in war continually in Piedmont against the Fréché: and that was the cause of breaking the renewing of the alliance. At length, Philbert, the Sonne of Charles, hauing recovered his countries, by the meanes of peace betweene the Kings of Spain and France: made a new and perpetuall alliance with the Cantons of Lucerne, Suits, Vri, Vnderwald, Zug, and Soleurre. It is (almost) the very same as the former: but onely that there is no mention made (to my remembrance) of mutuall succour. Soone after, the other Cantons renewed with him, the very same conditions of ancient amity and alliance.

CHAP. XLII.

Of the Alliances betweene the Switzers and the Kings of France.

King Lewes the 11. was the first King of France, that allied himselfe with the Switzers, and that assigned rewards & pensions annuall to all the Cantons. Being as yet Dolphin, hee led a great Army into Germany, conducted by the Count of Armignac. This hee did in fauor of Pope Eugenius, and of the Emperour Fredericke; onely to breake the councill of Basile, as the Pope desired: and furiously to invade the Switzers, whom the Emperour hated, and to break off their sledge (in meere despight of them) which they had plantd before the city of Zurich, because he was allied with the house of Austria. The Switzers had another Army before the castle of Fransterg: 1600. men whereof, they sent thence, to succour Basile & the Fathers there in the councill.

Being about 2. miles from Basile, they did set vpon the Dolphins troops so slyly, as (although in regard of their enemies multitude, who had enclosed them on all sides) they were euery man (almost) slaine in the field: yet notwithstanding, they lo weakened the French Army (for there were slaine about 6000. of them) that the Dolphin standing in feare of a further losse, and of the valour of the Switzers; tooke his way suddenly home to France, leaving the businesse vnexecuted, that the Dolphin seeing his enemies slaine bodies lying on the ground, saide thus. Sometimes with farre lesse forces, and in the space of three houres; I haue broken an Army of thirteen thousand men, without any such paine or danger as I haue met with heere, labouring a whole day toughly, to ouercome a little handfull of men. Neuer hadde I to deale with more valiant and fast enemies; and therefore I will take order, for euier warring any more against them. Which hee most truly and faithfully performed a long time after,

euen vntill he came to the crowne.

Hee neuer loued Charles Duke of Bourgonne, and yet durst not make open warre on him, because hee was not well appointed for it: and therefore hee laboured by all meanes, to fet the Duke a iustling with the Switzers. But to compasse his intent the more easily, and haue the Switzers at his command, when hee should stand in need of their assistance: he made an alliance with them for ten yeares, giuing as an annuall pension to each Canton, the summe of feuen thousand Liures Tournois. During the warre of the Duke of Bourgonne against the Switzers, the King furnished them with a great summe of money: as fearing least (through want of coine) they should giue ouer contending, and talke of truce. The Duke being foyled at Morat; the King gaue publickly great gifts to the Switzers, and in particular to their Captaines and Colonels. Finally, after the death of the Duke, slaine in Lorraine: to set an imbarment, that (by right of warre) the Switzers should not possesse themselves of Bourgonne, where there were many men that nodded the head at their deuotion: hee bought the country for a goodly summe of money. And because he must needs make warre, to get into possession of the country: hee made vse of the foote Switzers to serue him, giuing to them farre greater wages, then euery any Prince had done before.

Charles the eight, sonne to Lewes, in the yeare, one thousand, foure hundred, foure score and three, renewed the alliance which his father had made with the Switzers; and vfed their seruice in the warre, wher hee ouercame the Duke of Bretaigne. But principally in the warre of Naples, hee diuers wayes made good proofe, that the warlike Switzers, were both loyall and valiant of their persons. His successefull, Lewes the twelfth, hauing vndertaken the conquest of Millaine, and very desirous to turne the Switzers, from the amity they bare to Duke Lodowick Sforza; made alliance with them for ten yeares. At the end whereof, hee thanked the Switzers, & denyed to pay the rewards and yearly pensions, which hee had payed in publike and to particular persons. Which so highly offended this martiall people, as partly of their own inclination, but much more by meanes of the Cardinall of Sion, who solicited the principals of the cantons; they made a league with Pope Nilius the second, in the yeare, one thousand, five hundred and ten. Centenies afterward, this King laboured to make a new alliance: but the Switzers beeing ioynd with the Pope, would neuer listen to it. But in the yeare, one thousand five hundred and twelue, they droue the French out of Millaine, and re-established Maximilian Sforza in the Dukedome. Then the yeare following, they ouerthrew the French at Nouara, and came with a maine Army along to Bourgonne.

Lewes the twelfth, had his Sonne in law Frances de Valois for his successeur: who wonne a memorabill battaile against the Switzers, when hee ouercame them at Maringano: Hee brought into France, Maximilian Sforza, and made himselfe Lord of the Dukedome of Millaine. After a victory so remarkable, knowing well, how bloody it had bin, and at how deere a price the French had bought it: the first thing hee did, was (to winne the good fauour of the Switzers) a kinde agreement made with them, ioyning them to his crowne, by a firme and durable alliance. The conditions and treaties of this peace and mutual amity, are comprized in these thirteene Articles following.

First, all enmities, dissentions, warres, differences and quarrelles in precedent times, are utterly brought to nothing; and as for particular variances, which concern nothing in common with the occasions of warre, they shall stand vterly void, by those Articles of agreement, made betweene the Duke of Millaine, King Lewes the twelfth, and the Cantons.

Secondly, all prisoners, in what part or place foueer they are deteyned as prisoners, or as slaues; they shall be released and set at liberty, without paying any ranfome.

Thirdly, if any man at Armes of the Switzers, haue any suite against the King of France, not for any matter of warre, he may contest in iustice, according to the Articles following.

Twelfty, the king leaueth it in choise to the Switzers, to declare within the compasse of a yeare, whether they affect or no: to hold the countries and castles of Lugano, Locarna, and of the Vale Madia; or else to forsake them, for the sum of thirtie thousand crownes of the Sunne. And if they take the money: then they of the Vale of Telina, and of the county of Clauenna, shall haue their part in this summe, as much as one of the Cantons.

For continuance of this amity.

The last Article ordaineth, that this peace and amity betweene the Realme of France and the cantons, shall continue inuiolable and perpetual.

Exception made by the King of France.

The king excepteth in this peace, Pope Leo the tenth, the See and Romane Empire, the kings of Spain, of England, of Scotland, of Nauarre, and of Denmarke: The Dukes of Sauoy, of Lorraine, of Guel-dres: Item, the Duke & common-wealth of Vence, Laurentius de Medicis, the house of Medicis, and the common-wealth of Florence: The Bishop of Liege, and all the confederates of the king.

Exception made by the Switzers.

The Switzers also except on their part, Pope Leo the tenth, the See of Rome, the Emperour and Romane Empire; the house of Austria; the Dukes of Sauoy, and of Wurtemberg; the family of Laurentius de Medicis; the common-wealth of Florence, the Marshall of Bourgonne, their ancient alliances; and all their allies and fellow-Bourgeois.

The reason of these exceptions.

The reason for these exceptions, is, that if the king of France make warre vpon any one of them aboue named, in his own countries: the Switzers may keepe what promise or alliance they haue formerly made or sworne, to those Princes or common-wealths. But if one or more of those Princes or common-wealths, come to assault the king in his owne kingdom: the Cantons shall not permit any of their Subiects to goe in warre against the king; but shall countermand them, as it is ordayned in the eight Article, and which they are to keepe and obserue inuiolably.

To these conditions is added the forme to be kept in the deciding of strifes and differences. But it seemeth to me, that it would bee great losse of time and paper paper to insert it: because it agreeth almost altogether, with the accord of Millaine, and other formes of iudgements, whereof we haue spoken heretofore. All this conference and treaty of peace, was made by the Ambassadors on eyther side, and sette downe in writing, in the Towne of Fribourg, on S. Andrews day, in the Moneth of Nouember, and in the yeare 1556.

The King made a more strict alliance with the Switzers.

The King hauing made pacification with the Switzers, as already hath beene declared: yet hee would needs proceede somewhat farther, and allie them more strictly to his crowne. Which also he obtained, and that agreement was past at Lucerna, five yeares after the fore-mentioned peace. Then all the Cantons (except Zurich) and all their confederates, allied themselues with the King of France: and the renour of that alliance was as followeth,

The Tenure of a more nere agreement, made betweene the King and the Switzers.

Concerning warre in any place belonging to the crowne, and luyes of men.

1. If any one (whosoever it be) make war within the Realme of France, in the Dukedome of Millaine, or any other country appertaining to the crown, eyther on this side, or beyond the Mountaines: the King may make a leuie of Switzers, when and at what time himselfe shall thinke meete, to wit, of fixe thousand men at the least, and seauen thousand at the most, except the Lords of the Leagues will permit more.

For choise of Captaine and Colonelle out of the cantons.

2. Hee may also chuse out of all the Cantons and confederates, such Colonels and Captaines as he shall thinke fit: provided, that they be men of good fame and credite.

Against hindering or men and delay of time.

3. The Lordes of the Leagues shall giue no hindrance to those Colonels, Captaines, and Soldiers, neither delay time, or put any case in question, to hinder their going: but that within ten daies after that first day, whereon the King required succour, they shall bee permitted to march away.

For continuance in the Kings seruice, except warres be at home in Swetia.

4. They shall continue in the Kings seruice, vntill the end of the warre; if it seeme good to him, and they not recalled home by their Lords: The King shall also pay them (euery one) his accustomed wages. But if there happen warre in Swetia, and that thereby the cantons cannot succour the King, as they otherwise would: In this case, they shall sit and quire of their promise, and they may suddenly countermand home their men; to whom also the King stands bound, to grant their departure immediately.

When the King shall haue occasion to make war.

5. If the King would make warre vpon his enemies: he may make the same leuie of fixe thousand Switzers at the least, and seuen thousand at the most; chusing Colonels and Captaines, men of faire and good fame, which are Switzers, or of their Allies.

An Army of Switzers not to be diuided, &c.

6. The King may not separate an Army of Switzers, or diuide them in troops for Garrisons in diuers places: and they are not to serue at Sea, but on the land.

Wages agreed on for the Switzers, & in what manner it is to be paid, vpon the due of three Months pay.

7. As concerning the wages for the Gendarmery; it is agreed on both sides, that the King shall pay for a Moneth vnto each Switzer Soldier, foure Florins and an halfe, of them that are called florus du Rhin. And their wages shall begin on the day, when they set forth from their houses: and then shall three Moneths pay be due vnto them, although the King do not vse them in seruice so long. And before they part out of Swetia, they must receiue the first Moneths pay: and the rest for the two other Moneths, at meete places, according as need shall require. If after those three Moneths are past, the King will longer retaine the Switzers; hee shall pay them the same wages euery Moneth, vntill such time as they may commodiously returne home to their owne house.

Pay for men of higher rank & place, according to their degrees.

8. The Colonels, Captaines, Ensigns, Ambassadors, & others that haue charge in the troopes; shall bee payed after their accustomed manner, and according as the Predecessours to the Kings of France haue done.

Concerning incourt to lodge sent the Switzers, wher war is made on them.

9. If any war is made vpon the Switzers, the King of France shall stand bound to succour them at his owne cost: sending them two hundred compleat horsemen, and twelue peeces of Artillery, with all their equiPAGE and furniture; to wit, six peeces for battery, and fixe Canons. Moreover, hee shall furnish the Switzers (from three Moneths to three Moneths) in the city of Lyons, with certaine sums of of money, for expences in the warre. And if the Switzers affect it rather: instead of two hundred complete horsemen, the King shall giue them all the three Moneths, the sum of two thousand crownes at the least.

10. If it come so to passe, that if (thorough occasion of moued warre here or there) the Switzers cannot haue any Salt: it may be bought for them in France, & so bee conuayed home into their countries.

11. No side or party shall receiue into protection, neyther bestow Bourgeship on any of the others subiects, nor succor, lodge, or defend men banished, or enemies to cyther side: but according to the Articles of peace, shall hinder & expulse them.

12. Finally, the King being willing to make knowne his loue and good will towards the Switzers: ouer and beside the twenty thousand Francks, which he promised to pay them by the treaty of peace, further promiseth, to pay yearly to each one of the Cantons (while this alliance shall continue) the summe of a thousand pounds Tournois. He will also pay to the confederates, the moiety of the pension which they had before.

The King excepteth Pope Leo the 10. The Romane See and Empire; the kings of England and of Scotland: the Duke of Sanoye, of Lorraine, of Halstata, and of Guelbres; the common-wealth of Venice, and of Florence; the house of Medici; the Marquesses of Brandenbourg and of Monferrat.

The Cantons do likewise except Pope Leo the tenth, the Romane See and Empire; the common-wealth of Florence; the house of Medici; the Duke of Sanoye; the house of Austria; their alliances, their Bourgeses and confederates; the Duke of Wirtemberg; and Ottavian Maria Sforza, Bishop of Landa.

Neuerthelesse, if any of these aboue named, make warre on cyther of these parties, in their countries on this side, or beyond the Mountaines: the other shall giue succour, without exception of any person, according to the tenour of this alliance, which is to endure while King Frances liueth, and three years after his death.

This alliance being expired, K. Henry the second, Sonne and Successor to king Frances, contracted a new alliance with the Cantons, vpon the same conditions before named: and that alliance lasted 5. yeares after his death. Now because the Dukedome of Millaine, and some other Prouinces, comprehended in the alliance made with king Frances, were dismembred from the crowne, when this new league was contracted: It is expressly set downe, that the Switzers shall not stand obliged, to giue the king any succour, for recovery of those countries. But if he can reconquer them by the ayde of another Army, and he shall bee Lord of them againe, as of other Prouinces belonging to his Kingdome: for the better conseruation of them, the Cantons shall furnish him with men, who shall likewise attend him in warre, for the recovery of Bullen, and the county of Bullenois in Picardy.

If the king will goe in person to some warre, hee may make choise (at his pleasure) of Captaines Switzers, and command a leuye of fixe thousand men at the least.

He may not disioyne or separate the Switzers Army, when hee is vpon the point of giuing battaile: but out of such occasion, he may plant the in Garrisons, in Townes and strong places, to defend them.

As for the wages, rewards, & succors, which the king is to giue vnto the Switzers; it beareth the very selfe-same reason as is in the precedent alliance; and the other Articles doe agree with them before mentioned.

And to the ende, that the treaty of peace, made in the yeare 1516. may remaine firme, when wages rest vnpaid, it is thus ordained. The demander shall acquaint his Magistrate with the matter, to whom, if the cause seeme vpright; he shall goe or send to the kings Ambassadors, which are in Swetia, or if they be absent, the Magistrate shall write to the king, and require satisfaction for the party. If the king yeelds to reason, the demander is satisfied; but if he refuse to pay according to equity; the demander may then call his cause before Iudges and Arbitrators, and there haue it debated. And if the King yeelds to reason, the demander is satisfied; but if he refuse to pay according to equity, the demander may then call his cause before Iudges and Arbitrators, and there haue it debated. And if the King will not yeeld to the Iudges his part, the Switzers may passe on to further knowledge of the facts, and what they appoint, shall be allowed for firme and auailable to cyther party, euen as if the Iudges on cyther side had therein assited.

This alliance was treated and past at Solleurre, in the yeare, 1549. All the Cantons (except Berne and Zurich) with their confederates, being bound thereto.

Finally, King Charles the ninth, Sonne to King Henry, renewed this alliance with the Switzers, vpon conditions litle differing from the former: and that alliance continueth yet to this day, after the kings death.

THE MANNER OF GOVERNMENT obserued among the Switzers.

THE SECOND PART.

WEc haue shewne in our first Part, of what parts & parcels, the common-wealth of the Switzers is composed; for what causes, & with what conditions these people, dwelling in diuers places, allied themselves together, to make vp one body of a Commonwealth. Also with what industry and trauaile, they haue maintained their liberties; and with what Princes and peoples, they haue associated and leagued themselves. In this second Booke, wee shall declare, how this common-wealth is gouerned. And because the confederates haue (each one) their Magistrats, Lawes, and particular gouernment, and that the cantons do make one common-wealth apart, and yet there is a councill in common to the whole Nation, and laws and ordinances, to whose obseruation all are obliged: First, I will make mention of the Switzers commonwealth in generally; then I will describe the estate and gouernment of the Cantons, feueral-ly in their places.

They that haue written concerning common-wealths, doe set downe three sorts.

The first, when all the managing and gouernment of the common-wealth, is in the power of one only, who is called a King, if he gouerne iustly, with consent of the people, and according vnto the lawes; for if he do otherwise, he is a Tyrant.

The second, when a small number of principall men, and more people of good behaviour, do gouerne.

The third, when all the people haue the authority in their hands.

Thus there are three kinds of Commonwealths, to wit, Monarchy, Aristocracy, & Democracy: who haue for their vicious shaddowes, Tyranny, Oligarchy, and Anarchy.

We cannot compare or sute the Switzers common-wealth, with any of these before named: but as (aunciently) the great Commonwealths of Rome and Carthage, and (in our time) that of Venice may be termed mixt and compounded, because (in some matters) they shared or rooke part, with all the three kinds of gouernments; so in like maner, the commoweth of the Switzers is mingled or composed of a Seigneuriall, Lordly, and Popular government. For among all the people, of whom the whole common-wealth of the Switzers is compounded: there are some, whose government is merely democratically, & where all things (almost) are done by the deliberation of the people. As in those Cantons that haue no cities, to wit, Vri, Suits, Vnderwald, Glaris, and Appenzell: yea, euen in Zug, although it is a city. The other are gouerned by Lords, as cities commonly vse to be, namely Zurich, Berne, Lucerna, Basile, Fribourg, Solleurre, and Schaffouse. But because the Soueraignty appertaineth to the people, who doe elect these Lords, these common-wealths are compounded of two kinds of gouernment: so that notwithstanding, the one is more Aristocratically, and the other more Popular.

Three feueral kinds of gouernments, & their hurtfull shaddowes.

So then, the common-wealth of the Switzers being compounded of people, that haue not all one, and the same forme of gouernment: the order and policy also is very diuers and mixt. For if vpon some dayes of audience, ambassadors do aduise on matters of the whole common-wealth, or end some differences: this appeareth to be a gouernment merely Aristocratically. And yet neuertheless, because they are (for the most part) elected by the people, and that in causes and affaires of importance, they cannot go beyond their aduice, but deale according to the peoples command, to whom they must render an account of their negotiation: it may easily bee noted, that such a kinde of gouernment is not altogether Aristocratically.

Now it plainly appeareth, that the Switzers common-wealth cannot bee better gouerned, by the liberties which they do enioy, was gotten by their ancestors, nor by the industry and power of one, or of a small number of particular men: but the people themselves were employed therein, and did enfranchise it with the expence of their purses, blood, and liues. And therefore it is no more then reason, that they should reape some fruit of their trauaile. And as concerning, that it seemeth incommodious and perillous in a popular estate, that all men should deliuer their aduice, but rather, that it ought to be done by them of most wisdom, and men of best quality: This danger is not to bee doubted in the Switzers Common-wealth, for they do most in-employ, and send on their dayes of audience, the best and wisest persons of each Canton. And although they haue not power to conclude definitiue (because it might be a dangerous consequence, for the peoples liberty) yet notwithstanding, they are as the chiefeest counsellors, and make a conference of opinions, vpon the State affaires. Afterward, the people giue their content, by assemblies which they make in Townes and Villages. Now such as are not altogether stupid and ill-affected, may know and approue, that which hath bene deliberated in those dayes meetings, for common benefit: considering, they giue them plainly to vnderstand euery thing.

CHAP. II.

Of the manner and behaiour of the Switzers in the times of both peace and warre.

Forasmuch as the right gouernment of a common-wealth, is best discerned in affaires and managements of peace and warre: it behooueth vs to shew how our predecessours haue carried themselves therein. As concerning exercises of war, beside that which nature hath done, in fashioning the Switzers fit thereto: necessity also hath constrained them, to apply their paines, and that in good earnest. The Country is Mountainy, sharpe, and hard for culture, anciently desert and savage for the most part, making the people not onely indurate and hardened for trauaile: but also robuste, stiffe, & strong, and so (by consequent) very apt for warre.

Now as naturally the people of Europe are more magnanimous and warlike, then they of Asia: so the Europeans which which dwell in Mountainous and hard countries, are reputed to be more martially minded then the other. Prooofe hereof appeareth, in the histories of the Goths, Vandales, Hunnes, Lombards, Franconiens, and other people, who being bred in the very coldest countries of the North: did yet disperse themselves ouer the fairest parts of Europe, and eyther foraged, or troubled them, treading vnder their feete the power of Rome, sometimes so much renowned through the world. In like manner, as the very coldest countries of the Alpes, do beare the highest and tallest Trees, and haue beasts more fatte and faire then can be desired: so the naturall disposition of the country, and temperature of the ayre, produceth men more robuste and strong then others are. Wherefore, in many Countries, some are men for Armes, others are labourers, and others are artisans: but in Switzerland, all are Soldiours borne, euen by a meere manner of desire, and there is not a Switzer, (provideth hee haue stature and apt disposition) but in him may bee seene the very liues (to life) of a man of warre.

And because almost all the neighbors to the Cantons, but especially the Princes of Austria, laboured by continuall warres, to annihilate the liberty of the Switzers, and that for the space of two hundred yeares: meere necessity made the Switzers martiall, being compelled to carry weapons daily in their hands, to maintaine their liberty, bridle the headstrong courses of their enemies, & to preserve their wities and children. And as it was said of Agessilus, after he was wounded by the Thebanes in an encounter, that he receiued worthy wages, for teaching them the art of warre: euen so Noble-men that entrusted the olde Switzers, simple peasants, and shepheards, to handle a Sword, and compelled them to vnderstand the trickes of fencing, receiued (in the end) the recompence for their apprenticeship, hauing bene so many times beaten in battailes, and finally driuen out of Switzerland.

From hence it ensued, that their lawes & customes were accommodated to the exercises of warre. For whereas in many Countries, the people are forbidden to carry and manage weapons: so on the contrary, there is none so young in Swit- zerland, dwell he in City, Town, Village, or Field, be he a peasant, porter, or of the very basest condition can be desired; but he is strictly commanded to haue Armes, according to his quality. And because that in our time, the Harquebuz or Calliuer was in great vse for warre: there was a prize and reward propoted in publicke, for such as would exercise, and couldexteriously handle these fiery weapons. Not only in Citties, as was done in many parts of Germany: but also in the most peopled Townes and Villages. Nay, there was a prize and reward appointed for children; that could draw the bow to the end, that they might afterward be the better fashioned for weapons of more danger, which prooued to such an expert practise, that from their very youth, they accustomed themselves to discharge the Calliuer.

Their other pastimes also fauored all of war. For they neuer vsed to meete together, were it on solemne daies & festiuals, according to the Churches dedications, or at weddings and other such like occasions, but with Drums and Trumpets for war. And it was (and still is) a great honor for a Bride-groome, to be attended on with a great number of Pikes, Halberbs, & Shot, who (vntreated) march before him, or come to honour his feast, in the nature of a muster, marching after the manner of war. Many times also, boyes of 8. or 10. yeares old, and others somewhat more aged, meet together and make musters, with Drums & Ensignes, some bearing Calliuers, others Halberbs, & others Pikes: so that to see them march, it might well be said, that they had hearts & hands already apt to manage those warlike weapons. In this manner, they that neuer vnderstood any thing set downe in the Military precepts of Vegetius, nor of any other, inured from their infancy, without any command: but onely of their owne motion, and by a naturall inclination to Armes, can carry and manage themselves with countenances and stepping fits for Soldiours. In many places, euery yeare, or at certain times of the yeare, the Lords cause general musters in arms to be made for all their followers, as if they were going to war against the enemy. These musters are sometimes performed at the dedication of Temples, sometimes at Fairs; and in some other places, when the Subjects take their oath to a Gouvernor, sent newly to some Baylwick, for then they all muster, and shew themselves in Armes.

It is altogether needlesse, that I should make any long discourse of other exercises, which do dispose the to be the more valiant in war: as to runne, leape, throw the stone and barre, to wraffle, to shew all kindes of defence fit for Arms; for which there are prizes publicly appointed euery yeare. Morcouer, I am of the minde, that in all christendome, there is not any people, that do exercise themselves more in swimming, then the Switzers: who (with much ease) can vie that Arte, swimming thorough great Lakes, Ruers, Streames, and very impetuous floods, where-with the country doth greatly abound. When they are at leysure, and haue done their husbandry in the fields: they daily follow hunting, sometimes ouer the highest Mountaines and Rockes, almost inaccessible, after wilde Goates, Kids, and other beasts. At other times they pursue Beares, Wolves, Ounces, & wilde Boares, reputed it as an honour to him that can kil one of those sauage creatures, and fasten his head at the entrance of his doore; yet sometimes hee makes a present of it to the Seigneury. The Grecians had an ancient custome among the, to give the heads of wilde Boares, vnto Gentlemen or Gouvernours of the country, as an honourable present after hunting.

Now we are to declare, how the Switzers doe carry themselves in warre. First then, I will make mention of their Arms: next, how they chuse and enroule their Soldiours: And consequently, of other things belonging to the acte of warre. Let me then tell you, that (ordinarily) the Switzers Souldiours are well furnished with Armes in their houfes: yet (oftentimes) the Citties and Towns do fit them with Armes, which are kept in their publick Arsenalles and Magazines. Their Armes are commonly those of the Germane Lance-knights, to wit: the Harquebuzze, or Caluier, or Musket; the Pike of eightene foote in length; the Halbert: the Courtlace, and Sword made apt for both hands. They weare also a long Sword by their sides, whereas their ancestors did weare one farre shorter on their thighes, proper to ioyne with the enemy neuer hand, and to giue him the Stoccado.

Now adayes, ouer and beside this long Sword, they weare a large Poniard or Dagger, of three or foure fingers bredth, and sharpe pointed: which the very meannest of them do adorne and enrich, with curious workmanship of gold and siluer. Some weare shirtes of Mayle; others Corselets, or a good Cuirats for the body.

The poorer sort, and especially the Muskettiers, content themselves with a Murrian or head-peece. Some, in stead of Armes plated with yron or Steele, make vse of skinned Beares or Buffelles: Others weare doublets of linnen cloth, redoubled in iust thickeesse, and made full of oylet-holes, and these doublets thus made, are not easily to bee transpierced. For the rest, as Polybins writeth, that the braue Parado or Romane Soldiour, vsed to weare a Panache of three plumes, red or blacke, about the length of a foote and an halfe, because this addition to the rest of his furniture for warre, made the Soldiour seeme to be twice greater and higher, then he was indeed, much more comely to looke on, and terrible to the enemy. Euen for the Switzers Soldiours, who coe to appeare lightly among all other, do weare on their heads a Plume of Feathers, one part white, and the other answerable to the Ensigne, or Colours of their distinct Cantons.

They beare euery man vpon his Arms, a white crosse, plaine and right, which is the Switzers Ensigne of war: Each man yeelds himselfe vnder the Standard of this Canton. They serue their tune with Drums, Fifes, and Trumpets: yet in such sort, notwithstanding, that the Drums of the Switzers are easily discerned from them of the Allemans or Germanes, because the found of the Switzers Drum is weighty and deepe, and the other more blustering. Particularly, they of Vri vie in warre, a Cornet made of a wilde Bulles home. They of Fnderuuld do the like. The Lucernians oftentimes vse a Cornet of Brasse, which they say was giuen them by Charlemaigne.

Now as concerning the enrollement of their Soldiours, it is done in manner following.

What they vie now at this present day in their due order.

When they march forth abroad to war

The care of the old Switzers in their enroulement.

A reason concerning the name of Germanes, and how it came vp at first.

A great happinesse to be among such men, and in such a campe.

If warre be made vpon the Switzers, and that they are assailed in their owne country; as no person was excused at Rome, when Hanniball was at the gates of the City; eue: so (without the least delay) all such as are able to carry Armes, they lay command on, to run with speedylucour, as to a sudden and dangerous fire, which euery hand ought helpe to quench. Yet in all this, they proceede by good order; for in the time of peace, each Canton hath certaine Capitaines, Ensignes, and chosen men, that ought still to be ready vpon any warning. But because it cometh to passe more often, that they must leade their troops out of their country, and all are not meete for marching, neither ought to be drawne abroad, for the country should be left naked of men of warre, and so remaine as a prey to the enemy: Then one neighbour makes choise of another for his companion, and according to the aduice of Xenophon, the very strongest Army that can bee imagined, is that which is compounded of friends and companions.

The ancient Switzers well knowing this, tooke especial care, that in their enroulement, friends, and such as knew one another, might be ranked together. And heereupon they ordained, that in warre, Switzers should aide each other, & loue together like brethren, throwing of all particular hatreds, which they could formerly pretend one against another. The other Allemaigne Soldiours had a custome to call one another brother: in regard whereof, some haue thought, that our ancient named them Germanes, which is as much to say, as brethren. Yet notwithstanding, they were all (almost) at the Swords point one against another, & (very often) the furious Lance-knights, who by their hackt and slasht faces, seeme to breathe no other word but warre: haue receiued more cuts and gashes by their friends and companions, then from their enemies.

On the contrary, ordinarily in the Switzers Campe, there is a very great tranquility, & one louing another (thogh otherwise they know not at all) euen as if they were brethren. And when they are the very greatest enemies in the world: yet notwithstanding, for the good and quietnes of their country, they renounce all spleene & particular quarrels. Whereof I will declare a memorable example, which oftentimes (in my youth) I heard reported by my ancestors.

Two Switzers being deadly enemies, to wit, Arnould of Fnderuuld, who afterward was a great Capitaine, and Zerchintes of Zurich, both of them very valiant men, and meete for war. It came to passe, that during the warre of Suaba, they were both at one time in the Campe: when the cheefe Leaders (knowing their enmity) commanded them to be friends, and (as then) to forget their ancient quarrels. It happened in a certaine encounter, that Arnould was round engirt with his enemies: which Zerchintes perceiuing, came with his companions to relecue him; and did set him free from the danger wherein he was. In the euening, being returned to the Campe, Arnould went to the Tent of Zerchintes, and called to him by his name. His fellows and followers, being ignorant of that which had happened, were perfwaded by their owne opinion, that he came to challenge combat with the other: Wherefore they stept betwene them, & admonished Arnould, to remember the command giuen by the Captains, and to take heede of mouing any trouble in the Campe. He answered, that he came with a quite contrary disposition, and so acquainted them with all the aduenture. And instantly presented to Zerchintes a very goodly horse, fit for warre seruice, which he had wonne in that daies trauaile. From that time forward, euen to the houre of death, they were very louing and intimate friends.

As the ancient Switzers shewed themselves brethren, in succouring and assisting their companions, doing as they would be done to themselves: so did they obserue the same forme, in sharing and diuiding a gorten booty. For first of al, they gaue prohibition on paine of death, that no man of theirs, should bee so hardy or bold, as to forsake his ranck & the troops, vntill such time as the enemy should bee driuen in route. Afterward, when the Capitaines had giuen licence to rifle and ransacke; all the booty was brought in common, & distributed by the poll. And because the cantons are publicly vntied, euen so the publicke booty, as Artillery, Cattel, conquered Countries, Tolle, and other reuennues, are parted among them by equal portion. Albeit there are some of the Cantons, that doe furnish out twice, thrice, and some whiles five times more Soldiours, then others doe. Neuertheless, extraordinarily and particularly, recompence is giuen, and gifts bestowed vpon Soldiours, that haue borne themselves valiantly, & performed some braue exploit in the warre, beyond the fortune of their companions: and also to those Cantons in like manner, that haue bene more employed and charged, then the other.

Forasmuch also, as victuals and other munitions, are in warre to bee especially considered: the ancient Switzers ordained, that such as brought victuals, Arms, or other necessary things, and came to sell them in the Switzers campe, they should be fauoured & maintained, in all respects as if they were Switzers. There is also a perpetuall law, and established by length of time, that in warre, Temples and other places destined for the exercise of Religion, should be left intire and vntoucht. And that no outrage should be offered to maids nor women: but onely to such, as shall giue Armes to enemies, or acte the parts of Soldiours, by hurling stones, or hurting in some other manner.

As concerning the manner of camping, and ranging themselves in battaile; it is needlesse for me to shew here, that which the Switzers do in particular, or in common with the other Germans. Only I will say, that in our time, and by the memory of our ancestors; among all Infantry, the battalions of the Switzers hath alwayes bene highly esteemed. For being compoled of Pikes crossed, it resembleth a Porcupine, so that such as vnderstand the affaires of warre, doe iudge, and experience hath approoued it, that this battailon, may beare head against the horsemen. In the battaile of Nouara, the Infantry of the Switzers being not covered with any horse: foiled and droue in route, the French Infantry and Horsemen. Afterward, on the day at Marignano, hauing had battaile against king Francis, two seuerall dayes, which they lost, by reason of the thundering Artillery, and multitude of their enemies: Neuertheless, though vanquished, yet they returned to Millane, ranged in battaile, so that their retreat seemed nothing like a flight; and yet the French (for all their victory) durst not follow them. It is not long since, when on the day at Dreux, in the first Troubles, the Keltres & the French Cavalery, liuely charged the battailon of the Switzers, and slew the most part of their Captaines: yet notwithstanding, the Switzers rallied themselves three times, and kept their ranks so well, that euen in that battaile, their enemies confessed themselves, that they were very valiant & warlike men.

But let vs leaue such discourse to men of warre, and shew you how the Switzers busie themselves in the times of peace, & how they are ordered from their infancy. First, as concerning letters and learning, which holds the first ranke: I freely confesse, that the ancient Switzers were not very carefull thereof. But rather they imitated the Romans therein, when they were in warres continually, against the Aequi, Volcians, Yentres, and other neighbouring people. And as they then, with rustical songs celebrated the valiancy of their ancestors: so in the same manner, the olde Switzers had vulgar songs, to remember the victories which they had obtained in warre. The Song wherein the day of Sempach is aptly described, when as Duke Leopold was slaine, is very common in Switzerland. As for knowledge of Artes, and of the Latine tongue, men of warre; bruske and vnapt to handle Bookes, rather thought, that such matters belonged to Churchmen. But in our dayes, there are to be found in all the cantons of Switzers, men learned both in the Tongues and Sciences. And as for many that vnderstand not the Latine tongue: yet they forbear not to reade Histories of all kinds, either concerning government of life, or affaires of State, or of Religion: And there are Libraries, well furnished with Bookes, written in the vulgar tongue.

Now, as concerning Schooles, it is a very long time since, that the Colledges of the Abbey of S. Gall, and of Ceire among the Grisons, were renowned, as we haue already shewne else-where. But within some certaine yeares after, letters and learning became quite banished. The Pope Pius, formerly named Aeneas Sylvius, provided an Vniuersity at Basile, from whence whence haue come many learned and excellent men: whom it is needles to name, because they are sufficiently famous, and knowne by their writings. There are also diuers notable and publike Schooles at Zurich, at Berne, and one established at Lausanna, by the Lords of Berne. Nor must I let sleepe in silence, the goodly Printing-houles at Basile, Zurich, and Geneua, renowned among them all that are in Germany.

Beside the study of good letters, wherein I haue made mention, there is loue of all vertue, and especially of Iustice, which appertained also to the maintenance of peace. For it is a matter most certaine, that the common-wealth of the Switzers is grounded vpon most great equity, and hath euermore bene famous, in regard of her iustice: as appeareth by the lawes, alliances, customes, and manner of life among the ancient Switzers, and by many examples, and particular actions. I need not make mention of their lawes, because they agree with those of other common-wealths, that are ruled by good lawes: where crimes and misdeeds are seuerely punished, without any exception of persons.

As for their alliances, the Articles of them, reported in the first Booke: do declare, with what vprightness, diligence, & faithfulness they are made. The ends of them are, that euery man may enioy his owne peaceably, and that (by a common consent) all violence may be expulst and banished. For the better governing of this case, it is expressly forbidden, to goe and assault, and make warre one vpon another, either rashly, or without iust cause. And therefore also, before Armes may be vnderaken, the wisest and most discrete persons in all the nation: in a publicke assembly, must examine the causes of the warre, and vnderstand them to be iust and lawfull. Then afterward, when question is vrge: of repulsing an enemy, it is most strictly prohibited to the confederates, that ought to giue assistance; to vse therein no fraud nor cunning. But if they be called by letters, or by messages; or admit they could not be called, the passages being fore-closed by the enemy: yet notwithstanding, they are commanded to go and giue succour, enen to their vtmost power.

Moreover, because it many times happens, that the recovery of debts and borrowed money, do beget great debates, so that such differences betweene particular persons, doe sometimes set the Cantons at variance one with another: the Articles of the alliances do euery where make mention, what course is to bee observed in the recovery of such debts, and for taking pawns, to cut off the oute great licence of lenders, and to shunne the fraudulency of borrowers. Whosoever hath bene but a meane reader of Histories, knowes very wel, what troubles haue happened in Rome, in the case of debts, at all times, and whensoever the people are oppressed by the violence of vlturers, & taxed in great summes, when they would mutiny, and demand, that the vlturers contracts might be tome in peeces, & other made of more honest nature. But the providence and vprightnesse of the ancient Switzers, made such an imbarment, that neuer was the abolition of Obligations vrge in Switzerland, although the country is not very great, nor rich, and hath bene troubled with warres continually.

Because also, that men of warre are prompt and ready, to lay hand on their weapons; and (offentimes) fight vnder a false and dangerous pretence, they being men rather quarrellous, sturdy & outrageous, then valiant; yet taking a delight in this forwardnesse of enduring nothing, as thinking it makes men magnanimous and inuincible: the ancient Switzers laboured to remedy this euill, first by imposition of great fines, on such as began the stirre, and to outrage their associates. But because choller is a furious beast, and very difficult to be bridled: to hinder him from taking carriere, and obuiate murders; they added another remedy, to wit, that such as were found present at those quarrels and debates, if they did not pacifie and hinder their proceeding, and impose on them the penalties appointed by the lawes: then themselves should be grieuously punished by the Magistrate. For they would not permit, that men should be so ouerwaided and mastered by choller, and their lawes (in the meane while) lose their power and authority. If any man committed a murder, and escaped from the hand of iustice: hee could not be receiued into any of the Cantons.

If any man were banished, for offending any one of the Cantons, or killing a man: he was to stand excluded from all the rest, except hee could proue by sufficient witness, that he slew his enemy in the mere defence of his owne body.

The Svvtizers are protectors of the oppressed.

Such hath beene, and still is, the equity of the Svvtizers in doing iustice, & punishing the faulty from time to time: that many straglers haue made their recourse to them, and haue accepted them for Arbitrators in their differences. For they do shew themselves protectors of all such as haue any wrong done to them; and vpon this their coming to them; they haue sent Ambassadors, nay, haue undertaken Armes, to re-establish in their goods and possessions, some that haue bene despoyled of them by very powerful Lords.

Examples of diuers protected & holpen to their rights by the Svvtizers.

The Cantons (in this cause) made war on the Princes of Austria, to maintain the right of the Fulachs, Citizens of Schaffhouse. And for certaine Gentlemen of Stiria, named the Gradlers: & constrained the Duke of Austria, to restore such goods as hee deteyned from them. In the like case, but of much greater importance they gaue battaile vnto Duke Charles of Bourgogne, to maintain René, Duke of Lorraine, whom Charles had disposed of the most part of his countries. In like manner also, many times haue they made warre on certaine thecues, who couering themselves with the title of Noblemen; robbed and spoyled Merchants. To soile these thecues, they haue bin faine to make out vpon them, not onely in their owne country of Switzerland; but also in countries further off, allying themselves (to effect to good a worke) with those farre off townes. By which meanes, the wayes of Switzerland haue bene made very secure: so that Merchants, charged with neuer so great summes of money, goe and come in al safety, transporting their Merchandizes whether they please, without any need of company or transport. And a pleasant Prouerbe grew thereon, that if any man carried his purse full of gold or siluer on his staves end; hee might safely passe through Switzerland, and care not how many looked on him.

The Svvtizers haue made warre vpon thecues that robbed and spoyled passengers.

Good actions are euermore worthy to be commended.

The bounty and hospitality of the Svvtizers.

Switzerland to bee highly commended. They haue not the delicates of the Italians and French, but they offer liberally those presents which the earth yeeldes them, as namely, Milke, Butter, & Honey. And who would bee afhamed, or can despise this liberality; seeing the great Patriark Abraham, entertained Angels with such viands, when they came to see him? And yet the country is not without good store of wilde Beasts and Fowles, with diuers kindes of Fishes, both in Lakes & Riuers. And as great men in times past, (so sweetly sung of in learned Poets) honoured men of worth, by giuing them flesh for their food: euen so oftentimes in Switzerland, presents are giuen to straglers, and them of the same country also, passing from one place to another, of good and delicate flesh, namely Venison, and also of very dainty Fish. But principally, the Svvtizers are liberrall and charitable to the poore, in lodging, feeding, & furnishing them with other needefull things: so that there are very few countries, wherein so many poore beggers are to be seene, as in Switzerland. I do not heere dispute, whether the Magistrate doth well, or no, in suffering or supporting them: onely I was desirous to shew heerein, the great humanity of the Svvtizers towards the poore, which resort thereto from all parts.

It is no shame to follow virtuous & good examples.

The Svvtizers are greatly charitable to the poore.

The people of Switzerland (among all other) take pleasure in Feasts and publike Banquets. In Cities and Townes, they of one trade, or of one band, haue certaine houses ordained to assemble themselves in. Euery Village (almost) hath a house by it selfe, which they call the house of good company: because they there meete, onely to maintaine loue and amity. The men doe meete there often, and sometimes the women are invited thither, to sitte and banquet with their husbands. They do not vie any sumptuous dishes or delicates, but most often content themselves with one or two kindes of meates. Many times euery neighbour bringeth his dish, and there feed friendly together, on that which was provided for their owne priuate houses. And as among the Lacedemonians it was ordained, that aged men and Magistrates should be present at banquets, to the ende, that euery man should carry himselfe honestly: the very fame is practised in Switzerland, so that all of one Trade, or of one Brotherhood, haue their distinct places, and the Magistrate, with the most auncient men, haue the higher ende of the Table allowed to them.

The Svvtizers delight not in Musike at their meetings.

They do not much delight in Musike at such Banquets, because they conceiue more pleasure in conferring together: either of particular affaires, or (oftentimes) of publike businesse. About all, when one of the most aged begins to discourse on some notable matters, which happened from his predecessors; euery one is very attentive, without the least interruption. And many times, he that hath a good & pleasing tongue, will speake loud enough on the faire deseruings of his Ancestors. The ancient Svvtizers were very sober & modest in all things, especially at publike Feasts and Banquets: so that it is a matter rare & most ignominious, if any man should be drunke in such an assembly.

The Author grewed to write that which the peoples fully compels him to do.

But I am enforced to write, and to my great greefe, that although there is more moderation in the Svvtizers Banquets, euen at this day, then in many other people of Germany: yet notwithstanding, drunkenness will not be banished, nor so vilely thought on, as in elder times it hath beene. And as Xenophon saide of the Lacedemonians (whose common-wealth hee had most highly commended) that hee durst not maintaine now in his time, that the lawes of Lycurgus were in full force, because in former times, sober and moderate people, affected rather to liue among them in great continence, then to be Lords in other Cities, where they might possesse worlds of riches: So now in the time of Xenophon, the Lacedemonians, yea, them of greatest power among them, contented to haue the gouernment of cities, as fearing they should be compelled to liue in their owne particular condition, glorifying themselves openly, of their wealth and riches. And whereas their Ancestors were studious, to make themselves become honourable, & worthy of giuing command to others: these men courted after dignities onely. So that whereas the Grecians (on their owne meere motion) made request to the Lacedemonians, that they would accept of the gouernment: matters became so contrarily changed, that the Grecians prayed & exhorted one another, to resist against the Lacedemonians, yea, and to expulse the vicerly, fearing lest they should vsurpe vpon the gouernment.

It appeareth now to me, that euen as much may befaid of the Svvtizers: for I must needs confesse, that the frugality & temperance of our auncients, in eating, drinking, cloathing, and in the whole course of life, is dead, or as if it had neuer beene at all. The Svvtizers are not now so continent and spare in liuing, as heerebefore, when they maintained their liues with the labour both of their mindes and hands, without taking wages of Kings & Princes, strangers to them. And therefore I am much afraid, lest we lose that wholly too, which yet remaineth, namely, valiancy and strenght in warre, humanity, debonarity, iustice, and vprightness. So that one day, they who (heerebefore) haue so carefully compassed amity & alliance with the Svvtizers: it is to bee doubted, may change their mindes, and study how they shall best subdue them. I desire of God, that he will turne from my country so deadly a danger; and I desire also, and exhort all them that ought to think thereon, to strue to bring in vie againe those honest ancient manners, that frugality, continence, equity, humanity, loyalty, & constancy of the olde Svvtizers in al their actions.

The Svvtizers are greatly altered from their famous progenitors.

The Authors especiall care of his country, cries honour, and of his countrymen.

CHAP. III.

Of publike assemblies and meetings, or rather of the Councill and Senate of the Svvtizers.

In all Commonwealths, three things are especially to be considered, to wit, the Councill or Senate, the Magistrate, and Iustice; for the Common-wealth of the Svvtizers hath no common Magistrates: except wee may place in that ranke, the Bayliffes and Gouernors, which are sent heere and there, not by the councill of the Common-wealth, but by each one of the Cantons in it selfe. For the rest, the coun-

The councell

zers not equal

councell of Switzerland is not alwayes equal in number; for sometimes, ouer & beside the Cantons, the other allies and confederates, especially the Ambassadors of S. Gall, of the Grisons, and of Mulhouse, doe meete together. And then this is the very greatest councell, which doe assemble but rarely, and to conferre on peace or warre, or of other affaires, which appertain equally to all the confederates.

The Ambassadors of the 13 cantons meet oftent together, but not upon all occasions.

Oftent of all other, there doe none but the Ambassadors of the thirteen cantons meete together, to consult and aduise on matters of the Common-wealth. Every man of them hath a deliberate voyce, as well as the other, and therefore, though one Canton doe send two Ambassadors: yet they shall haue but one voyce, & one aduice, because the aduice is collected according to the number of the Cantons, and not to the number of Ambassadors. Neuertheless, all the Cantons doe not send their Ambassadors at all daies meetings; as when there is question of the Bayliwicks, governed by the feauen or eight first Cantons, or of other things on them depending: then feuen or eight ambassadors onely meete together, & haue their deliberative voyces. But if there be any speech concerning the Bayliwicks of Italy, belonging to the twelue first Cantons: then those twelue ambassadors doe assemble. And as for that which concerneth the good of the whole Common-wealth: the ambassadors of the thirteene Cantons, doe then make a perfect & compleate body of councell.

The Ambassadors haue their assemblies according to their causes.

In our times, since Switzerland became diuided into factions, by reason of differences happening in Religion, they likewise instituted particular assemblies: so that the five Cantons of Lucerna, Vri, Suits, Vnderwald, and Zug, that make expresse profession of the Religion and Ceremonies of the Romane Church, & are very strictly vnited together, by speciall amity (I know not whether it bee by league or alliance) they meete together more often then the other cantons, and are (as it were) a councell apart. And therefore, when speech is made of the five small Cantons, they before named are vnderstood, and not the five first in alliance. As also in making mention of three, of feuen, or of eight Cantons: it must be considered according to the time and order, when they were entred into league; as thus Vri, Suits, Vnderwald, Lucerna and Zurich, shall be the five Cantons. Sometimes they of Fribourg and of Sollemre, assemble themselves with the five forenamed, and call themselves the feuen catholike Cantons. Now, although any in the cantons of Glaris and Appenzell, doe belong to the catholike Church, & Masse is sung in their cheefest Villages: yet notwithstanding, they are not ranked among the catholikes, because (for the most part) their people walke with them that are of the new Religion. Finally, the four Cities, to wit, Zurich, Berne, Basile, and Schaffouse, haue likewise (sometimes) their assembly apart; but yet it is not so often as the other.

The feuen Catholike Cantons, but will be to a fling under by the catholikes.

Moreouer, it is very vnease to decipher particularly, all those things whereon the councell of Switzers doe deliberate: neuertheless, I will touch some of the principall articles. The first and cheefest, is concerning war and peace, as likewise mention is made in most part of the alliances, that if a great wrong is done to one of the cantons, and it thinketh good to haue reason by armes: it must first be referred to the councell of the leagues, to the end that the ambassadors may regard together, whether the cause of warre be iust, or no, lest warre should be lightly moued, and vpon triuiall occasions. Then afterward, if it appeare to bee expedient to begin warre, and for the safety of the common-wealth, the means must next be consulted on.

Of what matters the councell of the Switzers is to take knowledge.

It chanced (in my time) that Christophor Landberg, being leagued with many Gentlemen, furiously to invade them of Rotauille, allied to the Cantons many said, that such succour ought to be sent to Rotauille, as the inhabitants desired. But the greater part of the Senators, and Deputies to the councell of Switzerland, hauing vnderstood the causes of the variance; hindred any such proceeding. For they saw plainly, that the whole State would overthrow it selfe into very great perill, and vpon silly occasion: because there was pregnant apparance, that by invading Landberg, they must thereby meddle with the Duke of Wirttemberg his neighbour, to whom the Switzers hadde beene good friends a long time. Nor could they come so neere him, without irrita-irritating (by the same meanes) many other Princes, that wer his kindred, friends, and confederates. Neuertheless, because they of Rotauille should not complaine, that they were forsaken in such a necessity: fifty Soldiers of each Canton were sent as a Garrison to their Towne, but they stayed at Schaffouse, and (soone after) the difference was pacified by Iudges, chosen for cyther side. And as the councell deliberated on the matter of warre, and whether it should be begun, or no: peace also was treated on by the same councell, and not by the Cantons in particular.

According heere to, in the warre of Suba, all the Cantons together sent their ambassadors to Basile, where they made peace with the Emperor Maximilian. So the councell of Switzerland, assembling at Fribourg; made perpetuall peace with the King, and all the Realme of France, in the yeare, 1516. The negotiation of alliances, is ioyned with that of peace: for very often in the dayes of our ancestors, and in ours also, the Cantons (by aduice of their councell) haue made alliances with neighbouring Kings and Princes. Wherein this order is kept still to this day, that no one of the Cantons can be constrained to make alliance with a strange Prince, but is to remaine at his owne liberty. As in the yeare, 1519. when all the cantons allied themselves with king Frances; they of Zurich refused to be bound, and afterward, they of Berne renounced this alliance. In like manner, when Philbert, Duke of Sauoye, obtained to enter league and amity with the Switzers: first the five small cantons began, and then Sollemre ioyned with them afterward.

The second Article, of such things as the councell of Switzerland doe ordaine, concerneth laws and ordinances. Each Canton hath his lawes and customes by himselfe, which remaine firme and inuolable: neuertheless, by a common consent, our ancestors deuised and established many publike Edicts and Ordinances. Among which number, are the fore-mentioned lawes of warre: wherewith also may the accord at Stantz bee ranked, passed betweene the eight first Cantons, and whereof we haue spoken in the first booke. Also, because Priests abused their immunities and priuiledges; they were repro-ued by a publike Edict, containing this in effect. Whosoever of the citizens or inhabitants of the cantons, be hee Priest or no, be hee a Counceller, Vassalle, or bound to the Princes of Austria: hee shall stand bound neuertheless, and promise by oath to his canton, to procure & aduance the profite thereof, and of all the confederats, and discouer speedily and in good conscience, all that may bring them any damage. This oath shall precede all other, and no obligation, how expresse soeuer it be, shall excuse them, if they go aginst this oath.

Such Priests as dwell in Switzerland, and are not of the country, may draw no man into ciuill or ecclesiasticall iustice, out of the country; except in matrimoniall and ecclesiasticall causes. If any one dare do otherwise, the Magistrats of the canton wherein he dwelleth, shall prohibite all men, not to harbour, lodge, or friend him, nor to frequent his company: none shall presume to protect him, vntill such time as hee hath renounced all forraigne iustice, and payed the charges of the party, that receiued endamagement by such iustice. Whosoever shall doe wrong to his neighbour, cyther in taking pawns against order of right, or by any other meanes: hee shall be punishable in body and goods, vntill hee haue satisfied the party. He that is not of the Church, and yet hath summond his aduersary, cyther before a Iudge of the Church, or secular, and out of the country: hee shall pay all the charges endured in that cause, in regard hee ought to plead in the same place, where the party dwelleth. No man shall assigne ouer his action to another, by which meanes he may the easier afflict the contrary party.

If any man shall renounce his Bourgeship, and thereby doe wrong to another, by drawing him into strange iustice: hee shall neuer bee receiued againe into the number of the citizens, till first hee haue made satisfaction to the party. All the cantons shall take order, that the waies be sure and safe, because both Switzers & strangers may passe securely, conuaying their Merchandizes through the country, without any manner of violence done to them: whosoever shall attempt otherwise, by common consent of all, and our helpe to the vttermost, hee shall be compelled pelled to make satisfaction, answerable to the faculties and riches as the party hath lost. No man in any Canton whatsoever, shall rescue pawne or pledge of any other, without consent of the Magistrate: neither shall do, or procure any injury to be done to his neighbour; but hee that doth the contrary, shall be compelled by them of his Canton, to satisfie the other to the uttermost damage.

All these things before recited, were agreed on, and ordained by the sixe cantons of Zurich, Lucerna, Uri, Suits, Vnderwald, and Zug. There was another Edit also published, against many Brokers of Benefices, for in regard that such fellows did oftentimes cause much trouble unto Priests, made by the Ordinaries of the places, and (vnder colour of some purchased Bulles) were so put in possession of vacant Benefices: It was concluded by common consent of all the thirteen cantons, in the year, 1520, that if such people pursued to maintain the right of such Bulles, they should be imprisoned, where if they did not renounce those Bulles, they should be drowned. I could set downe many other examples, of Edicts & publick lawes, but I thinke it needlesse: and these formerly rehearsed, are to no other end, but to let the Reader perceiue, that the ancient Switzers, who were devoutly affected to their Religion, and euermore gaue great honor to men of the church, did neuer yet (for all that) leaue the bridle so freely to them, or admit them any such licence, as was contrary to publick liberty and tranquility.

If any Embassages were to be sent out of Switzerland, for the appointing of some difference, contracting of alliance, gratifying some Prince, or exhorting some one to this or that, or else to command or declare some matters of import, or to denounce warre: Say also, that it were in Switzerland, to negotiate with some Canton, City, Towne, &c.: The counsell consults and determines what is to be done in this case: as whether it is necessary to send ambassadors of all the Cantons, or of some few only.

When there is a question in hand, for contracting alliances or leagues, all the Cantons do then send ambassadors: As when the alliance was made and signed with King Henry, not only the Cantons, but also the confederates sent their ambassadors to the King. But in many other affaires, they name but foure or fise Cantons, who send Embassages in the name of all. As the ambassadors of Zurich, Lucerna, Uri, and Glaris went to the day at Ansbourg, & obtained of the Emperor Ferdinand, confirmation of the priuiledges for their owne cantons, and for all the rest likewise. Moreover, this counsell hath charge, with reference to the Lords that assist them, to aduise on what is to be negotiated, or answering ambassadors of Kings and Princes strangers, and also of other common-wealths, as they are oftentimes met withall, in the publick assemblies of the Switzers.

Finally, the counsell aduiseeth to provide for the Prouinces, which do belong to the Cantons, to the end, they may be governed as best becometh. First of all, because that some estates are of great profit, as of Secretaries, Commisaries, Officers, Interpreters, Landmans, & Landweibel in the country of Turgow (where of the first, to wit, the Landman is Iudge criminall, in name of the ten first Cantons, and the other is as ordinary Procutor or Attorney) the counsell commits these estates to certain men, who cannot (in meane while) chuse Officers vnder them, answerable to their appetite. Moreover, if some difficult processe or suite happen in a Prouince, and the Governours or Bayliffes will not iudge according to their aduice: the whole busines is referred ouer to the counsell, where if the sentence of the Bayliffes seeme to be vnjust to eyther of the parties, they may appeale to the maine Senate or Council of the Switzers.

As for causes in the Bayliwicks and Governments beyond the Mountaines; the ambassadors (which are yearly sent thither in the Moneth of Iune) doe take knowledge of them, and end them. But for other suites on this side the Mountaines, the counsell of Bada doth iudge them: And appeale also may be made from the sentence of the ambassadors that haue giuen iudgement beyond the Mountaines, to the counsell of Bada, because that authority is greater, and their power more ample. Yet some say no, and that the appeale is to be addressed to the Cantons: that each of them may vnderstand stand the matter, and by them the difference to be decided. Also the Governours and Bayliffes, are to render an account to the counsell, of the tolles, reuenues, and fines: the annual reuenues are distributed by equal portion among the Cantons, to whom the Bayliwicks do appertaine. There is the like also of the Abbeys in those Bayliwicks, the protection and government whereof (in temporall occasions) do belong to the Cantons. In briefe, the counsell doth know all things, which concerne the administration of the Prouinces appertaining to the Cantons; they cause the Governours to render their accounts; they giue audience to whosoever can accuse them, and they punish them, if they haue defered it; eyther by depriving them of their dignities, or returning them to the Cantons that established them, to haue some other sent in their stead. To speake all in one word, the counsell takes knowledge of all matters that concerne the good and tranquility of the common-wealth: as well in the Governments and Bayliwicks, as also in the Cantons themselves.

Now concerning the authority of calling, and assembling the counsell, for the demanding of their aduice: it hath belonged (of ancient time) to the Canton of Zurich; which by a very authentick priuiledge, holds the cheefest ranke among all the Cantons. Whensoever then there is question made, to hold a generall counsell of the nation: the Lords of Zurich make knowne by their Letters to each of the Cantons, both the time & the place where they are to meete together. If any one, or more of the cantons, do thinke it necessary, that the counsell publike and general should be assembled; first they giue aduertisement to the canton of Zurich, and require by their letters, that the Ambassadors of the other cantons may meet together. But if the affairs are pressive, and require speedy deliberation, then each canton must aduertise his confederates, to be in readinesse for aduising (altogether) on that which is to be done.

Likewise the Ambassadors from Kings and Princes strangers, do demand leaue of the cantons, to present themselves at those dayes of meetings: & sometimes they make request, that one day (extraorinary) may be held for them. But on the dayes of particular meetings, they proceeded otherwise, because Zurich signifies the same to foure Townes: and when to fise or seuen catholike cantons; they of Lucerna do assemble them. There are also daies of and for particular meeting of the cantons allied to the K. of France: whose Ambassador residing at Sollesre, calleth the cantons at the Kings charge. I thinke there is permission also, for the ambassadors of the Pope, and of other kings, friends, and allies to the Switzers, to demand their dayes: provided, they are at their Masters expenses.

The ancient Switzers had no perpetuall or certaine place, for holding their daies of generall counsell: for I am perswaded, there is no one of the first eight cantons, but they made an assembly at some times, though most often it was done at Lucerna, at Zurich, Bremgarten, and at Bada. In our time, the custome hath bene (not by any law or ordinance purposely made for it) that the Switzers kept their dayes at Bada, in the Townehouse: and so much the rather, because the Towne hath many commodities for such assemblies. First, the place is beautified with goodly buildings, and very apt Innes or houses of lodging. The situation of the place is pleasant and healthfull, and the neerenesse of the Bathes yeelde wonderfull pleasure, drawing thither great resort of people from farre remote countries. By meanes whereof, the neighbouring people to Bada, (feeling the gaines sweetnesse) bring thither all kinds of victuals in great abundance, which causeth the Towne to be well furnished with all good prouision, and at all needfull seasons.

Next, it is seated (almost) in the midst of Switzerland, so that the cantons furthest off, may appeare there (by neerenesse of wayes) all at one and at the same time. Also it appertaineth to the eight first cantons, & (by that meanes) the most part of the cantons are Lords thereof, and haue equall authority in the place. Beside, the particular assemblies of the foure Townes, is oftentimes kept in the Towne of Aron, appertaining vnto the canton of Berne; howbeit (sometimes) it hath bin of Basle, when question was made of entering accord with Luther, & that for the cause of Strasbourg, that then sent their Ambassadors thither. The catholike Cantons do oftentimes assemble at Lucerna, sometimes at Beckenried, in the territory of Prigori at Brumer, which belongeth to them of Swits. But when the Ambassador of France demandeth (in his Kings name) a leuye of men of the Switzers: the day is oftentime held at Sollemure, where he entreatheth the Cantons to be present; and sometimes also it is at Lucerna.

The custome is, that (euery yeare) dayes of meeting are held at Bada, about mid-Iune. Then the Bayliffes or Governours appertaining to the Cantons, yeeld a reason of their feuerall charges before the councill, and attend to the ending of suites concerning the Prouinces. At the same time, the Ambassadors of the twelue first Cantons, do meete at Lugano, & take an account of the ioure Bayliffes for the Prouinces of Italy, and iudge the causes of appeale: but yet in such sort as a man may appeale from them, to the Councill or Parliament of Bada, it being of farre greater authority. The councill so assembled, they sit by ordination of the Cantons, to ende such controuersiall cases, as were not concluded on at the precedent meeting: for oftentimes causes of importance are not ended at the first Session, either because they appeare not of sufficient merit, or want due power of prooffe. In regard whereof, they are referred ouer to a further day, and in the meane while, the Ambassadors craue audience of the Lords of their feuerall Cantons, to know how they shall carry themselves therein. Sometimes also, in an vnexpected accident, or some other such case of consequence: the Canton of Zurich, or some other, will assigne the day, especially, if it be a matter concerning the common-wealth. Now, although the Councill are assembled only for publike affaires; yet notwithstanding, after they have taken order for them, if any particulars of the Prouinces come, and would haue their causes pleaded, they giue them audience. But the particular dayes of the Cantons, and those that the Ambassador of France causeth to be held; haue no certainty of time, but according as occasions offer themselves, & as it is pleasing to them that haue power to assemble the councill.

Particular
dayes for the Cantons.

The manner of proceeding on these daies of meeting, is thus. At the day assigned by the ordinary councill, or commanded to be kept: the day before, the Ambassador for the canton of Zurich, sends the Lieutenant of Bada to all the Innes and houses of receite, to know what Ambassadors are come, to whom the Lieutenant giueth kinde welcome, and receiue them honourably, in name of the whole Switzers common-wealth, and the morrow after, he calleth the to come to the Town-houfe. If the Ambassadors of all the cantons are come, they are called, and then they treat on affaires concerning all the Cantons together. But if vpon the day named, they for the new Cantons, as for Basile, Schaffouse, Sollemure, and Fribourg, are not as yet arrived, as oftentimes it comes so to passe: then feuen or eight Cantons do assemble, and discourse on matters only concerning themselves.

The Ambassadors are seated in councill, according to the order & number of the Cantons, so that he of Zurich sits in the highest and most eminent place; he of Berne next; then he of Lucerna, & so consequently the other, according to the order of the Cantons. Being seated, the ambassador of Zurich salureth them all, and hauing made some breefe preface & excuse, according to custome; he declareth y which the Ambassadors had in charge on the last dayes meeting, and referred them to the next dayes deliberation, as oftentimes they are assembled to that effect, and if any thing hath hapned since then, he propoundeth it also. Then he addeth that which his Lords haue giue him in charge, touching the Article whereon he is to deliberate: the other ambassadors do the like in their ranke, & declare whatfoeuer their Lords commanded them. After that euery one hath made knowne that which they haue in charge to say: the Bayliffe or Governour of Bada (of whatfoeuer Canton it is) demandeth orderly of each counsellor, his aduice concerning the matter that hath bin in question. The he of Zurich speaketh first, and the rest after, according to their ranke. Hauing all spoken, the Bayliffe counteth the voyces, according to the number of the Cantons and not of the counsellors: for sometimes one Canton sends two ambassadors, who may well assist in councill, yet they haue but but one voyce, as of one man onely.

Thus you see how they proceed in deciding those things, which concerne the publike good: In particular causes also, they follow the same order, giue their aduice, and collect the voyces. But such as haue any causes to plead on these daies, demand audience first of the Ambassador for Zurich, who assigned their day, & put their names vpon the Role. When they appeare before the councill, sometimes the parties themselves will plead their owne causes: or haue Aduocates, Proctors, or speakers, which they bring with them, or chuse among such as they finde in Bada. For at all times, and whensoever these dayes are appointed, there will meet there a great number of such men, belonging to the neighbouring Townes & Burroughs, pensioners of the Switzers. Causes are there debated, not according to the ciuill Law, nor by the aduice of Lawyers; but with equity, and according to the lawes & customes of the people, long time obserued among them.

I know, that many will account this forme of pleading, to be barbarous, especially such as would haue men follow the Romanes order of pleading, for the ending of suites: without which (they say) the very wisest men do wrong themselves often, in the deciding of difficult causes, and matters of importance. As for my selfe, I thinke well of the Romanes lawes, written by men very wise and skilfull in affaires, and I will not infringe their authority in any manner whatsoever. But yet I say, that the proceeding obserued by the Switzers, for ending controuersiall cases, is to be preferred before that which is vsed among other Iudges, that giue sentence according to the Roman lawes. And I am well assured, that mine opinion cannot be reiected, but by ill-disposed & wrangling spirits. For it cannot be denied, that many Aduocates and Attornies, are much more careful for maintaining the ciuill law, then cyther equity or right: considering, they do nothing else many times, but tie themselves to fillables, words, and termes of the law, which they expound according to their owne fancy, labouring to circumuent a party, and to take him by the nose, as we vse to say. And surely, they do nothing but for the benefit of their owne purples, troubling themselves ouermuch, to obscure and muffle vp matters; by which means, suites are made immortal, to the ineuitable detriment & ruine of both parties, being brought (by them) to extreme poudry and misery.

In which respect, they gaue no very euill language, that tearmed such practitioners and brablers, blood-suckers of the people: for they empty their purses, yea, and sucke them to the bare bones. And if among the Iustices of Switzerland, an error happen to be committed, in the decision of difficult causes, which cometh very sildome to passe: yet notwithstanding, it causeth no such harme, as doth the length and immortalizing of suites. So I may well say, that the manner of proceeding among the Switzers, doth lessen expences, ease the people, cuts vp the rootes of lingering suites and differences: because the sentence doth sooner resolute both the parties, and brings them to agreement: whereas in other places, we see suites encrease day by day, and from one case vndeclared, growes a great number of nouel variances.

CHAP. IIII.

Concerning Sentences and Iudgements, in publike and peculiar differences.

Hauing thus made mention of the councill, and daies of audience among the Switzers; we are now to speake, concerning such sentences and iudgements as they vse to giue. If any suite doth happen between particular persons in the Bayliwicks: the Bayliffs or Governours are Iudges in those places, or else the Canton (from whence the appellation ariseth) taketh knowledge, and iudgeth thereof. But the Iustices of euery Canton do iudge (each one within his iurisdiction) in the causes & differences of the Subiects. Beside this, there is iustice for publike suites, which are variances, happening between two or more Cantons, or between some particulars against a Canton: and such condition as the Cantons haue, the same also their confederates haue.

CHAP. V.

Of those Common-wealths, which are in each of the severall Cantons.
And first, of the Common-wealths of Zurich, Basile, and Schaffouse.

Having shewne already, how the whole Commonwealth of the Switzers is governed in common: it behoueth now, to make mention, of the Commonwealth in each distinct Canton. Now it seemeth to me, that the common-wealths of the thirteene Cantons, may be referred to three formes. For as there are three names of soveraign Magistrates and Cantons, so haue they likewise as many formes of common-wealths, differing not onely in name, but also in the things themselves.

In some certaine Cantons, the cheefe Commanders or Heads of the councill, are called Ammans. This is obserued in the Cantons that haue no Cities or Townes, but Villages onely, hauing a popular estate, and the soveraignty appertaining to the people, by whose aduice, the very greatestt affaires of importance are decided. Of this number are Vri, Suits, Vnderwald, Zug, Glaris, and Appenzell.

The other Cantons haue their cities and townes, which haue the soveraignty: yet in such manner, as there are two formes of common-wealths. For the cities and townes, especially such as haue bene built by some Princes, or some times haue bene subiected to them: are governed by an Auget, whom they call, Schultheys, (who is cheefe of the councill) and by some number of counsellors chosen by free election, from and by the whole number of citizens. The forme of this common-wealth is Aristocracical among all the other: and in this manner are governed the common-wealths of Berne, Lucerna, Fribourg, and Solleure.

There are other cities and townes diuided by certaine companies, by each whereof, and by voyce of such men, as are in euery of them, the Lords of the councill are elected, and the soveraign Magistrate or cheefe of the councill, who by them is termed Burgemeister, that is to say, Master of the Bourges, which we in a shorter word call Bourgmester. Such are the common-wealths of Zurich, Basile, and Schaffouse. Now we are to speake of these diuers formes of common-wealths in order, beginning with the last, first.

First then, all the people of these Townes free and Imperiall, were diuided into two ranks: the one of Noblemen, the other of Yeomen. The Noblemen had a Society by themselves, apart, which the Allemaignes or Germanes did call, Ein Geselechaft, and they of Zurich, Ein Constail.

In elder times, in the city of Basile, which is very spacious, and for the multitude of Noblemen, they were diuided into two societies, bandes, or companies of Noblemen. Oftentimes they were in quarrels, and had the soveraignty: so that out of the one company they chose the Confull, and out of the other, the Tribune or Captaine of the city, which is the estate of greatestt authority, next vnto that of Confull or Bourgmester.

Neuertheless, afterward the Noblemen lost this soveraignty, or else forsook their right voluntarily. For at the time of the councill of Basile, when Lewes, then Dolphin of France, brought (very neere to Basile) an Army of Armignacks, in fauour of Pope Eugenius, and the Duke of Austria; many Gentlemen of Basile, went and ioyned with that Army, in regard whereof, they were all banished, and their posterity deprived & excluded from all publike honours.

D d 3 After

In townes or cities, the cheefe man is called the Auget, the cheefe man of the councill.

Election of the Lords of the councill, and the soveraign Magistrate, called a Burgemeister.

Townes diuided into two ranks, Noblemen and Yeomen.

Two bandes of Noblemen in Basile. The Confull and the Tribune or Captaine of the City, the two cheefe offices.

The Noblemen banished and their posterity deprived.

Two Judges chosen for either side.

Places appointed for the ending of suites & differences according to ancient custome.

They that met at one place, went not to another except by especiall appointment.

What matters cannot be loosingly ended, what course they take then

Thus then, for the deciding of such differences, each of the parties doe chuse two Iudges for either side, who are absolved of the oath which they haue taken to their Canton: and promise to iudge according to right and equity, and labour that the suite may bee loosingly and very speedily accorded, or iudicially ended.

By the ancient alliances, there were certaine places appointed, for the ending of such suites. The seven first Cantons sent their ambassadors and arbitrators to the Abbey of the Hermitage, to end their such suites as happened among them. By an article of very ancient alliance with them of Glaris, it is expressly said: that if they had any suite with them of Vri, the assembly should be at Merch. If against the canton of Suits, the arbitrators should meete at Bergeraz: and at Brunen, if against them of Vnderwald. And then the other Cantons, hauing had knowledge of the cause, pronounced the sentence. The Bernians, and the three Cantons of Vri, Suits, and Vnderwald, assembled at a place named Dashenboltz. They of Zurich and Berne, at Lofinge. The Fribourgers & they of Solleure, hauing a suite against the eight first Cantons, or some of them, sent their Iudges to Zofinge; and if they were defendants, to Willifow. As for the causes of them of Basile, Schaffouse, and Appenzell, they pleaded them at Bada, together with them of these Cantons, allied with them of Rotuille and of Mulhouse. But the differences of them of S. Gall, were determined in the Abbey of the Hermitage: and them of the Grisons, at Wallenfisch, which is a Towne at the end of the Lake of Rine, in the Bayliwick of Sargans.

When then some difference happeneth, which cannot be loosingly accorded, and that the entrety of the Cantons serue to no purpose: the arbitrators and ambassadors of the Cantons that are in suite, do meete at the place appointed, & (with them) the ambassadors of the other Cantons confederates, who come thither to atone the parties, and to make some amiable composition. The Iudges and Arbitrators being assembled, after that the parties haue pleaded their causes: if the Iudges take resolution, & giue sentence, the parties must (of necessity) be contented. But if they be of diuers opinions (as many times it happeneth) and that there are as many voyces on the one side, as on the other, then a fifth Iudge or arbitrator is chosen, whom they call Ein obmann, or, Ein gemeinen mann. He giueth no sentence at all, but onely approueth one of those, which the arbitrators haue pronounced. Sometimes the Iudges themselves do chuse the odder arbitrator: yet in such sort notwithstanding, that he is a man of one of the Cantons, no medler with eyther party, nor hauing any interest in the cause.

The alliance of the seven first Cantons, makes mention of this election and choise: as that of Fribourg, that of Solleure, that of Appenzell, and them of S. Gall and of Mulhouse. It is added to the articles of the alliance of Schaffouse, that if the Iudges cannot accord, by choise of another arbitrator, taken from one of the Cantons; they shall then take one of the Lords of the councill of S. Gall. And in the alliance of Rotuille, command is giuen to the Iudges, to chuse for an odder arbitrator, one of the Lords of the councill of S. Gall or of Mulhouse. Sometimes also the complainant chuseth. As if the Bernians haue a suite against the three first Cantons, or any one of them; the Cantons that name sixteen men, out of which number, the Bernians are to chuse a sub-arbitrator. But if they bee defendants, the Cantons will then (for sub-arbitrator) chuse one of the Lords of the lesser councill of Berne. If some difference fall betwene them of Zurich, and of Berne; the complainants chuse for an odder arbitrator, one of the defendants Lords of the councill. The same is obserued in suites for them of Basile, against the other cantons; and so in the Grisons causes.

Thus you see how the Switzers gouerne themselves, in the deciding of controuersiall suites betwene the common-wealths. I know very well, that some may dispute subtilly, both for and against this order there obserued: but I will leaue that discourse to the Readers. For mine owne part, I admire the simplicity and integrity of our ancestors, who by such manner of proceeding, haue often brought to end very great variances, and carefully conserued publike peace and concord. But they did not regard their owne particular profite, neither desired any thing more

When voyces are alike: chuse the fifth: then a fifth arbitrator is chosen.

The addition to the Article of Schaffouse.

The complainant is allowed to chuse the odder Arbitrator.

All the common-wealths of the Cantons referred to three formes.

The cheefe men of some councill called Ammans, in an Estate, merely popular.

There is nothing to well becoming, one place, but it may become vnto for another.

Afterward, when the Burgesse (by common consent) made alliance with the ten Cantons of the Switzers, in the year, 1351, the most part of the Noble-men, who hated the Switzer: dislodged from the City, and withdrew themselves to Castles heere and there, so that their authority diminished greatly then, and all the rest was lost in the year, 1429. For by the Sermons & exhortations of Oecolampadius, the doctrine and ceremonies of the Church were reformed, by order sent from the councill, against which, many Noble-men opposed themselves. And although they could not hinder the change of Religion, yet they abandoned and left the City and would not abide in it.

Oecolampadius his preaching & the alteration of Religion.

Some of the Noble-men got entrance again into the City, but were excluded from governing in the State.

After which time, the two companies whereof we spake, entered in againe, and got possession of those private houses, & as yet they keepe those houses to themselves, and they belong to the whole body of the Nobility. And those houses are called in their language Zunft-hauser and zum brunnen, but yet none of the is of the councill. For although the councill do meeete together (almost) every day, and the Gentlemen (having taken the City) dwelt most part of the time in their Castles, by common advice of the Burgesse, they were excluded from governing in the common-wealth, which they had renounced voluntarily. Nevertheless, some noble Families that dwell in the City, & have had care of the common-wealth with the other Burgesse, are in ranke of the foure first companies or Supporters of the City, and (in them) are chosen to be of the councill. And therefore, to do them honour, in regard of their condition; these Tribes or companies are called Berrenzunft, that is to say, the companies of Lords.

The privilege of them of Zurich in choosing their Lords of councill.

Therefore, there are no more companies of these Noble-men in Basile, but those that are distinguished with the other Burgesse. But at Zurich and at Schaffouse, the Noble-men have their companies apart by themselves. And they of Zurich have this privilege beside, above the tribes and companies of Tradesmen, to take the moiety, that is, the most part of the Lords of the councill, from fourth the company of these Noble-men: so that they are as a counterpoise to the other companies. Notwithstanding, there is some difference among these Noble-men, for the Families of race, that live very noble and ancient: they do make a band by themselves, and they are called die Stubler, by reason of the place where they assemble apart by themselves, by right & especiall privilege. To the whole body of these tribes or companies, are ioyned many citizens, which are not of any trade nor traffick: in which respect, they may have place in one company, rather then in another. Porters, Labourers, Burden-bearers, and other such like manner of people, who when warre hapneth, are held and reputed to be of this body of companies, which they call Ein Con-Castell, and receive wages: they have a voice in electing the Master of the whole body of companies, and he is of the Seigneries councill, in regard of his place.

Porters, Labourers, and toying men are of the body politique.

Beside the Society and Company of Noble-men, the people of those cities & townes there, are parted into certaine tribes or companies, which the Germans call Zunft. The word (it may be) take this name or originally, of Zamenkunft, which signifieth to meeete and assemble themselves in company. Some interpret them to be Tribes; others, Courts, and others, Colledges or Abbeys: but wee will call them Tribes or Companies. The number of them is not equall in the fore-named Cities and Townes. For there are fiftene at Basile: whereof the four first are esteemed more noble then the other, and are called the companies of Lords, as already hath beene said. The first tribe or company, is that of Merchants. The second of Gold-smiths, Goldfiners, Founders, and Pewterers. The third is of Merchants dealing only in wines: with whom the Notaries, Masters of Hospitals, Spittles, and other such like communities are ioyned. The fourth is of Merchants dealing in Silkes, and of Factors for all States: This company is the very greatest of them all. The other eleven, are of all sorts of trades and handycrafts men.

Of other Tribes and Companies beside the Noble-men.

Fiftene companies at Basile, and how they are distinguished from the Noble-men.

Now there is a dozen or twelue tribes or companies at Zurich: heretofore they were thirteene in number, when many Drapers & workers in wooll dwelt there: for that was one company by it selfe. But now adies, the weavers of woollen cloth and other things, are ioyned into one company

Twelve tribes or companies are at Zurich.

pany with the Fullers and Diars. At Schaffouse there are eleven companies only: neuertheless, it falleth out many times, that diuers trades are ioyned together in one company. They have their meetings by themselves: as at Zurich, the Millers and Bakers, the Barbers and Chirurgions, the Smiths and Metall men. So at Basile, the Filthermen and Marriers or Barquers, the Cordwainers and Curriers, the Taylors & Skinners. These companies are divided, and they are called Spaltue Zunft. For when there is question of cheefe Trades, and especially workmen in them, their houses of meetings and assemblies are by themselves. But in things that concern the common-wealth, and when, and where all ought to be present, to elect Lords of the councill, or the Zunft-Masters, who must be also in the councill, every man speaks his minde, and gives his voyce.

Out of each of these companies, some men are chosen, as many of one company as of another, to be Lords of councill. In every city there are two publike councill, which have the principall authority: as namely, the great councill, when as a good number of councillers meeete together, in name of all the people: as is vied in the affaires of greatest importance, and which do appertaine to the whole common-wealth. Next, the lesser councill, who meeete together every day, about the common-wealths businesse, and take knowledge of differences happening among the citizens. The great councill of Zurich, consisteth of two hundred men: That of Basile, is of two hundred forty foure: and that of Schaffouse, is of foure score and sixe.

As concerning the lesser councill of Zurich, it is of fifty: that of Basile hath threescore and foure: and that of Schaffouse, hath but twenty sixe. For out of each tribe or company, twelue are taken for the great councill: except at Zurich, where they elect eightene of the Nobility. At Zurich also each company giueth three men for the lesser councill: at Basile, foure; at Schaffouse, two. Next, in every of these cities, there are two Councillers or Bourg-masters, who are the cheefe and Presidents of councill. Over and beside these two, at Basile there are two Tribunes, who are theie in councill with the Bourg-masters. Moreover, at Zurich the Noble-men send sixe from among them, to the lesser councill: the other companies doe send each one but three. By the plurality of voyces, choise is made of sixe other men, out of such companies as the councill do propose, to fill vp the number.

How many are sent from each company.

As concerning the election of councillors (for so will we hereafter call the Lords of the lesser councill) it is done in manner following. Every year, about mid-lune, and mid-December, all the citizens of Zurich assemble themselves together, every man in his tribe and company: and the elect a cheefe man, whom they call, Zunftmeister, that is to say, Master of the tribe or company. The custome of these three cities, is, that the companies have two Masters: but one of them is in estate but sixe Moneths, at the end whereof, the other succeedeth him. Neuertheless, it often comes to passe, that hee who was Zunftmeister the halfe year before, is chosen againe. By this meanes, the lesser councill is divided in two parts, to wit, the old & new. Such as have beene in charge the first sixe Moneths, we terme them of the olde councill; for although they be called when the councill is helde, yet notwithstanding, it is not alwayes so done, and there are many matters which passe in the new councill only.

The election of councillors for the lesser councill; and after what order they elect the Zunftmeister.

The great councill of Basile is divided in the same manner, and of twelue which is taken from each company, there are sixe of the new councill, and sixe of the olde. Beside the Zunftmeister, the lesser councill of Zurich chuseth one councillor from each of the companies: but the lesser councill of Basile chuseth two. These councillors thus elected, with the other which we have said to be chosen extraordinarily at Zurich, are divided into two bands: whereof the one is the olde councill, and the other the new. These two councill are changed euery sixe Moneths at Zurich; so that at their ending, the olde councill electeth the new. At Basile, and at Schaffouse, they continue in the estate a whole year together.

before the foure and twentieth day of June. At Zurich, the Zunftmeister are elected by the companies in their houses of meeting: then the council of two hundred confirmeth this election; but at Basile this confirmation belongeth to the olde council. The voyce is given openly at Zurich, and secretly at Schaffouse. For in each tribe or company, charge is given to particular persons, to collect the voyce, whereupon they all come to them in order, and tell them closely in the eare, for whom they give voyce to be Zunftmeister. The lesser council assemble at the ofteneft, three times euery weeke, and some whiles (vpon earnest occasion) four times. The olde and new councilers of Zurich, are leated one by another, & sometimes one among another: but at Basile, the old councilers are about the younger. They haue also this custome, to withdraw often into another Hall, to consult together. After resolution is taken, a councillor of the first company, reporteth the aduice to the new council: and they call the reporter Den Officer.

The Bourgmaster, whom they call Bourgermeister, as much to say, as Master of the Bourgesses, is President of the old and new councils. The great council electeth him by open voyce at Zurich; at Schaffouse by secret voyce: and at Basile, the olde council first electeth the Bourgmaster, and the new council the yeare following. The Bourgmaster is in state at Zurich, fixe Moneths: but at Basile and Schaffouse, a whole yeare together, and turne by turne, the Bourgmasters and Councilers olde and new are changed. They whom at Basile they terme Zunftmeister, and Oberstermeister at Zurich (as much to say, as Masters of companies and communities) doe second the Bourgmasters in their authority.

At Zurich there are three, and at Basile two, who with the two Bourgmasters are called the foure chiefe & principal Lords of the city. Nine other Lords of the lesser council at Basile, are ioyned to these four in chiefe, and by reason of the number, they are called the council of thirteene. They heare the causes of very greate importance, and deliberate on them first, before they propound any thing to the lesser council: and therefore they may be called Preconsulters, or first councillers. Moreover, there is a particular council at Zurich, whom wee may name the Chamber of accounts, for it manageth publicke affaires: and is composed of eight councilers, and haue the Bourgmaster of the olde council for their President. Then is there two Purse-bearers or Treasurers, and the Superintendents for Ecclesiastical goods do assit them, together with foure other councilers, two of the olde, and two of the new council. They take knowledge not onely of monies employed for the common-wealth: but oftentimes also, the younger council demandeth their aduice in cases of importance, whereon they consult a while, and then give their report to the younger council.

To these publicke councils, there are alwayes two Secretaries assitting, with their committees, when necessity requireth. The first and chiefeft is cald Statthyschryber, that is to say, Secretary of the city. At Zurich, the other is called Andersschryber, that is to say, sub-Secretary: but they of Basile call him Raatschryber, that is, Secretary to the council. There is a particular Secretary for the Chamber of Accounts; whom they of Zurich call Rechenhschryber. The estate of Secretary in these cities is honorable, and of great gaine. In regard whereof, the Gentlemen strue to keepe it in their owne power, as sildome is it giuen to any other. These men are they (among all other) that know the lawes, customes, priuiledges, and all the secrets of the common-wealth.

Next to the councils publicke, are Iustices of the city. There are two at Zurich, one for ciuill causes, Das Statthyschricht, which was in ancient times vnder power of the Nunnes, and the Abbess electeth the Lieutenant, or chiefe man in that kinde of iustice, whom they called Den Schultheissen, and his assessors or assistants: but now the election belongeth to the lesser or yonger council. Their number is of eight, and they haue their Lieutenant, Secondary, and Sericant. To them appertaineth the knowledge of ciuill causes, Debtes, Hires, Lendings, Borrowings, Sales, and as the Smizers vie to say, they iudge Umb erb und eigen. There is no appeale from their sentence: but if there happen any difficult difficult cause, they send it to the Council.

The other Iustice, whom they call Das Zinsricht, is a Iudgement of proceffe and suites, which happen for rents and yearly reuenues. The Secretary of the other Iustice, and two Lords of the younger council, it seemes doe daily assit for the ending of all such differences. In the bigger Basile there are two such kindes of Iustices, and a third in the lesser Basile. That Law or Iustice of greatest authority, which they terme also Das Statthyschricht, is composed of ten Iudges; one part whereof is of the council, and the other, such as the people do name. They take knowledge of all causes, ciuill and criminal: but when there is question of testaments, wils, contracts, monies borrowed, and other such like things: the Prouost or Lieutenant of the city sitteth in Iudgement. As for causes criminal, the Prouost of the Empire iudgeth them. And there are three Lords of the council, who do pursue criminal causes, by the sollicitation of one, who is an ordinary Attorney, named by them, Oberstenrecht, and keepeth company with the Iudges, hauing an aduocate waiting on him.

These Iudgements are done publickly, and haue eight open audiences, where by all are permitted to be there present, to heare and see what course is done. But at Zurich and at Schaffouse, the new council doth iudge the criminal causes. Neuerthelesse, the Bourgmaster doth not then sit: but it is the Prouost of the Empire, whom Rechtswagt, or Rechtsherr, who presideth and collecteth the voyces. Euery yeare the council chuseth some one of that body, to exercise that charge. Proceffe and suites criminal are handled at Zurich, with the doores fast shut: but at Schaffouse in open Court, so that all men may vnderstand the accusations and defences. But the council commandeth all to be absent, when there is question of pronouncing sentence. The second order of Iustice at great Basile, iudgeth not but in cases of small importance, which hardly exceedeth the summe of ten pounds. But the Iustice of smaller Basile, hath a Iudge apart, & taketh knowledge of all causes, except of criminal.

There are two Courts, or kindes of Iustices at Schaffouse. The one which they call Das Schuldricht, is law or iustice for debts: for therein only is ended differences of contracts, debtes, and such like things. And if the summe whereof question is made, doe amount about an hundred crownes, the council then takes knowledge of it. In this Court are twenty assessors or assistants, to wit, one of each Tribe: moreover, eight other persons, chosen by the council. The other order of Iustice is named Rechtsgricht, or Pflichtricht, that is to say, Iustice for fines and amercements: because the Prouost of the empire, or Iudge in causes criminal, presideth there, and condemneth all such forfeitures & fines. There are twelue assessours out of the twelue Tribes, and who are of the great council. Causes criminal of lesser importance, are debated and ended in this Iustice there; as light iniuries, vulgar outrages, and suchlike. But when wordes do wound honour, and the wrong is not easie to be diffembled, or digested; the knowledge of such cases appertaineth to the lesser council.

Beside what hath bene saide, these three cities haue each one their particular council, which they terme Ein Chorricht, or Segricht, where they discourtse on causes of matrimony. For after that the religion was changed, the councils of the three cities established one council: wherein were a certaine number of assistants, elected by bipillke suffrages, and taken out of the olde and new councils, and among whom were some Diuines or Theologians as they call them. Neuerthelesse, at Schaffouse none of the Ministers were assistants, but only some learned men admitted to council, who had each one as his adiunct, some Doctor of the Law. These Iudges take knowledge of all matrimoniall causes: punish whoredomes and adulteries; and haue charge to observe the lines & manners of euery one.

Beside, in these common-wealths, bastards are deprived of all honours and dignity: nor is it lawfull for them to be seene at the council, nor in the Courts of Iustice. True it is, they are not guilty of that stain to their birth, neither can it be denied, but that (oftentimes) bastards haue wonne more commendations for for their virtues, then ever could their legitimate brethren: as we have an example of sephir, a Judge of Gods owne people. But to bridle the leud concupiscences of many, and to conferre the dignity of sacred marriage: Bastards stand as branded with infamy, and yke some eye-fores to well ordered common-wealths.

Next, hee that hath not dwelt tenne yeares within the city of Zurich, cannot be chosen to be one of the publike councill.

Such as are borne out of Switzerland cannot be of the lesser councill at Schaffhouse: But if they be Bourgeses of twenty yeares standing, they may be brought into the great councill, & into the number of the Judges.

I will not tell you that strangers are unworthy of these honors: but it is requisite first of all, that hee who ought to have charge in a common-wealth, should be particularly affectioned and obliged thereto, and afterward be well skilde and sence, in the laws and customes of the country.

And me-thinks, citizens, and such as (from their youth) have bene bred in a common-wealth; should have more advantage therein, than strangers.

Moreover, there is nothing more pernicious to common-wealths, then enivies and despights, proceeding from such advancements to high degrees: as draw on partialities and factions, the danger whereof cannot be avoyded, when naturall borne subjects are left despised, and ancient Families contemned, and charge of publike Officers given to strangers, & men of no merit.

Beside bastards and strangers, adulterers, murderers, and men made infamous for any crime: are (by a common law) excluded from councill in these common-wealths.

Publike estates and conditions are of diuers kinds in these common-wealths, and in great number, according as the cities are peopled: we will make mention of the principals only.

The highest degree, next after the Bourg-masters and Zurich-Masters, are such as have charge of the publike monies: who are called in many places of Switzerland, Seckelmeister, as much to say, as Treasurers or Purse-bearers. At Basile there are three, named Zurperherren, that haue the keeping of the cities treasures. Besides them, there are three other, named Ladenherren, who manage the monies of the Imposts, Customes, and yearly reuenues of the common-wealth: They also pursue criminall causes, making themselves parties, by means of the ordinary Attorney. At Zurich there are men (almost) in the selfesame charge, whom they call Die Ambgelter; who manageth the tolle-monies of Corne and Wine, which they cause to be gathered by their committees. This rolle or taxation is not but on the Wine publicly sold, and on the Corne brought in from abroad: but for the wine & corne which the Bourgeses eate and drinke in their houses, they pay not any thing.

Beside these two Treasurers of the common-wealth, there is a third at Zurich, for the reuenues of the Church, & he is called Der Bloesteren obman: he gathereth certaine reuenues of the Abbeyes; wherewith the Ministers wages are paid, the Churches maintained, and the poore cherished or releued, and the ouerplus remaining, is referred to ease the people in times of publike necessities. Some yeares past, the country of Zurich having bene afflicted with an extreme dearth of victuals: the receiver sold corne at a meane price to them of the city, and to most part of the Villages round about, bought with the referred money at the best rate, and thereby the Subjects of the Seigneury were greatly releued.

Next to these, there are other Officers, as they that take care of publike buildings, whom the French call Foyers, the Germans Wuthherren, and they of Basile, Lonherren, because they pay the works & workmen that serue in publike. These Surveyers haue charge of the waies, Gates, Towers, Rampiers, Bridges, Couidits, and other publike Edifices: taking order that they shall bee maintained and kept in their best ability. Moreover, they iudge with three Lords of the councill (who are their adiuncts) such differences as happen for the confines, Gutters, Channels, Windows, Walles, and such like things, & wherin the neighbours are to be guided by their direction in their building. At Basile there are five Seigneurs, that take knowledge of these matters.

Of Schooles & vniuersities

The Vniuersity at Basile, founded by Aeneas Syluius, who was after Pope, called Pius 4.

The reason why so few Schooles are in the Vniuersity of Basile.

There is another degree of them that take charge of victuals. Of this number are the vishers for Bread, to consider if the Loafe carry his full weight, or no. Others view the Fleish in the Butchery, and aduisedly obserue, that they kill not any Beast, the fleish whereof is bad, and dangerous to be eaten; they also set a price vpon the pound, to sell it by. Then there are some that take charge of Fish, and heedfully foresee, that none be taken whe they are spawny, and haue an eye beside to the goodnesse of all other Fish in the Market. Others looke to salt Fish, and to the Marker of Butter and Cheese, how it is reasonably sold. There are some other Officers, whose names are sufficient to be noted: as the Patrons of Viddowes and Orphanes, Schummoert, and at Basile, Waisenherren: The Almoners; Vishers for weights and measures; Deputies for questioning of inatters; Comprollers of Ecclesiasticall goods; and Vishers of Schooles.

Moreover, in these cities there are Schooles very well ordered. At Basile is an Vniuersity greatly renowned, established by Aeneas Syluius, afterward Pope, named Pius the second, who gaue it all the same priuiledges, rights, and immunities, which the Vniuersities of Boulogne, Colongne, Heidelberg, Erford, Lipsa & Prinnee haue. Aeneas Syluius was lodged at Basile, during the time as the councill was kept there. He found the city so pleasant, the ayre so sweete, with such commodity and abundance of all things; that hee reputed the place apt and worthy to haue an Vniuersity founded in it. In the times of our ancestors, and our owne also, this Vniuersity hath yielded many wise men, professors of the tongues, in Philosophy and all Sciences, who are needlesse heere to be named. Neuertheless, considering the greatnesse of the city, and the fame of the Doctors there abiding, there are but few Schooles. Beatus Rhenanus reddeth the reason, and saith; It is occasioned by the finaltesse of reuenues belonging to this Vniuersity, and to many Schooles in Germany. As thinking, that if there were fewer Schooles and Vniuersities, they would bee much more frequented then they are. There is not any Vniuersity at Zurich, notwithstanding, euen to this present day, the tongues haue beeene so faithfully taught there, and all good Sciences and Diuinity, that it is very famous, and highly esteemed among all them that study Diuinity.

Finally, these three cities whereof we speake, haue power to stampe and coyne monie: and therefore there are fording Mints, and Masters of the monies, whose charge is to take order that the money coyned with the stamp of the city, should beare full weight, and be of a good alloy. Each of these cities hath her money apart by herselfe. They of Basile do coyne the same money with them of Haltsia and of hourgogne, and call it a Rappenmunty, in regard of a Rauen, which sermeth for Armes to many peeces of their money. Five & twenty Sols of this money, makes a Florin of gold, which is thought to value threecore cruzers. At Schaffhouse the money is of the same alloy & price, as that of the Empire. They of Zurich do coyne Dallers, and halfe Dallers, of equal price with them of the Empire: but they haue a kinde of money, which is their owne in particular, whereof forty Sols makes a Florin of gold. They stampe also another sort of money, which they call Bachers, whereof sixteene makes a Florin.

In ranke of these publike charges and offices, we may set downe the Watch, & such as take care for prouision against the accidents of fire. There are two sortes of watch, besides the Sentinels in the clock-houses, and the Porters. First the perpetuall guardes at the cities cost, who keepe watch euery night, and diligently search through all parts of the city, crying at all houres of the night.ouer and beside these, out of each company are taken a certaine number of Bourgeses, who likewise watch (according to their turnes) with their Armes. This double guard is not done for any feare they haue of enemies: but to avoid the inconueniences of fire, and to take order also, that (during the time of night) all matters may be peaceable and quier.

They that are Committees, to take care of dangers concerning fire, when any such happenth in the witty, may command the Carpenters, and other men of like quality, to runne for quenching the fire, taking order that all may be done without confusion, and for the best safety of them that haue the misfortune of the fire.

fire. Moreouer, they carry an eye over the watch at the Gates, and on the walls; lest any tumult should happen in the city. For it is ordained, that when the fire is in any one place, a certaine number of the Bourgeses (chosen out of each company) make their sudden appearance at the Gates or Ports, and vpon the walles in Armes. Moreouer, the whole city is distributed into certaine bandes, euerly one of them hauing his Capitaine & Ensigne to it selfe, vnder whom they go marching in excellent order. The Bourgmaster betakes himselfe to the Town-houfe, with some of the principall councillors and officers of the Seigneury, to aduise on what is good for the weale publike. And not onely Carpenters, Malons, and their seruants, but likewise most of the Bourgeses meete together, all labouring industriously to quench the fire: and oftentimes the women shew themselves of no meane courage, in bringing and casting on the water. Beside, if the fire happen in some Village out of the city, the iustitice disposed of euerly Tribe (whereof election is made for the purpose) do meete, and issue forth together, to quench the fire. They are conducted by one of the councill Seigneurs, who is sent to helpe and aduise what is inneed to be done, but most especially, to comfort them that haue the losse.

We haue already told you, that the Swissers take great care for the poore. At Zurich, and in some other Townes, there is a daily distribution of almes to all the poore there, as of Bread and Pulse-portage. There are a great number of poore Schollers in Zurich, sometimes forty, otherwhiles fourescore, that are thus relieved, some bestowing garments, and other needfull things on them also, vsing the poore in no worse manner, then they of the Abbeyes and Couents in the Seigneury of Zurich are. Vpon the Sundays and festiual dayes, an almes collection is made of the people: which Monethly, or at euerly two Moneths, by men chosen & deputed to the office, is distributed equally to the poore in the city, and such as live abroad in the fields. Beside, in the Cities there are great Hospitals, wherein needy cittizens, aged, impotent, sicke persons, orphans, and many other are releued. The Seigneury appointeth diuers honest people, to haue care of the poores necessities: such as are the Master of Hospitals, Proctors, Receiuers, & their Committees and Comptrollers.

Hitherto wee haue shewne you the forme and state government obserued in the cities; but ouer and beside these, they haue authority in the neighboring countries, and (among the rest) the canton of Zurich hath more country iurisdiction, and larger Bayliwicks, then eyther Basile or Schaffouse. But in all the Lands and Seigneuries belonnging vnto these three cantons, there is one and the selfe-same order of government. For certaine Bayliwicks are governed by the councill of the city, in such manner, as the Bayliffes dwell in the city, and are councillors of the common-wealth, and yet go to keepe Courts in the Villages. And if there happen any criminal suite, and whereof there is defect of punishment capital, the councill taketh knowledge thereof. There are other Bayliwicks of farre larger extent, and thether Bayliffes are sent with ample power: so that they iudge not onely in ciuill causes, but oftentimes in criminall occasions, and chastise malefactors, according to the greatnesse of the delicts. These Bayliwicks haue their priuiledges and ancient customes: some also haue law and iustice apart by themselves, and are administred by Iudges chosen out of the same places.

The Bayliffes make no change or alteration (of any thing) in these places; but they leaue to the inhabitants, all their rights safe and sound: contenting themselves onely to preside in iustice, and giue sentence according to the lawes, and customes of each Bayliwicke. The canton of Zurich hath nine great Bayliwicks, to wist, the county of Kybourg, the Bayliwicks of Greningen, Andelfingen, Grifensee, Eglisau, the free Prouince, Kegenbourg, Vadewille, and Lansfen, neere to the fall of Rhein. There are two and twenty small Bayliwicks or Castle-tships beside: in some of which, there is as large extent of ground, and as great number of men, as in some of the greater Bayliwicks. Moreouer, beside these Bayliwicks, two pleasant Townes, namely Winterdner and Stein, are vnder the protection of Zurich canton. The Officers of iustice are in the same Townes; but the inhabitants are tyed

ed in obedience to the Seigneury of Zurich, to obey their lawes, and to go to war for that Canton; in which respect, the two Townes haue their feuerall Ensignes by themselves.

The Bayliwicks belonging to the Canton of Basile, are the Castle of Farnberg, leated on the top of a Mountaine aboue Rhinfeld; Walbourg, a small towne on the Mount Iura, which they tearme Bort Howerstein, in regard of the Rock there cut in lunder; Hombourg, Munchenlein, and Ramstein.

CHAP. VI.

Of the publike estate and government, of the Townes of Berne, Lucerna, Fribourg, and Solennre: which are not diuided into Tribes and Companies, as Zurich, Basile, and Schaffouse are.

We haue already said, that the second kinde of publike government, is considered in such Townes, as are not distributed into certaine Tribes or Companies, out of which are equally chosen, the Lord & Seigneurs appointed for Councill and Iustice. In these towns they that are soueraine Magistrates, or Heads of publike councill, are called Bur Schuldheffen. The old Alteman word is found in the Lawes of the Lombardes, where it is written, Schuldabis. It seemeth that the word came of debt, which the Swissers tearme Schuld, and of commanding: as much to say, that the Schuldabis commands the debtors to satisfie them of whom they borrowed. And in this fence it is found written in the Lombards lawes, vnder the title of debts and wages, in these words.

If a free man who is a debtor, hath nothing else wherewith to make satisfaction, but his owne private Cattel, as Horses and Oxen for Labour, or Kine to the plow: then he that chal-
length or demandeth the debt, shall go to the Schuldabis, and intimate the cause, giuing him to vnderstand, that his debtor hath nothing else to make reipment withall, but the matters above rehearsed. Then the Schuldabis is to make seizure on the said Cattel, &c.

The same word is found also in the twentieth rule of King *Luiprand*s lawes, in significant tearmes, as followeth. If any man haue a cause or suite, and do appeare before his Schuldabis to demand iustice: if in case that the Schuldabis do him not iustice within foure houres after following (if both the parties stand bound to answer before him) himselfe shall pay to the demander fixe Sols, and so his Iudge fixe Sols.

We may perceiue heereby, that the word Schuldabis signified (among our graue Ancients) a Iudge, that gaue sentence vpon differences concerning debts, made leuey on the debtors goods, and compelled them to pay their creditors. Neuerthelesse, there was no iustice so high, but hee stood in subiection to the county. At this day, the name is in frequent vse among the Princes of Germany: so that the Iudges of Townes and Villages haue no other name. Among the Swissers it is more honourable, for in the forenamed townes, the Schuldabis is lord ouer all. The fouraigine Magistrates of Townes among the Swissers, some haue thought were called Consuls, in imitation of the Romans: others hold opinion, that Bourgmasters and Schuldabis ought to be called Prefests. For mine owne part, I call them Consuls, that are Presidents in publike councill. The French call him an Auyer, whom we tearme Schuldheff.

Now as concerning the Townes whereof we speak, they are not diuided by companies and trades, because there are lawes which prohibit them from so doing. But although the forme of the Communeweiths of Zurich and Berne are different, yet the one stands bound to succour the other reciprocally, to maintaine and conserve the estate, such as is established in eythers common-wealth. In the meane while, the trades that are at Berne, Lucerna, Fribourg, and Solennre, haue houses established for meetings, for knowledge of the best and cheefest workmen, but not for the election of Magistrates. They tearme those Officers by the name of Gesellschaftten, and not Zunftten.

Two public councils in those Townes:
the great and
the lesser.

In these Townes there are two public councils, as at Zurich, Basle, &c. Schaffhouse; to wit, the great and the lesser. The great council of Berne, is of two hundred men, as at Zurich, although it hath more than two hundred councillors. The lesser council of Berne, is of six and twenty. At Lucerna, eighteen councillors do govern the estate, during the space of six Months, and eighteen other six Months, or the rest of the yeare. To elect the council of Berne, the proceeding is in this manner.

Banderets
is the Capitaine
of a quarter in any good Towne.

The third Peries before Easter day, the four Banderets of the Towne, do chuse, and take with them sixteene Bourgeses, the worthiest and best esteemed men of all: then these twenty, with the Auoyer, do elect the great council, wherefore we may well call them Electors. First of all, they consider and examine exactly, the lues and manners of all them that are to be of the council of two hundred: and if any one of them hath soyled his dignity and reputation, with any bad or villainous ade; they depose him, and in the place, as well of the deposed, as of the ded, they chuse another, whom they do better like and allow of. In meane while, their election remaineth secret, untill the evening of the day before Easter, & then the Officers goe, and signifie to all them that are elected for the great and lesser councils: that they are to meete on the morrow morning in the Towne-house.

The Seigneurs
or the great council meete in the Towne-house

The first Peries after Easter, the Seigneurs of the council do assemble in their houses of meeting, and afterward they condukt them to the Towne-house, that are newly set downe, to be in number of the two hundred, and then all the Magistrates are elected. The election ended, the Bourgeses go to feast in their houses, and after dinner, walke forth into the fields: exercising themselves there in leaping, running, throwing the Barre, Stone, and other pastimes. But the Auoyer goes againe to the town-house, accompanied with the twenty Electors; and there they elect the councillors, that are to be of the lesser council. On the morrow, they are named to the council of two hundred, and after that their election is approved, they goe and sitte downe in their places. Now in regard that the council of Lucerna doth command no longer time the six Months onely: the election of the Seigneurs both for the lesse and greater council, is made twice yearly, if there be any vacante places, and that is done about mid-Iune, and mid-December. The new councillors are taken from the lesser council, that governed during the sixe precedent Moneths.

The Auoyers or Consuls, who are about the other Seigneurs, are elected by the lesse and greater councils, & by common voyces. The authority of the Auoyer at Lucerna, lasteth but a yeare, and a yeare at Berne: but yet in such manner, that the voyces are yearly taken for him, and hee againe elected. Next to the Auoyers of Berne, the principall men in the common-wealth, are the four Banderets, chosen out of four companies of trades-men onely, or men of handy-crafts, to wit, Carpenters, Curryers, or Leather-dressers (who are distributed in three parts) Bakers, and Butchers.

The Towne of Berne is divided into four parts, which are committed (each one of them) to these four Banderets: who view and over-see the Armes of all the Bourgeses, and provide for the affairs of warre. They continue in their charge the space of four yeares: but every yeare on the same day as the Auoyer is elected, they resigne their estates, and deliuey in to the hands of the cheefe Vsher of the Seigneury, their Ensignes, and all the other marks of their dignity, which are laide on a Table before the Auoyer and the council: and then the great and lesser council giues their voyces, concerning the Banderets. If one of them have continued in his charge fully four yeares, or is preuented by death, another is planned in his place: but yet it is thus conditionally done, that if the dead did not finish his four yeares, his succellour must accomplish them in the nature of a substitute, and afterward, execute the same charge four other yeares.

In all the Townes of the Switzerland, the dignity of Purse-bearers or Treasurers is great. Some whiles, the time of their charge is not limited at all; but they continue in that estate, so long as please the council, and themselves also. There are two of them at Berne, the one receiue the reuenuues of the Towne, and of the Allmaigne country: the

the other is for the Romane country, because he receiue the reuenuues which the Seigneury derieth from the countries of Vant, and of Sauoye. Those men which we haue so lately named Auoyers, Banderets, and Treasurers, with one councillor of the two hundred, are called at Berne, Die heimlichen Rath, which is as much to say, as the secret or priuy council. For to them (before all other) matters of most secrecy, of consequence, and which concerne the whole Common-wealth, are reported and trusted.

After that the abouenanied Magistrates haue bene elected, and confirmed by the lesse and greater councils; aduice is vsed, concerning other publicke Offices, which is done in some of those Townes the very same day, and on the morrow in others.

As for those estates that haue not any dignity, as Sericants, Executors of iustice, Messengers, Watches, and other such like charges: ordinarily, the lesser council bestowes them of such, as they know meetest for them.

The Bernians hold this properly to themselves, as concerning election of their councillors, that they will not receiue any person into the lesser council, if he be not borne within the Towne. In elder times, if the sonnes of councillors were borne out of the Towne, they could not attaine to the fathers dignity. Now adayes, when some councillors are absent, about occasions of the weale-publicke; and for the gouerning of some Bay-livicker: if they happen to haue any children, they are reputed as borne in the Towne. For the great council, they may bee elected that are borne out of Berne: provided that they be Bourgeses, haue houses in the Towne, and are illud of the Switzerland country, or of the confederates of the Cantons. For no man is receiued into the council of the two hundred, if he be borne out of Switzerland: and the same is in practise at Zurich, as we haue already declared. In like manner; bastards, and people of infamous note, are quite excluded from council.

There are three Courts or Benches of iustice at Berne; all the Iudges whereof, are elected by the Banderets & Treasurers, and are confirmed by the lesser council.

furers, and are confirmed by the lesser council.

The first Court of iustice is called, Das Vsergucht. The Auoyer presideth there, but the cheefe Vsher, whom they call Der grofz Weibel, doth (almost) daily keepe the place, and hath 12 Assistants, to wit, the last man elected of the four Banderets, one of the Seigneurs of the lesser council, and tenne of the great, with one Secretary, and two Officers. They take knowledge of debts, injuries & outrages of slender consequence, as if one man giue another a box on the eare, or giue some words to his disgrace. A man may appeale from their sentence, to the lesser council, and from them, to the sixty men, which is a council composed of Seigneurs of the lesser council, and of sixe and thirty councillors of the great council. From the sixty, appeale may bee made vnto the generall. The Iudges doe assemble euery day to conclude cansses, onely Tuesday excepted, which is the Market day.

The second Court of iustice, iudgeth the appellations of the country of Sauoye; and therefore it is commonly called, the Court for strange Appollations; Das veltch Appellants gucht. The Purse-bearer or Treasurer of the country, siteth in iudgement there, & hath ten assistants, to wit, two Seigneurs of the lesser council, and eight of the great, with one Secretary and an Officer. They end all the appeales for the country of Sauoye, and giue audience to parties at all times, and as oft as they desire it. Notwithstanding, their ordinary vs is to meete after the day of S. Martin in November, vntill the Month of December. All they of Sauoye come thither to the appellations, they onely of Lansanna excepted: but at euery two yeares, the Treasurers cometh to Lansanna with some assistants, and there decideth the cansses of appeale.

The third Court or iurisdiction, takes knowledge of matrimoniall causes. It is the Consistory, where there are eight Iudges; two of the lesser council, who preside or giue sentence there (turne by fiftie) from two Moneths to two Moneths; two Ministers of the Church, four of the great council, and they haue a Secretary or Clerke, and an Officer. They assemble three times in the weeke, namely,

namely, on Monday, Wednesday, and Friday, then they consider not only on matrimoniall causes, but also cause such as give scandales, and put in practise the discipline of the Church. Moreover, these men and the Judges of the first court of justice, doe hold in estate but halfe the year, and are changed about Easter, and likewise about the end of September.

They of Lucerna have two courts of justice, the one they call Das vuchengricht, because the Judges do meete every weeke, and decide all suites proceeding of debts and contracts. The other is called Das nurgricht, the justice of nine: for nine Judges take knowledge of injuries and outrages, and accordingly inflict punishment. There is not any Consistory at Lucerna, neither at Fribourg, or Sollemure: because they are Catholics, and subiect to the jurisdiction of Bishops, by whose Officials the causes concerning matrimony are debated.

As for criminall matters capital, there are not any particular Judges thereto appointed, neither at Berne, nor Lucerna. But when question is made concerning any ones life, the great and smaller councils take knowledge thereof, and iudge it. The Auoyer sit in cheefest authority, and censure on the matters. After sentence is refused on at Berne, the Auoyer goes and sits in a seate of justice, appointed in some eminent part of the Towne, enuironed with Officers of the Seignury. Then the Clarke or Secretary readeth out aloud the confession of the offender, & the sentence given against him. Afterward the Auoyer enioyneth the hangman to execute the sentence, and commandeth the condemned person to be delivered to him. At Lucerna, the councill do iudge in criminall causes, of all the Bayliwicks, and all the Malefactors are punished within the Towne. But in all the Bayliwicks of Berne, there is justice apart by it selfe, which they call Landgricht, and the Judges of all the bayliwicks are called, and give their aduice in presence of the Bayliwicks, who preside: and yet in such sort, as the councill of Berne may approue, or change the sentence, if they thinke good.

The Bernians have many Bayliwicks, & are the most powerfull Seigneurs of the Leagues. In some they speak the Alleman or Germane tongue; in other the Romane or Sauoyan. Among the Alleman Bayliwicks, there are foure depending on the Towne, and are euen as Subburbs thereto: whereof the foure Banderets are Bayliwicks, and if they were to go to war, those Bayliwicks march vnder the Ensignes of the foure Banderets. Moreover, there are seuen and twenty other beside, to wit, the vale of Hafel, which hath an Amman, out of the body of the inhabitants, but hee is elected by the councill of Berne, & there rendreth an account of his charge. Vndersee is a Towne so named, because it is at the end of a Lake: whether is an Auoyer sent, but he is of the Towne of Berne. The vale of Simma, both high and low, do call their Bayliwicks Schachtlander, that is to say, Castilians. Fruingen, Sane and Aelen, do name their Bayliwicks, Gouernour. Laupen and Thun are in the same condition as Vndersee.

Next to these, are Signow, Trachselwald, and the Rivers of the vale of Emme. Brandis, that receiues her Bayliwicks from the Lord of the place: but hee is numbered among the Bourgeses of Berne. Sumf-wald, where the Masters of the Teutonicke Order established a Bayliwicks. Burgdorf and Pyrmatic are gouerned all alike, as Vndersee, Landbunt, Arberg, Nidwau, Erlach, Bippin, Wange, Arwange, Arbourg, Biberstein, Schenkenberg, and Lenzburg. Moreover, there are three free Townes in the country of Ergow, vnder the Seignury of Berne, to wit, Zofinge, Aron, and Brug. There are eight Roman Bayliwicks, as namely, Ananches, Modon, Turdun, Laufanna, Morges, Nyon, Orbe, Allie and Vevey. Beside, they of Berne and of Fribourg have foure Bayliwicks in common; as Mort, Schwarzenbourg, Granson, & Chablais, whether they send a Bayliwicks successively at every 5. yeares end: so that if the Bayliwicks be of Berne, his causes of appeal goe to Fribourg, where the reasons of the Bayliwicks are examined. There are Prouosts beside, for the gouernment of Abbeys. The Bernians had nine in the Allemane country, sixe whereof held iurisdiction, and three in the Romane country.

They of Lucerna have onely two out of the Towne, as at Wiken, and at Sempach: but hee of Sempach hath no other authority in the place, but only the superintendency of the Lake, and of the Fish.

As for their other Bayliwicks, they are gouerned by some of the Seigneurs of the councill. Those Bayliwicks are Willison, the Vale of Entlibuch, Rotenbourg, Halsbourg, Berne, and the neighbouring countie, which they call, Chelamp: Moriswande, that hath this priuiledge, to chuse for Bayliwicks, one of the Seigneurs of councill in Lucerna, euen whom they list, except the Auoyer: Weggis, Elbon, Horbe and Krientz. Moreover, the two Townes of Sursey and Sempach, are in the protection of the Lucernians: Neuerthelesse, they haue their councill apart by themselves, who iudge in causes both ciuill and criminall. But the Auoyer of Sursey, giueth his oath to them of Lucerna. Hee of Sempach is elected by the councill at Lucerna: but hee is in number among the citizens of Sempach.

The law of likenesse or equality, which the Latines termed Lex Talionis, is as yet vied (in some sort) at Lucerna. For if any man kill a citizen of the place, although hee did it vpon iust occasion, hauing beene prouoked thereto by the other, and in defence of his owne body: yet if hee be taken, they smite off his head; or if hee flye, hee is banished for euer. But if hee make satisfaction to the children or kindred of the dead, and cause them to giue ouer all pursuitt: hee may obtaine leaue of the councill to come againe into the townie.

Among all the Switzers, there is not any but them of Lucerna, that make vse of Braffe Cornets, instead of Trumpets. The crooked Cornets, which they call Partsch-boener, giues a frightfull sound. The Romans also made vse of Cornets in warre: and thereupon, they that founded or winded those Cornets, were called Comitines. The men of Lucerna say, that Charlemagne gaue those Cornets to the, because they carried themselves valiantly in a warre which hee had against the Saracens, and that Rowland, a Lord very highly beloued of Charlemagne in those times, serued himselfe with those kindes of Cornets long before.

The forenamed Townes do coyne monies, but Berne, Fribourg, and Sollemure, haue one particular kind of coynes: whereof two and forty Sols, and two thirds of a Sol, makes a Florin of Rhene. Moreover, they stamp another more great sort of money, which the Switzers call Den Dickenpfennig, and the French a Tellon. These Tellons are minted at Sollemure for the most part; and yet notwithstanding, are counted of lesse value, by a tenth part, then them of France. They of Berne coyned first certaine money, which the Switzers termed Baches: in regard of the figure of a Beare, which was stamped on the one side, for they called a Beare Bacren and Baczen. Afterward, the other Cities and Townes of Switzerland and of Swabia, coyned the same money: sixteene peeces whereof, valued a Florin of gold. The money of Lucerna cometh not neere to the value and price of that of Hafel, which is more hard and strong: for the Sol of Lucerna valueth but the moiety of that of Hafel, and fifty Sols of Lucerna, will make one Florin.

Now we come to speake of Fribourg, which is diuided into foure parts, like vnto Berne: the first is called the Borough, the second, the Island, or the Meadow, the third, the new Towne; and the fourth, the Hospitall. The councillers of the common-wealth are chosen out of these quarters. As in the other Townes, so in this there are two publicke councillers; to wit, the great councill, consisting of 2. hundred, and the lesser of foure and twenty. The election is made on the Sunday before S. John Baptist day. The lesser councill manageth the affaires of the Towne, deciding the causes of appeals: except of the Bayliwicks of Sauoye, conquered in warre. As for the matters which concerne the whole State, and are of maine importance, the councill of two hundred takes knowledge of them. The Auoyer, who preside both in the lesser & great councill, is elected on S. Johns day by all the people, and continueth in his charge the space of two yeares.

Next vnto the Auoyer, are the foure Banderets, who are Captaines of fuerrall quarters in the city or townie, & although they are not of the ordinary number of Seigneurs of the lesser councill: yet notwithstanding, they assist there in name of all the people, and deliuer their aduice, except in appellations. If some thing be propounded which seemeth to belong to the councill of two hundred, they may ther make their report of it. Furthermore they remaine in authority, three yeares: and

and are chosen by the great & lesse coun-cels, as many other Officers are. Then followeth the office of the Treasurer, who manageth the monies, and all the teuennues of the Towne: he hath (as his coadiuter) the Secretary or Clarke of the Towne, or his Committees, who register downe all those summes, which the Treasurer receiue, or imploeyeth. His charge also is, to haue an eye on all the publike buildings. Twice euery yeare he renders an account to the lesfer counsell, and remaineth in his charge, the space of three yeares.

In Fribourg there are foure principall Secretaries: the first is called Secretary of the Towne; the second, Secretary of the counsell; the third, Secretary of the country; and the fourth, Secretary of law or iustice. In like manner, the estate of Saulter, or cheefe Vsher, is honourable both in Berne and Fribourg, where it is named, Großschreiber. He is very often neere to the Auger, and when the Seigneurs are set in counsell, he is at the door, counteth voyces, calleth the parties, and takes care of prisoners. His charge continueth three yeares.

As concerning Law and Iustice at Fribourg, they are established in manner following. First, the Court of Iustice belonging to the Towne, called, Das Stättgericht, is a particular assembly of certaine Iudges, to know and decide differences among the Bourgeses. And if there be any criminall proceffe or suite;
their charge is to interrogate the prisoners, to present & deliuer the case in question, and then to relate all to the lesfer counsell. The other assembly of Iudges, is tearmed Das Landgericht, judging the causes of dwellers in the country. In each of these iurisdiccions, there are two Seigneurs of the lesfer counsell, and two of the great, and they meet three times euery week. Appeale may be made from their sentence, to the lesfer council.
Moreover, there are twelue Iudges, chosen out of the great and lesfer counsels,
for the appellations of the Bayliwicks, conquered in the last warre against the Duke of Sauoye. They meete together once in euery Moneth, and there is no appealing from their sentence.

At Fribourg there are two kindes of Bayliwicks, as in the other Townes: the one of Bayliwicks neighbouring to the Towne, which are gouerned by certaine Seigneurs of the counsell, who dwell in the Towne, and come dayly to counsell, and of such Bayliwicks there are five. The other is, when the Bayliffes are sent to dwell on distinct places with ample authority: and they of Fribourg haue fourteene such Bayliwicks, and foure in common with the Bernians. The Bayliffes are elected by the great and lesfer counsels, the morrow after S. John Baptists day, and hold in office the space of five yeares: but euery year they render an account of their charge, before the lesfer counsell.

They entrueth also, and deale in criminall suites: but them they send to the lesfer counsell with their sentence, which the counsell hath power to approue, change, or moderate.

That which at Fribourg is called Kro-nungen, and in the vulgar, Leistung, is carefully maintained at Fribourg. By these words is vnderstood a remise or ratiance for certaine time, and the charges to be on his owne head; when the debter doth not pay his debt, at or on the day of assignement, as in this manner. When the debter maketh not satisfaction, on the day appointed for repayment, the creditor sendeth one, two, three, or more seruants (on horse-backe) to an Inne or Hofery, whose expences there the debter is constrained to pay (tarry they there neuer so long) vntill hee hath made satisfaction to the creditor. Some say, that the Duke of Zerigen established this Law.
Such as infringe or breake it, are punished by imprisonment, banishment, or by the purse. And there is a certaine Iudge, who they call Bourgmester, that holdeth a strick hand in this case. Moreover, if a diuorcie or suite is moued, and a man demand the Eröstung three times, if it is not grated to the demander, it is present banishment. Such as breake the peace, wherein they are enioyned to liue one with another, are banished likewise: and they that (without iust cause) will meddle, or take part on eyther side, when a cause is in pleading.

Finally, the Fribourgers make feasting yearely, with solemne procession of all citizens through the Towne, on the second day of March, and on the eight and twentieth day of Iune; which are dayes of battles

CHAP. VII.

Of the Commonwealth of those Cantons that haue neither Cities nor Townes, but dwell only in Villages.

Hitherto we haue discoursed on two formes of Common-wealths, concerned in the Cantons of Switzerland, that haue Cities and Townes. There remaineth now a third, which is of those Cantons that haue no Townes, but make their abode in Villages, and for that cause are called, Die Laender. There are fixe of them, to wit, Fri, Suits, Vnderwald, Zug, Glaris, and Appenzell. Zug indeede is a towne, & hath her Officers in the townes, but the souerainty of the Canton apper-taineth to them that dwell in the lands of the Canton, with them of the townes, and are Lords as well the one as other. In all these Cantons, the cheefe of the pub-like counsell, is tearmed Anman, which signifieth a man in office and authority, and that name is attributed to all publike Officers. So that Abbots, and other Ec-clesiasticall persons, do call their Iudges, Receiuers, and other such like Officers,
Anmans.

As the Townes are diuided or parted,
by Companies and Colledges of Arto-zans, or Trademen, so the Cantons are distributed into certaine parts and portions.

CHAP. VIII.

Of all the five Cantons forenamed, which in this ensuing Chapter we will handle together, according to their severall rights & iurisdiccions.

THE whole country of Fri is diuided into ten parts, which by them are called Gnosammun, as if a man would say, Participations. It may be in this respect, because they are all partakers in pasturages, goods, honours, and pub-like charges, and that from those ten parts onely, they are summoned and called, to be present at those assemblies which are yearely made.

The Country of Suits is diuided into fixe parts, which they call quarters. Because the country (heretofore) was ditributed into foure portions: but the people coming to encrease greatly, they made a new partage into fixe portions, which neuerthelesse do retaine the anti-ent name.

As for the Country of Vnderwald, there is a Forest that diuideth it in the middle: and therefore the diuision is thus made to them that dwell aboue and beneathe the Forest. The whole Country taketh name of that part which is beneath the Forest: for Vnderwalden is as much to say, as beneath or vnder the wood. In elder times, Stants, a principall Village beneathe the Forest, and neere to the Lake, was the prime and cheefe place of the country, and the people were called, inhabitants of the Valley of Stants. But now adays, because the word Vnderwald
is taken for the whole country, the Switzers haue added these words, aboue and beneathe the wood, *Vnderwalden ob
vnd nide dem kernwald*.

Now as concerning them of Zug, we haue said already, that they are diuided in two parts; the one is the Towne it selfe,
the other the Villages round about, com-prehended vnder three assemblies, to wit,
the Mountain, the Vale Egeris, and Bara,
a Parish very neere to the Towne.

Glaris is diuided into fifteene parts,
which they tearme Cagwan, the word signifieth the work of a day, and as much distance or spaciousnesse of ground, as a man can plow in a day. It may be, that these parts were called Iournals, or day-labours: because euery one prepareth & ordereth the way in his quarter, and each one knoweth where he is 'n labour.

The country of Appenzell is parted into twelue orders or portions, which they call Raden, whereof those fixe conioyned to the Village of Appenzell, they name them the orders within, and antiently were subiects to the Abbot of *S.
Gall*. The other fixe are called the orders without: to wit; out of the Abbots Seigneury.

The council generall of all the people, & their appointed places of meeting.

Seignury; heretofore partly free, and partly in the iurisdiction of Gentlemen. Out of these parts (by equal number) are chosen certaine men, for the council of the Canton: in many of them there are threescore councillors, beside such as (having beene in office) continue perpetual councillors. At Zug there are five and forty councillors, nine of each assembly, for the Towne is counted for two.

The council generall of Appenzell, consisteth of an hundred forty foure, to wit, twelve of each order. And if matters of importance are to be treated on, and it appeareth needfull to assemble the council of all the people: then they will double or treble the council in this manner. Each of the councillors takes a man or two with him, if they be to hold a councill of three times as many persons, as ordinarily they use to do: and one of the councillors, on Sunday, in the Church after Service is done, hath a custome to signifie, that on such a day as he nameth, all the councillors are to meete in the Towne-house of the Canton, and each man is to bring with him such a one, as he holdeth to be an honest and wise man, who shall also be there bound to obedience, under the oath whereby all are obliged to the common-wealth. Beside, no man is elected to be a councillor, neither can he assist in the generall council, if he be not borne in the country, Ein Landman: And it is much more easie to obtaine the degree of Bourgeshippe, in the Townes of the Switzers, then in their Villages. Which proceedeth not of any inhumanity, for there are great store of strangers among them, towards whom they shew themselves very kinde and humane. But rather by a certaine order of aduised iudgement, and according to the custome of their predecessors: being neuer willing to mingle new commers among olde inhabitants of the country, both to prevent charges, and to preserve the common-wealth (the more easily) in one and the same estate and condition.

The souerainity in these fixe Cantons, belongeth to the assembly of all the people. All they of the country, from the age of fourtene, or sixtene, or vppwards, do meete eyther at the principall Village of the Canton, or else at some other place in the midd of the country. As they of Vri meete at Wetzlinge, distant halfe a dayes journey from Altorff, the cheefest Village of that Canton. The people of Glaris meete at Suanda. The ordinary and annuall assemblies of these Cantons, is made euery year about the beginning of May. They of Sms, of Vnderwald vnder the wood, of Glaris and of Appenzell, do meete the last Sunday of Aprill. They of Vri and of Zug, the first Sunday of May. In elder times, they of Zug held their generall council the 24. day of Iune, being S. Iohn Baptists day. They of Vnderwald about the wood, meete the first day of May.

In these assemblies, first of all he is elected whom they call the Amman, in which office hee continueth the space of two yeares. Heretofore there was no terme of time assigned, but (oftentimes) the same Amman gouerned for many yeares together. He is permitted to be chosen among all the people, as a man that (for his vertue and wisdom) shall be thought most worthy of that dignity and charge, without regard at all, in what place or Village of the Canton hee dwelth. Notwithstanding, in certaine Cantons, as at Appenzell, while the Amman is in his office of authority, hee goeth to remaine in the principall Village, where the publike council keepeth most.

At Zug there are three assemblies of them without the Towne. Next, the Towne hath the power of two assemblies, and the ammans are chosen by order of each assembly. They that are elected of the assemblies without, doe dwell in the Towne, during the two yeares that they are ammans. In the same assembly where the amman is elected, his Lieutenant also is chosen, whom they terme Stathalter: and so are the Treasurers or Purse-bearers, called by them Schekmeisters. Next, the Secretaries and Bayliffes which gouerne the Bayliffes of the Canton: or those which the Canton holds apart with other Cantons. Moreover, Edicts are there read & confirmed, or abrogated yearly, by the voyces of all the people: so likewise sports, and playing at cardes, dice, clancing, excessive drinking, force-stalling Markets of victuals, and such like things.

When the council is thus held yearly by yeare, councillors are elected and confirmed:

firm'd: but yet this is not done by euery assembly, but each of them ordered by the subiects of the Canton, and by the companies among whom they dwell. Finally, if at some other times of the yeare, there happen affaires that concerne the estate of the common-wealth, an extraordinary councill is held. As if need require, to send Ambassadors to the dayes at Bada, or to some other Kings and Princes; or if there be question of making alliances, be they eyther for peace or warre, &c.

Beside the lesser councill and the generall, composed of all the people; some of the cantons haue a councill more strict and priuate, and courses of iustice for difticion of suites. In the Canton of Suits, which is diuided in fixe parts, the principall councillor of each part is taken: and these fixe, with the Amman, make the councill of seuen, called secreet. These seuen do manage and order all the reuenues of the country, and furnish all that is laid out for publike expences. Moreover, there are two Courts of iustice, the one being called the order of nine, in regard of the number of Iudges, and there the Amman sits as President. In this Court are decided the causes of greatest importance: as of inheritances, outrages, and terrible injuries, hard to be endured.

The Court of seuen, (so is the other order of iustice called) where the Lieutenant to the Amman sits as President: and those seuen are Iudges in causes concerning contracts, debts, and such like. They of Vri haue (almost) the same gouernment: for there the Court of seuen, with the Lieutenant to the Amman, doe censure and iudge of debts, which exceede not the sum of threescore pounds. There is another iudiciall Court of fiftene, where the Amman sits as President, and concludeth causes ciuill of greatest consequence.

At Vnderwald also there are 2. Courts of iustice, the one at Stans vnder the wood, and the other at Sarna about the wood, and each of them hath an Amman. It is saide, that the country was parted, in the year one thousand, one hundred and fifty; when some debate fell among them for paying of a certaine tribute. And whereas before that time, they had but one councill, and one Standard, bearing a double key for the whole country: this partition caused each of the sides to take one key onely, and they that were about the wood, retained still their olde Standard, white and redde, because they were the greater part of the Canton. Then they vnder or beneath the wood, received from Popes another Ensigne, which had two keyes in it: for in regard that Stans (long before) had beene the principall Village of the Canton, they therefore kept still the Ensigne, which in those times they had at Stans.

The Towne of Zug, beside the councill generall of the whole country, hath a councill apart, order of iustice, Magistrate, a Lieutenant to the Amman, Treasurer, Voyer, &c. who iudge the causes of the Bourgeses, and manage all the publike affaires.

At Glaris there are two Courts of iustice, one of nine, the other of five Iudges, which the councill generall of the Canton do elect euery yeare. They decide law-suites in the Monthes of May, and of December onely. The nine take knowledge of differences concerning inheritances, and dangerous injuries. The five do censure suites of debts and payments, after that the nine (who keepe Court the space of fixe dayes) haue ended.

They of Appenzell haue two courts of iustice also, the first is kept in a publike place of the streete; in regard whereof, they call it Das gassen-gericht. Therein are foure and twenty Iudges, two of each order of the canton, and their President is the Vther of the canton, Der Landtweibel, and they meete together weekly enery Thursday: they condemne men in fines, and chastise such as wrong one another. The other court is called Das geschwoeren-gericht, iustice of oath: because twelve Iudges sit there, and take knowledge of differences, which are ended, by giuing oath to one of the parties. Moreover, from each order of the canton, a councillor is chosen, & many from the orders that are greater. These men make obseruation of such as breake public ordinances, and deliberate on matters which are to be propounded to the councill generall. In which respect, they are as Guardians of the lawes, and rearm'd cheefest councillors: their charge is perpetuall, and they are called in this canton,

But one councill and one Standard till the diuision.

The Popes gaue them another Ensigne.

like Cantons.

ton Landthelick.

Suits, Pri, Vnderwald, Zug, Glaris, and Appenzel, are Catholike, and vnder the Diocesse of Constance. And if there hapen any difference concerning marriages, they goe to the Officialtie of the sayde place, but they of the other opinion goe to Zurich.

Punishment
for adultery.

As for adulteries, they are chastised in each Canton: some, by confiscation of goods; others (sometime by the fine of ten Dallers. I haue heard likewise, that (diuers times) the councill general of the whole Canton, doeth decide some differences concerning marriages.

Justice in criminal causes.

Justice in causes criminall, is administred (almost in all the Cantons) by the publike councill, and oftentimes doubled or multiplied by the ordinary counsellors, the Zunnen sitting President, or his Lieutenant. At Zug, in criminal matters, other assistants are joynted with the councill or Iudges, chosen out of each diuision or assembly of the Canton. Sutes of Law are discust in an open publike place, where all may heare that which is said, and know the merite of the sentence giuen by the Iudges.

The order & disposition of the Bayli-wicks in these Cantons.

Now to speake of the Bayliwicks or Governements appertaining vnto these Cantons, they are carried and disposed in manner following. They of Pri send a Bayliffe into the valley of Linier beyond the Mountaines: who hath one of the same valley for his Lieutenant and Assistants also; with whom he iudgeth causes both ciuill and criminall, and continueth in his charge the space of three yeeres. Beyond the same Mountaines, they send Bayliffes also to Bellizona, and to two other places. They of Bellizona haue three Bayliffes, to wit, Bellizona, the Vale Brune, and Buiera, where the three Cantons doe command in such manner, that each of them hath alwaies a Bayliffe. Moreover, the inhabitants of Mount S. Godardo, are subiectes to the Canton of Pri, nevertheless they haue their Councill and their Amman, who are confirmed by them of Pri, & when there are criminal sutes, two of the councill of Pri do meet there. They haue their Standard likewise, but when they of Pri do display that belonging to the Canton, the other hold vp theirs.

They of Suits haue sometimes hadde

four Bayliwicks, to wit, the Marche, the Hermitage, Cusnach, and certaine small Villages or great Farmes, neer to the lake of Zurich: but the two former haue obtained municipall right, and doe elect a councill and triall of sutes in their owne bodye. Notwithstanding, euery yeare, when a councill generall is held at Suits, ordinarily they send their Ambassadors thither, and require, that they may haue leaue to elect their Magistrates; which is granted them, as in verie great fauour, with this exception, that they are to bee modest and obedient, for otherwise it remaineth in the peoples power of Suits, to send a Governour thither, whensoever they thinke meet.

Cusnach hath the same condition, but because, within some few yeares certaine strangers (customers for carriage of salt and other things that way) made their complaint, that they of Cusnach did them wrong, and vied them harshlie vpon no occasion: the men of Suits knowing the accusation to bee true, sent a Bayliffe thither againe, and appointed new ordinations for Cusnach. Besides, they haue two Bayliffes in common with them of Glaris, to wit, Vazac, which is a Towne, and Gastal. Thether they send Bayliffes, turne by turne, and alwaies there is one of Suits in one of the Bayliwicks, and one of Glaris in the other.

In like manner, they haue three other Bayliwicks in common, beyonde the Mountaines, in the valley of Linier, with the Cantons of Pri, Suits, and Vnderwald. The charge and office of all their Bayliffes lasteth two yeeres, except in the Bayliwicks beyonde the Mountaines, where they holde for the space of three yeares; and they goe not to the other but at certaine times, and to decide law controversies.

They of Toggenbourg are not subiects but Bourgeses of Suits and Glaris, and goe to warre for them successively. They of Zug send Bayliffes to Cham, a very little towne neere vnto their lake. The Saint Andrew, sometimes a Towne, to Hunenberg, Walchenill, Stein-house. To Saint Wolfgang, and to other Villages. They bought this Countie in the yeare 1517. Next, with them of Suits, they send (turne by turne) Bayliffes to four Bayliwicks, to wit, the Marche, the Hermitage, Cusnach, and certaine small Villages or great Farmes, neer to the lake of Zurich: but the two former haue obtained municipall right, and doe elect a councill and triall of sutes in their owne bodye.

Vazac and Gastal. They of Toggenbourg are their Bourgeses, as we haue sayde already; and goe to warre for them, and for the Canton of Suits. Finally, the five first Cantons are Lordes with the other Cantons, of the Bayliwicks gouerned by them in common: except the men of Appenzel, who send a Bayliffe onely to Montsal, with the seuen first Cantons, & in the same manner.

Now follow some particular customes of these fixe Cantons, which are not common to all the Switzers. Whosoever shall haue committed a murther, although it was done in the defence of his owne body, hee is constrained to forsake the Canton, and it is not lawfull for the lesser councill to repeale him; but hee may demand and obtaine leaue of the councill generall to returne againe.

They doe not permit, that Landes or foundations of inheritances should bee pawned or ingaged vnto any one that is not of the Canton; for they holde them to bee no longer Lords of their country, if once they will become bound for debts and mortgage in such manner their inheritances to strangers. Likewise in the Canton of Pri, it is not lawfull for strangers, that haue bene receyued there as inhabitants, to buy any inheritances, but a house and a small garden for Pot-herbes onely.

If any man being drunke, doe commit some scandalous action, hee is punished by imprisonment, and beside, hee is forbidden to drinke wine for the space of a certaine time, and vntill the Councill generall haue pardoned him.

In publike assemblies, and in the distribution of honourable charges and Offices: hee that is put in election, is present, and his parents, brethren, and sons may giue him their voyces. They giue their voyces by lifting vp their hands on high, and some are set in an eminent place to count them. If they stand in doubt, and cannot so decide it, then they haue another course. There are two men, who hold two Halberds touching together at the points; they that giue their voyces, do passe vnder them, and two other men count them as they passe.

Finally, they vse Feasts and Processions, on such dayes as their Ancestors obtained any remarkable victory. As they of Glaris do yearly celebrate the memoriall of the victory which they wonne against the Austrians, in the yeare 1387. and in the month of April, I wil declare at large, the ceremonies observed by them in this festiual; to the end, the better iudgment may be made of such feasts as are vied by others.

The order of the solempne Feast and Procession, performed by the men of Glaris in honour of their victory against the Austrians.

IN the moneth of April, euery yeare, on the Thursday of the first weeke (except Easter day fall on the Sunday following, for then it is deferred til Thursday in the weeke after) the Feast is celebrated. On the Sunday before, it is a lowde and openly published in the church, in behalf of the Seignery, that on Thursday following, the most honourable persons of euerie Family, especially the men, are to meete and go in solempne Procession to Mulhensere, by those waies, places, and passages, where their Ancestors were in great danger, euen so far as the Fountain, and to be warie of descending to the Village of Hawes, til first they haue pall the other way. Moreover, that all keepe silence while the Sermon is done, and to carrie themselves (that day) so modestly in their refection, that no disorder may bee noted, because the Seignery will chastise them seuerely that do otherwise, and because the whole Canton of Glaris doth solempnly feast that day. Forbidding also, that no man shall mount on Horsebacke out of the Village of Glaris, sicke & aged men onely excepted, who are not (being so mounted) to goe anie further then Scheneffingen.

After they are all assembled together, and rounded in a ring as it were, the Amman, who is in the midd, makes a kinde welcome (in name of the whole Canton) vnto such strangers as are come thither. First, to the Ambassador of Suits, who is yearly sent for celebration of the Feast: because thirtie Souldiers of Suits were present in the battell for which this Feast is kept. Likewise, he salureth the Abbots, Priests, & neighbors of Gastal, Marche, Rapperswill and Toggenbourg, giuing them hearty thanks, for coming to celebrate this this ſolemne Proceſſion, and to thanke & ſing praifes to almighty God, the Virgin Marie, and their Patrones, S. Fridolin, and S. Hilary.

Fiſt, one beareth a red Standard, wherein is the Image of S. Fridolin, then follow 4 men, bearing a guilded Toomb, whereon are many faire and holy reliques enchaſed. Then come the Croſſe-bearers, carrying the Croſſes of Glaris, Haurer, of the Vale of Linshe, and of the churches neighboring to the Canton of Glaris, as of Schennis, Wefen, and others. The Croſſes are followed with Banners of all the Churches, and the Priests come after them, ſinging according to their order. The Curate of Glaris is the fiſt, accoſed by an Abbot, or elſe ſome other man of the Church. Among the ſtrangers the other Priests follow. Then the councell of Glaris, to witte, the Amman, with the Ambaſſadour of Suits; then the Lieutenant to the Amman, and the other Officers in their order, each guiding or leading one of the moſt honourable ſtrangers. The women (in great number) follow, to make vp the end and concluſion of the Proceſſion.

Being come to the place where the bartail was fought, there are eleven ſtones ſet down in thoſe ſeveral parts of ground where they began and held on fight with the enemy: for they had partings & meetings againe at hand-blows, eleven ſeverall times, and at each of thoſe ſtones the Standards and Banners ſtay, and all fall vpon their knees in prayer to God. Whē they are come to the ſixt ſtone, they caſt themſelves round in a ring, and then the Secretarie of the Canton readeth in a paper, the cauſe and originall of this Proceſſion, the ſummary whereof is this. War being moued betwene Leopold, Duke of Austria, and them of Zurich, Berne, Solothurne, Lucerne, Juri, Suits, Unterwald, Luz, and Glaris; Leopold led his Army to Sempach, where hee was ouercome, and ſlaine by the Switzers, the ninth day of Iune, one thouſand, three hundred, foureſcore and ſixe, beſide ſixteene Earles and Barons, and a great number of Gentlemen.

Afterward, in mid-August following, they of Zurich, Vri, Suits, and Glaris, beſieged and tooke the towne of Wefen, & the inhabitants promiſed perpetuall ſidelity to the Switzers. Truce was made, till the beginning of Lent in the yeare following, which being ended, and war beginning againe, they of Glaris ſent a Garriſon to Wefen, where the Souldiers thinking themſelves to be in ſafety, and conſiding on the oath of the townſemen, were ſlaine (for the moſt part) in a night by them of Austria, who entred in the dead of night, by intelligence which they had with certaine of the inhabitants, that machinated this villany againſt the garriſon, and opened the gates to their enemies.

Furthermore, that the very ſame yeare, and the ninth day of Aprill, they of Austria brought an Army of fifteene thouſand men towards Haurer, and wonne the Fortreſſe of the Country. But three hundred and fifty Souldiers of Glaris, & thirty which the Canton of Switz ſent to aſſiſt them, ſlayed the enemy, and (Gods helps furthering, the Virgin Marie, and their Patrones, S. Fridolin and S. Hilary) they became conquerors, wonne eleven of their cheefeſt Enſignes, and liſt two thouſand five hundred enemies ſlaine in the field, beſide them that were drowned in the Lake, and among theſe, many of Wefen were there ſlaine, that formerly had betrayed the Garriſon of Glaris. And therefore, in dutifull thankfulneſſe to God almighty, the glorious Virgin Mary, and S. Fridolin, and S. Hilary their Patrones, and to all the Saints and Sainteſſes of Paradiſe, & in everlaſting remembrance of ſo great a helpe and deliuerance, this annuall Proceſſion was ordained vpon thoſe limits, where their Anceſſours had ſuffered many inconueniences.

After the reading of theſe ſeverall letters, a Sermon is made in the ſame place; the Priests of Glaris performe their Anniverſary, and followeth the Miniſter of the new opinion. All their prayers being ended, they go againe to the ſame ſtones, in the ſame rank and ceremony as they began, untill they come to the eleventh, which is placed neere to the Village of Haurer, towards Wefen, where they ſlayed the enemy at the laſt time. Then they take their way to the Church of Haurer; but they of the new opinion return home to their houſes. The reſt go to the church, where they ſing a Maſſe for the Switzers that were ſlaine in the bartail: and one reciteth all the names of them of Glaris, that perished there. Soone after this, a banquet banquet is made (at the Cantons expences) for the Priests, and all the ſtrangers that came in the Proceſſion. After dinner, the Priests ſinging, bring backe againe to Glaris the guilded Toombe, the Banners and Croſſes.

This is the manner of the annuall Proceſſion and Feaſt of them of Glaris, in remembrance of ſo famous and remarkable victory. The other Cantons alſo haue their Feaſts, to celebrate the victories obtained at Morgarten, Sempach, and elſewhere.

CHAP. IX.

Of the Common-wealths belonging to the Confederates. And fiſt of all, Of the Abbey of S. Gall.

AFTER we haue ſpoken of the thirteene Cantons, and of their ſeverall Common-wealths; me-thinks now (according to the ſame order) wee ſhould make mention of their Confederates, among whom, the Abbot and Abbey of S. Gall holdeth the prime place. The Abbots of S. Gall, haue bin great Lords for the ſpace of many ages poſſeſſed of great meanes, and numbred with the Princes of the Empire: but I know not well, from what Emperour they receiued this honour and title. Stumpfius noteth, that Conrad de Pfauers, Annaliſt of Switzerland writeth, that Abbot Huldrich, of the houſe of Alſace, was made Prince by the Emperour Phillip, in the city of Baſile. Now albeit theſe Abbots are not of ſuch power as heretofore; yet notwithstanding, they continue ſtill great Lords, and haue their dominion in large extendure.

In the country of Turgow they are Lords of Wile, and haue a Pallace and a Vicar in the Towne. Moreover, in the high country of Turgow, they haue a great Territory, and well peopled, who are all ſubiect to them. All kinde of duties, and ſuch as are rendered to Princes, in theſe places are confirmed vpon him.

Two councils in S. Gall.	king the Towne much renowned, It hath two councils, according to other towns, to wit, the great and the lesse. The lesse is composed of foure and twenty, and namely first of all, twelve Zunftmesters . Each Tribe, Colledge, or Company, hath three Masters, which gouerne the company a yeare, turne by turne: but there are no more then two, which enter into the lesser council; the first is of the new, the second of the olde. The thirtieth Zunftmeister , is the first of the eleuen, which are elected out of each Tribe, to be of the great council.	The election of the Sub-Consull or Vnderburgmaster.
Twelve masters.	The Zunftmesters are elected by secret voyce in their Tribes, and are confirmed by the lesser council. Euery yeare, the council and officers of iustice, are elected about mid-Iune, and mid-December. Beside the Zunftmesters , nine other Senators do assise in the lesser council, and are chosen as well in the company of Noblemen, as in the other companies. The three Consuls (with them) make the number of foure and twenty councillors: For there are three Consuls in S. Gall, the first is in charge; the second is called olde Consull, for hauing gouerned in the very neerest yeare before; and the third preiudeth in iudgement for criminall causes, and in other places he is called, Prouost of the Empire, Iserehuogt . The council is elected the first Sunday of Advent, not in the lesser council, but in the general, by secret voyce, Mis deruun : the Sub-consull and the Zunftmesters , going then out of office, do collect the voyces.	When the lesse council do assemble together.
The election of the Zunft- masters.	The great council is composed of threescore and sixe, to wit, twelve of each company: whereby there are ninety persons in the great and lesse councils. After the election of the Consuls and the council, the ordinances of the Towne are read in this assembly: whereon the Consull and the new council do deliberate. Then they go (by two and two together) to the great Temple or Church, named S. Laurence, where all the citizens meete, and after reading of the lawes and ordinances, the Consull sweareth first to obserue them, and afterward, receiuerth of the council and whole assembly, the same oath. The great council also doth sometimes extraordinarily meete when they are to discourse on matters, whereof the council ought to haue knowledge, as concerning sentences in criminall suites. Then the Prouost of the Empire sitteth President, and demandeth each case: this is done in the Towne-house, and the doores kept close. The lesse council electeth the Prouost, and giueth him power to iudge. Afterward, the great council decideth the appellations made vnto him, and receiuerth such strangers as desire to be Bourgeses. and then also they conclude there on many appeales. Sometimes the lesse council fendeth affaires of importance to the great council, to bee considered on.

Euery yeare, the council general of all the people, is assembled three times, about publike affaires. First, to elect the Consull. Secondly, the morrow after Christmas day, to take oath of the new Consull, and to binde him to obey the Magistrates. And thirdly, in the Moneth of August, about S. Bartholmewes day, after that the ordinance for tolles and taxes is agreed vpon, to heare the Lecture, which is made before all. Moreover, the lawes and statutes of the Towne are distributed into three parts; one part whereof is deliuered to the people, in each of these three assemblies.

The principall and cheefest Court of iustice, is that of sue; who are the Consull, the Sub-Consull or Lieutenant, one of the new Zunftmesters, and two of the new council. They iudge in differences concerning borrowed monies, things laid to pawne, debts that haue no certaine time prefixed, wages that are due, suites concerning victuals, injuries, and fines. They sit on the Wednesday, or Friday, and there is no appeale from their sentence; neuertheless, they may send backe difficult causes, and of importance, to the lesse council.

Next to this, there is the Towne court of iustice, Das Statgricht, composed of twelve Assitants, chosen out of the Noble mens companie, and out of the other companies: so that the one is of Zunftmesters, and the other of the people. The cheefe Officer of this court is called Satamman, Maior of the city, and is elected with the other Magistrates, about Christmas day, and is confirmed by the great council. As for the Assitants, they are changed twice euery yeare, and elected by the great council, on one of the feast dayes of christmas, &c. by the lesse council, about S. John Baptists day, in the Moneth of Iune. These Iudges take knowledge of debates, barrings, and yearly rents, although the summes bee great. They are called together by tolling the Bell, and assemble in the Towne-house on Monday in euery weeke, except it bee a Feast day, or that all the council doe meete together, for then they referre those causes till Wednesday. A man may appeale from their sentence, to the lesse council, provided, that the suite be of no lesse moment then an hundred Sols, or Shillings: and if the appellant loseth his cause, he is condemned in a fine to the Iudges.

The consistory court is composed of eight Iudges, whereof foure are Ministers of the Church, or some other men of learning: next, two councillors of the lesse council, and two of the great. There sitteth another Seigneur of the lesse council, as President, who questioneth the causes: and if there be as many voices on the one side, as on the other, hee reduceth both parties to such a counsell, as hee conceiue to be iust, and then sentence is giuen accordingly. The consistory censureth matters of marriage, and of diuorces, and no appealing is permitted from sentence. But if there happen any inuolued or entangled variance, or if some colour of pollicy be mixed with the case of marriage; then cause and all, is sent to the council, where the deciding is suspended, vntill the council, and some other learned men, haue aduisedly considered thereon.

As for publike Offices, estates, and charges, this common-wealth is therein gouerned, as the other are; hauing Treasurers, Masters of Halles, Receiueurs, and Administrators at the Gates, for customs, tolles, and taxations, Vogers, &c. Such as hold these places, do render their accounts, first to the Zunftmesters, next to the lesse, and lastly to the great council, on the morrow after christmas day. Hauing giuen vp their accounts, the lesse and great council do elect new officers, or reconfirm the olde: and it is openly read, what the charge is of each one of them in particular, and afterward, in presence of the council, they sweare to discharge their duty faithfully. But when many are established in one and the same charge, then such rules as they are to follow, are giuen them in writing.

And because the very greatest trading of S. Gall, consisteth in linnen cloth, and that not only the people of the towne, but them also in most part of the Villages round about, doe maintaine their liues thereby; the council is diligent and carefull, for well ordering all things in that respect, and for the avoyding of fraud and deceit. First, therefore, so soone as the weauer hath finished a peece of cloth, there are three expert sworne Visitors or Ouerseers, that come to looke vpon it, and according as it is good, or indifferent, they set on such and such marks. If it appeare to be bad and naught, they send it to the Zunftmaster of the weauers, and to the other eleuen Zunftmasters, who condemne the workman in a fine, or cut the whole peece into some portions, of eight Elles in length each one, or else through the midst, or if it bee worth nothing, they burne it openly. This view and visitation is done daily, and there is a Market of linnen cloth, which hath certaine Lawes, for the obseruation whereof, they that deale in such Merchandize are strictly bound.

After that the cloth hath bene scene and approued, the sworne Measurers do both Ell it, and marke it. The Measurers haue some other sworne men of the Mystery, to be their adiuncts, and the Merchants haue with them the Ouer-seers of the measuring. They call them Zentzeiff, measurers of linnen cloth, which are of diuers lengths: but a whole peece consisteth of 134. Elles, and may not be of any greater length. There is another view made at the whistlers, wher the cloth is thickened and whited. These Viewers are called Die wipffen Schotter. They looke that the clothes haue their requisite whitenesse, and whether they sustaine any harme in the thickning: and according as they finde, they marke, or condemne the whistler in a fine. Likewise there are certaine Merchants and Weauers, that visite the whistlers houses and grounds, to see if all things bee fitting and conuenient there: whether they haue sufficiency of wood and ashes, that none may be wronged by delay. Every yeare the Masters whistlers take newly their oaths, to doe their duties as becommeth them.

As for the clothes which the Viewers (whom they vually tearme Blaw und Schwartzschotter) thinke fit to send to the Diars: the cutters of linnen cloth, named Lpntwathschnyder, do cut them iust in the midst, and there are other committees, to regard that they haue their iust measure. After they are dyed into colours blew or blacke, if the Ouerseers finde the dying to bee well taken, they marke the peece, and when they haue planned and smoothed it with a Rowler; others come to approue it valuable, and they set on the Seale. Contrariwise, if it be spoyled and viciate in the dying: they cut it, or dip it againe, if it may bee done, and the Plainner and Diar are condemned in some fine. All these things aboue named, are very carefully obserued, and if any dare do otherwise, hee is severely punished. For the Towne or City of S. Gall hath this priuiledge, to condemne in criminall suite, to fetch men out of places of refuge, and to punish them that vse any fraud, in weauing, marking, sealing, dying, plainning, or misusing any Linnen clothes.

Something likewise must needs bee said, what order they of S. Gall take, to auoid the inconueniences of fire: becaue they hauing bene heretofore much endangered thereby, it hath made them (suriuiving) to be the more prouident. Every euening, for the space of a quarter of an houre, there is a Bell rung, and it is called Die feurglocken, the Fire-Bell: which admonisheth every one, to looke to the hearths of their Chimnies, for feare lest fire shold take in any part. There are three two Zunftmasters, that four times yearely do visite the hearths, furnaces, & chimnies in all the houses; and thereupon are called Die feurgichotter, Visitors for fire. They regard also, what Armes and prouision of foode the Bourgeses haue: and whether they be prouided and furnished, according to the ordinances of the Seigneury.

Beside, if there rise any impetuous windes, or any rough stormes or tempests happen (beside the ordinary Captaines of the watch, whom they call Die Wachtbister) there are two other, named Masters of the watch, Die wachtmaster, who take with them two men of every Tribe, well appointed, and goe with the Captaines of the watch, to walke the round through all the streetes of the City, to preuent the dangerous accidents of fire.

Every night, two and thirty men keepe watch on the Towers and Walles, and in other places of the City, beeing appointed as Sentinels, by the cheefe Zunftmaster, with the Captaines of the watch.

Concerning the Grisons in elder time.

If fire take in any part, some of the Citizens runne to the Gates, some on the Towers and Walles, some into the cheefest streetes; some keepe company with the Confull, and others labour to quench the fire. There are foure Captaines of the lesser councill, that haue a care of all this businesse, commanding every one to that which is to be done, and punishing greenously the disobedient. If the fire be without, and neere the city, they send forth a certaine number of men with their Captaines, to prouide against the inconuenience. Others keepe watch at the Portes, upon the Walles, and in other places, where they are by them appointed.

I spare to speake heere of Schooles, Almes-houses, and Hospitals, becaue they of S. Gall gouerne themselves therein, as other well pollicied cities do, and carry a faire and comely order among them. Likewise, I will not speake of the election of the Ministers of the Church, nor of their establishing and charge, neither what order they hold in their assemblies: becaue in this worke, we treat on the matters of pollicy onely, referring to discourse on the other, at some apter time and place.

CHAP. XI.

The Common-wealth of the Grisons.

THE name and dominion of the Grisons heretofore was of great extenture: but now wee vnderstande by that word, a people of the Alps, who the French and Italians haue named Grisons, and the Switzers Grauwundter. In ancient times, they inhabited Rhodia in the Alpes, neere to the fourie or head of Rheine, and of Inn.

The Grisons are diuided into three Leagues. The first is called the League

Grise, and hath ten Comminalties, to wit, the Abbey of Disentis, which the ancient Cardes or Mappes called Disentine. To this Abbey are ioyned Tauetch, Trumb, and some other places. 2. Waltersburg. 3. Obersachs. 4. Lagnitz. 5. Fals. 6. Planz. 7. Schlerwisch. 8. They of Laax, Sinsif, and them enuironing about the wood. 9. Thannen. The Grisons call these nine Communities; the part about the wood, Die obdem Wald; and the other ten; they call, vnder the wood. 10. Flims. 11. Trimon. 12. Sufen. 13. Ratzuns, the ancient abiding of the noble Family of the Barons of Ratzuns. 14. Henzenberg, and Tufis. 15. Schopine. 16. Schamps. 17. Splugen. 18. Malas. 19. Rufflee.

In each of these Comminalties, they yearely elect a soueraigne Magistrate, which many of them do call Amman, who with the Iudges or Assitants, elected by the same comminality, doth iudge suites in law, and condemneth delinquents, according to the exigence of the case. Beside these Ammans, there is a great Proctor of the whole League, whom they call Den Landtrichter, who is chosen by every one in the generall assembly of all the comminalties, and siteth President in the dayes meetings for all the League.

These meeting dayes for this Grise League, is in the Village of Trumb, which is the cheefe comminality, and there also meet the Seigneurs of the Iusticial court, wherein the Landtrichter siteth President, who hath fiftene Assitants, one Clarke or Secretary, and one Officer. The Lord of the Castle, and of the Barony of Ratzuns, is yet about the Landtrichter, by an ancient prerogative, belonging to the race of the Barons of Ratzuns, in whose rights, the Lords of the places haue enermore succeeded.

The second League is called Der Gottshuszpundt, The League of Gods Handhold, or of the Cade or League Cathedra, becaue of the Bishoppecke and Colledge of Coire: and it hath one and twenty Comminalties, which sometimes were reduced into eleuen much greater. The Towne or City of Coire is numbred in the first place, as the cheife of the League: and alone (among the eleuen Comminalties) is compounded of two lesser. But as the citizens are enclosed in the same walles: euen so are they counted but for one Comminalty, and the other twenty reduced into ten, make vp ten great Comminalties. The city (for so we will call it) of Coire, hath a common-wealth apart by it selfe, like (waiting but little) to that of Zurich, and to other governments of the same condition. For first of all, the citizens are wholly diuided into five companies, from each of which are chosen fourteene men, who are of the great councill publicke: so that the great councill and generall, is composed of feuty. From these feuty men, are chosen five of each company, for the lesser councill: to whom are ioyned the five Zunftmesters of the precedent yeare, whereby the lesser councill hath thirty counsellors, whereof fifteene called Senators, gouerne the common-wealth.

In the councill there are two Consuls, who are Presidents (turne by turne) a whole yeare. The councill and the Officers of iustice, are yearly elected on the cleuenth of Nouember, being the day of S. Martin. The thirty of the lesser councill do iudge in criminall causes, and the Gouernor or Prouost sitteth then as President, remaining in that charge a yeare: at the ende whereof, another taketh his place, and they two are (in this Office) as two Consuls. Next, there is a Court of iustice belonging to the Lieutenant, who hath fifteene Assistants, to witte, the five Zunftmesters, and ten from the thirty of the lesser councill. This Court taketh knowledge of ciuill causes, and pecuniary actions concerning debtes: there is appeale from them to the lesser councill, who doe decide also matrimoniall matters.

The second Comminalty, which wee should count for the third, because Coire takes it selfe for two, is named Die Vier Doerffer, the four Villages. 1. Bergon. 2. Tiefencastlen. 3. Stalla. 4. Trincken, with Reamps and other Villages, which with Tiefencastlen, make one iurisdiction, where the Bayliffe of Reamps iudgeth ciuill and criminall causes. 5. Vatz the high, where sometimes dwelt the Barons of Vatz: this Comminalty is ioyned with the fourth. 6. Furishnow. 7. Ortenstein in Tumlesch. 8. Sinnada. 9. Zutz: these two are in Engadin the high, and make one of the great comminalties. 10. Ardetie. 11. Sculine. 12.

Remusf: which with two other final comminalties, maketh one of the great. 13. Bergel about the Port. 14. Bergel vnder the Port. 15. Pefclaw, or Pofflaaf. 16. Brusch, which is ioyned with Pofflaaf, and maketh one of the eleuen great Comminalties. 17. Munitertal. 18. Mals. Each Comminalty hath his Ammans, Podeffats, and vnder-Officers as they teame them in least authority, vnder whom they are maintained in liberty.

The third League tearmeth it selfe the League of Iuridictions, or the league of Rights. The first and principall of the ten, is called Tafas, in regard of a Village so named, where the house of the League is, and where the dayes meetings for the ten Comminalties are held. 1. Beelfort, or Aluanuw. 2. Churwalden. 3. Langwif. 4. S. Peter de Schansf. 5. The little Abbey in Bretigow. 6. Tenas, or Cattelfer. 7. Schiers. These eight iuridictions doe acknowledge the Arch-Duke of Austria to be their Soueraigne. Anciently, the Barons of Vatz were Lords thereof: but all their race sayling, the Counts of Toggenbourg succeeded them. And after them, the Counts of Amst, whereof one being named Gaudemius, dying in the yeare one thousand, foure hundred, eighty nine, left these eight iuridictions to the Arch-Duke of Austria.

The Arch-Duke established a Gouernor there, which to this day is chosen among the Grifons. The Gouernor dwelleth at Cattelfer, and presideth in sentence of criminall causes: he manageth and conserueth the other rights of the Arch-Duke, who hath not the same right and equal authority over the eight iuridictions: but each of them enioyeth his priuiledges & particular customes, the instruments and charters whereof are kept at Tafas. The first and fourth iurisdiction haue great priuiledges and immunities, farre beyond the other.

The ninth Iurisdiction is called Mals, by reason of a Village so named, betwene the Riuer of Langquart, & Mount Rhaticus towards the South.

The tenth is named Meyenfeld. These two last did belong sometimes to the Barons of Vatz, afterward to the Counts of Toggenbourg; then they fell vnto Wolfhard de Brandis, in respect of his Wife, who was of the house of Werdenberg. The they they became ioyned (with the other eight Iuridictions) to the two Leagues of Grifons, and made the third, referring to the Lords of Brandis, the right iultly to them appertaining. Afterwardes, these three leagues together bought these Iuridictions, and sent a Gouernor thither, who dwelt in the castle of Meyenfeld, and fate President in criminall suites: he condemned men in fines, and to death, & gathered the tolles, and other publike reuennewes. The ten Iuridictions allyed themselves together, in the yeare one thousand, foure hundred, thirty six, conditionally, to succour one another, & be abiding in all things (iust and reasonable) against enemies, repelling all wrongs that should be offered to any of them, & procure the peaceable enioying of their liberties. Also, all rights and duties appertaining to the Lords, they should be duly rendered, they permitting them to possess their franchises and priuiledges: all the rest being carefull and proud to preferue the good and benefit of one another.

In the same yeare, or the next following, these Iuridictions made perpetuall alliance with the two other Leagues, and so the three leagues became ioyned as in one body, the particular parts whereof haue bene already mentioned. But in our numbering and setting them downe, we haue rather followed the situation of the place, then the ranke which they holde in the dayes of assemblies, wherin notwithstanding are many opinions: & therefore I will describe them heere, according to the comminalties of the two first leagues, & as they are comprized in their alliance with the Switzers. The Comminalties of the Grif league, are the vally of Langmitz, Flants, Oberjachs, Waltersburg, Laax, Sinif, and other places about the W woods, Flims, Schenis, Trimmis, Retzams, Nemtenberg and Tufs, Schamps, Rhinwald, Mafax and Ruffee, Safen, Thannen, Schopine, Fals. The Comminalties of the league of Cade, are in order as they followe, Coire, Furishnow, the foure villages descending on Aspremont, Vatz the high, Reamps, Tiefencastlen, Grifstein, Benio or Stalla, Auers, Bergel about and belowe the Port, Zutz, Sinnada, Pofflaaf, Steinberg, Schulis, Remusf, Munitertal, Mals, Galfen, and Schantzen. As for the ten Iuridictions, I vnderstand their order thus. Tafas, the three Iuridictions of Bretigow, Beelfort, or Aluanuw, Churwalden, S. Pierre, Langwif, Mals, and Meyenfeld. I know very well, that some doe name these Comminalties otherwise, but that importeth nothing, because in each Comminaltie there are many times notable villages, so that the Comminalty sometime takes his name of one, and sometimes of another. For mine owne part, I haue named the principall places of the Comminalties.

Thus then there are three leagues of the Grifons, containing fifty Comminalties, which (nevertheless) doe make but one Common-wealth. For, although many of the Comminalty haue their Iudges lawes, customes, & iustice, aswell ciuill as criminall, yet notwithstanding, the Soueraignty is with the councill of the three leagues (which they name in theyr Language, Ein pundes tag) 8 dayes of meeting or assemblies of Ambassadors, from each comminalty of the Grifons: whether some of them send two Ambassadors, others but one only. If the councill be ordinary, the Grif League sendeth thither 28. Ambassadors or counsellors; that of Cade 2. and from the Iuridictions, 14. If either one or other doe send a greater number, they haue no voyces there, but according to the aboue-named account. Sometimes also, the councill general of the whole Nation (which was made no long time since) do meet together: but that is very rarely.

The fore-mentioned councill, manageth the affayres of the common-wealth: yet in such sort, that the counsellors or Ambassadors deale not according vnto their owne best liking, but as the commandments and remembrances from their comminalties, and which they bring with them in writing on the dayes do direct them, and whereto they conforme their resolutions, which passeth by plurality of voices. The councill of the Grifons is (almost) like to that of the Switzer: for there they treat on the selfesame things which concerne the good of the whole countrey, of peace, of warre, of alliances, of Ambassadors, lawes and ordinances, & causes of appeales from the Haylwickes. There are three places appointed for the sittings in councill, to wit, Ylants in the Grif league, Coire in the league of Cade, and

Fifty Comminalties in the 3 leagues

The Councel of the three Leagues of the Grifons, and sending their Ambassadors thither.

The Ambassadors are to be guided by their directi- ons.

& Tafnas in that of the ten Iurifdictions. But oftentime the dayes are held at Coire at times of their affaires, which happeneth three times in the yeare: about the fixe and twenty day of January, the beginning of Iune, and the eleventh day of Nouember.

They haue another Councell or Senate, which they name Einbytag: wher the principal Magistrates onely, and, as being the cheefe of the three Leagues, do assemble themselves together. These men, are the Iudge-Princiual for the Grise-League; the Councell of Coire for the league of Cade, and the Amman of Tafnas, for the League of the tenne Iurifdictions. At all times, and as often as neede requireth, to provide for the publique affayres, and it appeareth not convenient, to call all the Deputies of the country together; then those 3. Principals do meete, with some of the cheefest of the three Leagues. But they cannot determine absolutely, onely they referre separately vnto the Comminalties of the three Leagues, whatsoever hath bene difficult among the Councillers, and that which is approued by plurality of voyces, is receyued of all. There is appeal also from the councell, to the Comminalties, and then matters are propounded in the Comminalties, whose sentences are set downe in writing: and being conferred on, they are gathered to a resolution and in arrest, by the pluralitie of Voyces.

As concerning iudgements in criminal causes: the Grifons doe therein proceede like the Switzers. If there happen any difference among the three Leagues, three or foure Iudges must be chosen on eyther side, and discharged of the Oathe which bindeth them to their league. They are to accord the difference by kind composition, or iudge according to theyr consciences. If the voyces fall out equal: an Arbitratour must be chosen by voyces and common suffrages of the three Leagues. If two Leagues bee in suite, they must referre themselves to the third, who shall deliuer vnto both the parties, the right whereby they are to be quieted. If it chaunce betwene two Comminalties of one and the same League: they must take (as Iudge) the verie nearest comminallty or Iurisdiction belonging to the same League. But when the Comminalties of diuers Leagues are at difference: the councell of the three Leagues, namely the Iudges, are to provide therefore.

When one Comminallty, or some particular person therein, hath proccesse and suite against the three Leagues, or any one of them; two or three Iudges of each League are then to be chosen for it. And when two Leagues are at difference against the other, fixe Iudges of the two Leagues, and fixe of the other alone, are to be appointed. If they cannot conclude the strife; an arbitratour must be chosen, by plurality of voyces of the three Leagues. These iudgements are to be deliuered first at Ylantz, nexte at Coire: a second time againe at Ylantz, then againe at Coire, and at Tafnas the last of all.

It would much weary mee, if I should describe at large the Statutes & customes of the Grifons: notwithstanding, I shall not greatly displease or offend the Reader if here I glance at a worde or two. First then, it is agreed vpon betwene them, by the consent and aduice of the whole councell, that neyther the Byshoppe of Coire, or any of the Ecclesiastical Order: shal elect or establish any ciuile Magistrate, nor aduance a Gouernor or Amman, for any Comminaltie or Iurisdiction whatsoever; but that the people of the Grifons (by theyr suffrages onely) shal elect and choose theyr owne Magistrates.

Such as haue obtayned any Offices of the Byshoppe, may not be accepted into councell, so long as they do remaine in his seruice.

As concerning the Ministers of the Church, euery Parish electeth their owne: may depose them, pay them theyr Wages, which are too little in many places.

Thoroughout the country of the Grifons, no smal Tythes are payed, and as for the great, they pay but the fifteenth part, and giue nothing in the felds, but they giue it in the house, and alwayes after the harvests both for their Grapes and corne.

All they that are of a comminalltie, may fish in all the Riuers and Pondes, and hunt both Beasts, and fye Fowles freely, within within their sayd Comminalty.

Thoroughout all the countries, one weight and measure of things liquid and dry, is to be vfed, to wit, the weight and measure of Coire. And it is not lawfull for the Bourgesies of Coire to alter any thing therein, without the consent of the other Leagues.

For our conclusion, we are to speak of Gouernments and Bayliwicks, wherein the three Leagues of the Grifons do command equally. On this side the Alps neere to Coire, they send a Gouernor to Meyenfeld and to Melanz. On the other side the Alpes beneath Bergel, toward the riuer of Maire, the Gouernment or Bayliwick of Plurs first presenteth it self, which is a great village in the field neighbouring to the Alpes and on the banks of Maire riuer, and euen as sightly to bee lookt on, as if it were a good Towne. In this place, there are digged infinite Chauderons of Rocks-stone coales, which serue as fell for the kitching; and it is faithfully reported, that the nature of this stone-coale is such, as when Fish cometh to boyling, they make them mount and leape out of the kettle into the fire; these coales are very abundantly sold in Italy. All the villages round about, are answerable and like to Plurs, where the Gouernour (whom they terme Podstat) decideth causes, & is soveraigne in that place in name of the Grifons, and deputed by them.

Next is the Towne and county of Clauenna, whereon Plurs in elder times depended. Clauenna is a Towne about the Lake of Coma, about fixe miles, as Antonius obserueth it also; in his booke of the wayes. The Grifons call the Gouernor of Clauenna, Commissary: & he is the most apparant, next to him of Sondria. The third more spacious and noble gouernement is that of the vale Telina, famous for the excellent wine, which there is made in extraordinary plenty, and is thence transported into Switzerland and Germanie. The whole vale of Telina, is diuided into fixe Bayliwicks. The first is that of Bormia a Towne about the valley, towardes the Mountaine of Brault: this Bayliwick hath many priuiledges and franchises, farre beyond the other. The second is the town of Tiran. The third is Tel, whereof (as some thinke) the vale Telina first tooke name. It is a Towne seated in a very high place, & appearing to be so naturally: & it is counted to be the best fortresse of all the Province. Sondria, the most renowned town of all the vale Telina, maketh the fourth Bayliwicke. It is the most rich & powerful among all the rest, and he that is Gouernor thereof, is called Captain, because ouer and beside the Bayliwicke, hee hath an eye to the whole valley when it is chief in Armes. He hath his Lieutenant, who iudgeth with him the ciuil causes of the the Bayliwicke. Hee iudgeth also the criminal matters of all the vally, hauing lawyers and learned men to his councell, and giuing sentence according to the Lawes and Statutes of the vale Telina: which neuertheless may be moderated & made milder in the Bayliwicke by the Podstats. Beside all this, all causes may be appealed to the councell of the Grifons Signeuries, or to them that they haue ordained commissaries, and sent to iudge: or finally, to the councell of the Comminalties, who haue the soveraigne power. The fixt Bayliwicke is called Morben, and the fixt Trabon, which is last of al.

This is the order of the Bayliwicks of the vale Telina, yet some doe not set the Bayliwick of Bormia in this ranke, but diuide the whole vale into three partes; whereof the first comprehendeth Tiran and Tel; Sondria maketh the second; & Morben and Trabon are the third. In electing the Bayliffes, they follow the order of the Leagues and Comminalties. As for example, if the Grise League establish a Capitaine at Sondria for two yeeres, the League of Cade sends one thither for the two following yeeres: at the end whereof, the League of the Iurifdictions sends one for two other yeeres, this order is obserued in each League of the Comminalties. And sometimes the Comminalties, who should send a Bayliffe by their turn, would elect him onely; but now the councell of the Grifons makes the election. The byshop of Coire, and the City, do stampe money. The Abbot of Dissenj hath the same priuiledge also, amongst many other.

CHAP. XII.

The Commonwealth of the Valaisians, or people of Valois.

THE whole country of Valois is divided into two parts. The higher Valois from the source or spring of the river of Rhone, so farre as the river of Morsia, which vnitheth it selfe with Rhone, somewhat beneath Sion. This was the dwelling of the ancient Viberines and Sedusians. The lower Valois, is from the river of Morsia, so farre as Saint Mauris, and this was the country of the Peragrians.

The higher Valois is divided into 7 Iurisdiccions, which they call Dixaines, wards, and Zenden in the Alleman tongue. I know not whence this worde is deriued, for it cannot produce the number often, because there are no more Iurisdiccions. A friend of mine told me, that the worde intended so much, as Diocesses, because that euery Ward hath his Diocesse or Iurisdiccion, his Common-wealth, and priuiledges apart by it selfe. Others do hold that the word Zenden commeth of another word, signifying, an Hundred: as in the Lawes of France, the Offices of the Earldomes or Counties, the Vicariates and Hundreds are number; and in some places of Germany, they are called Zendgrauen, the Iudges of some certaine Iurisdiccion. But without standing so strictly on the words original: wee may conveniently rearme them Diocesses or Communalities. So then, there are seven Communalities in the higher Valois, to wit, Goms, Brighe, Vespie, Raron, Leuck, Siders, and Syon. These seven Communalities haue thirty parishes. The lower Valois hath six Communalities, which they call Banneries: because each one hath his particular standard, and foure and twenty Parishes so numbred.

The Peragrians or lower Valaisians, had (in times past) long warre against the Sedusians and Viberines. In the end, after foure score and thirteen yeares, they were overcome and subiected; so that the Sedusians and Viberines ruined sixteen Castles, the old pitifull foundations whereof, are yet to be seene, and it is not lawfull for any to builde them againe, for feare they should proue hurtfull to the countries liberty. And therefore the higher Valois ouer-rueth the lower, and sendeth Gouernours thither to iudge in causes, & manage the affaires of the State. The Byshop of Syon (whom some call Count & Gouernor of Valois) is Prince of the country. Hee is elected by common suffrages of the Chapter of Syon, and of the 7 Dixaines of higher Valois.

The Annales of Valois do declare, that Charlemaigne gaue the County and Gouernment of Valois, to Theodosius, Bishop of Syon, and to his successors: with power to beare a sword, in signe of ciuill Iurisdiccion, and other priuiledges of Princes of the Empire. Because that Byshop (by reuelation of an Angel) had declared to Charlemaigne, that some secret sinne (I know not what) was forgiven him. Howbeit, there are sufficient circumstances to call the county into suspition, as we haue already made more ample mention in our description of the country of Valois. Notwithstanding, it is certaine, that the Emperours which came after Charlemaigne, accorded & confirmed the fore-named priuiledges to the byshops of Syon: namely, the Emperour Charles the fourth, then Charles the fifth renewed & increased them willingly, at the request of Mathew Shiner Byshop and Cardinal of Sion, from whom he had deriued many good and gracefull seruices.

Afterward, the Byshop had another grace granted, that the next most excellent estate to his, should bee that of the capitaine or Bayliue of the whole country whom they vse to call Landts Hauptman. He iudgeth in ciuill causes, and continueth in his charge the space of two yeeres: being elected by the Byshop, and by the Ambassadors of the Dixaines or communalities. Afterward, he is confirmed by publike approbation and consent of all the communalities, which haue each one his Magistrat, whom they of Goms, Raron, and Leuck, call Maire, the others Castilian. He iudgeth all suites, especially them criminall, with the counsellors which the communalities giue him as assistants. There be *Amman*s also (who are Appeale may bee made from the sentence, which is giuen by the Iudges of a comminality, to the counsell of Valois, who are called Den landts rath; and according to the custome of theyr Ancestors, they assembled twice a yeare, in the months of March, and of December. At which times, two or three Deputies of each Village, do meeete at Syon, in a Castle named Maierin. The Byshop assisteth there, and the Bayliue calls for the causes, and then they treat on affaires of the Common-wealth, election of gouernours and publike Officers, & such as shal iudge in the last power, of causes that concerne appeale.

The Barons of Raron, were sometimes great Lodes in the country of Valois. Their successors were the Lords of Chimron, who are Marshalls of the Bishoppricke of Syon, Vicount of Syon, and Steuwards of Valois.

As for the Maze, which they rearme Asutzen, it is a particular inuention of the people of Valois, to oppose thesclues against the power of great and rich men. Wee haue made ample mention in our description of the country of Valois, and there declared, wherefore it was putte in practise, and how it began.

We haue told you, that the Byshop & the seven Dixaines of the higher Valois, hold the souerainety of the whole country in their handes. The lower Valois is subiect to them, and is parted into sixe Communalities, viz. Gundes nere to Syon, is the chiefe Castlewicke or comminaltie of lower valois. Heeretofore it appertayned to the Canton of Berne, but in thewar which the Switzers made on the Duke of Sauoy, in the yeare 1536. the Valaisians did there recover it, in exchange of another country. 1. Ardon, 2. Sallion, 3. Entremont, 4. Murtinich, 5. the Towne of Saint Mauris in Chablais, where the mountains seeme as if they ioyned together. So that all valois, is shut or lockt vp by a Tower, & two gates (as it were) at both the endes of a bridge, vnder which the Rhone glydeth. In the yeare, 1475. the valaisians brake down the wals and fortresses of the fore-named places, except that of Saint Mauris. Without the country of valois, the valaisians possessed themselves of 3. Bayliwicks, during the warre of Sauoy: as namely, Monzey, Tuain, and Hochthal. Neuerthelesse, some few yeares after that they surrendered Ynion to Emanuel Philebert, Duke of Sauoy, and retained both the other.

CHAP. XIII.

The Commonwealth of Bienna.

THE Towne of Bienna made perpetuall alliance with the Bernians, as wee haue already sayde: and it happened in the yeare one thousand, three hundred, fifty two. Thirty yeares after, it contracted perpetuall Alliance with Solleurre; and in the yeare one thousand, foure hundred, and seuen, with Fribourg, so it became allyed with three cantons of the Switzers. It acknowledgeth as temporall Lord, the Byshop of Basle, because as concerning the Ecclesiasticall Iurisdiccion, it is the Diocesse of Lusanna: but it is a long time, since it was no more subiect to the spiriual gouernment of the Bishop, as in like manner were the citizens of Zurich and Berne.

Afterward, when it came to passe, that the Bernians got the possession of the Bishoppricke of Lusanna, they enfranchised Bienna of the Ecclesiasticall subiection. The Byshop of Basle is Lord thereof very peaceably in temporall power, and establisheth the soueraigne Magistrat, whom they call Maire: but hee is chosen out of the number of the Townes counsellors, and the Maire giues oath to the counsell, and they to him. Hee taketh knowledge (with the counsell) of criminall causes; & sitteth as President in censuring them. The moitie of fines, amounting to aboute 3. Liures Tournois, appertaineth to the Byshop, with some tenths, and other reuenues: but the ports, rolles, customs, and such like, belong to the Towne only, and not to the Bishop. For hee is not permitted to impose any charge whatsoeuer vpon the Bourgeses, nor to engage the Towne: but the Bourgeses are bound to go in warre for the Byshop, and at theyr owne expences, yet no further then a dayes journey from the Towne. If hee would haue them march any further, hee is bound to pay their wages. Yearly, there is repetition made to the Councell, what priuiledges Byshop Immer Ranslein gaue to the Town, in the yeare one thousand, three hundred, fourescore, & three. They of Bienna haue as ample priuiledges as in the greater Basile.

The Common-wealth of Bienna is gouerned in manner following. All the Bourgeses are diuided into fixe companies or brother-hoods: yet in such order & carriage, as no one man whatsoever may ioyne himselfe with two or more of the companies, who haue each one two Masters, & a seruant attending. The Councell publike is chosen out of the number of these Bourgeses. The lesser councell is composed of foure and twenty: and the greater, of thirty councellers. The election is made at the yeares ending, and at the beginning of the yeare following. theyr names are openly published in the church. There is choise made of some Elecours, out of the great and lesser councell: who (in presence of the cheefe Secretarie) do confirme the ancient Councellers, or elect new, if there be any such need.

He that sitteth President in the councell generall, is called Bourgmastre, and is elected by the great and lesser councell. He is next in office to the Maire, & when they deliberate on affaires of the Common-wealth, and question is vrged concerning ciuill cases: the Maire and Officers to the Byshop depart, and leaue the Bourgmastre President. Next to him are the Treasurers, Banderets, voyers, or Surueys, the Iudges of the Consistory, the Hospitalliers, and others elected in publicke charges, by the great and lesser councell, who are not advanced to such Degrees, but as they are knowne apt and able. The Banderet onely, is chosen by all the people. He hath charge not onely of bearing the Towns banner; but also (with the Bourgmastre) is protector of Schollers, taking care that they may haue diligent and faithfull Teachers and Ouerseers, and to take their accounts. The lesser councell assembleth three times euery weeke, to wit, on Monday, Wednesday, and Saturday; but if any man doe desire to haue a cause extraordinarily decided, paying a Florin to the Maire, the councell shall be then assembled. Bienna hath no other particular Iurisdiction, but the Councell iudgeth all causes ciuill and criminal.

They of Bienna, are Lords of the Valley of Saint Immer, for so likewise is the Seigneury of Argua called; and is diuided into many Comminalties, vvhich haue (each one) their Maire or Amman elected and confirmed euery yeare, in the moneths of May and September. But they of Bienna haue not any bayliffe, for the Comminalties haue their courtes of Iustice, and when the parties cannot bee agreed, the cause is sent to the councell of the Towne, who send sometimes assistants to helpe in the countrie pleadings, and to end their suits: but appeale may be made from their sentences to the councell of the Towne. The inhabitants of this valley, do march in warre vnder the Standardes of Bienna.

CHAP. XIII.

The Common-wealthes of such people as are gouerned in common by the Cantones of Switzerland. And first of all, of stipendary Townes.

IN our former booke, we haue distributed the people gouerned in common, by the Cantons of Switzerland, into five stipendary Townes, and nine bayliwickes or Gouernements. Those Townes haue their Magistrates & Councell by themselves, to wit, a lesser Councell composed of twelue, and a great, of forty Councellers, comprehending the twelue of the lesser in the number. The cheefe of the councell is called Schultheiss, or Auyer: hee is elected at Bada, by the lesser and great councell.

At Bremgarten, the fixe first Cantons establish one of the two Auyers: who (notwithstanding) is in number of the Bourgeses, onely of whome the other is elected.

Hee of Frawenfeld, is elected by the Councell generall but in secret voyce. The Councell of these Townes doe elect Treasurers, voyers, and other Magistrates: for the Townes haue priuiledges, to provide for publicke charges, and haue likewise treasuries, and good round sums of ready gathered monies in them, for their condition and extendure, because the customes, tolles, and taxes do belong vnto them. Neuertheless, in the town of Bada, which is the passage of Germany into France, the custome belongeth to the town; but the tolle for Merchandizes transported that way, appertaineth to the Cantons. The lesser councell of these townes, provide not onely for the townes affaires, but also do decide suites: for they haue no other Courts of iustice, except at Frawenfeld, & they haue likewise both ciuill and criminall iurisdiction.

Bremgarten commandeth ouer some Villages neighboring to the town, which they call the Bayliwicke of Cella. This country is in the gouernment of the free Prouince, appertaining to the Cantons: but it was engaged sometimes to them of Bremgarten. When the Emperour Sigismund did put them of Zurich in possession of the free Prouince, he gaue them priuiledge, to disengage the country; but they of Bremgarten entreated them, that in regard of the amity, which had til then continued betweene the two townes, they would leaue the country to them, which was easily granted them. Wherefore at that time, by the liberality of them of Zurich, who gaue it: then by Letters: they of Bremgarten were put and confirmed in possession of the country, in the yeare one thousand, foure hundred, and eightene.

Neuertheless, they of Zurich referred to themselves the souerainty, & the punishment of Malefactours deserting death. The yeare one thousand, five hundred, twenty eight, a difference happened betweene them of Zurich and Bremgarten; to wit, about the causes of appeale, and to whom it belonged. The fixe Cantons ordained thereupon, that the Bayliwicke of Cella, might appeale to the councell of Bremgarten, and from them to Zurich: but as concerning suites moued at Bremgarten, the appeale was to bee brought before the eight Can-tons.

The town of Frawenfeld, beside the councell apart by it selfe, hath an assembly of twelue Iudges, who decide suites among the Bourgeses, and country people in the Villages, that are vnder the townes iurisdiction. But as for criminall causes, and variances touching inheritances, and such like things; the knowledge of them belongeth vnto the councell. These Iudges execute their arrests, in condemning of certaine fines, and making seizure on the goods of condemned persons. Appeale may be made from them, to the leauen Cantons: but there is no appeale from the councels sentence.

For the present, by permission of the councell, the Amman of the country is cheefe of those Iudges; but anciently, and about an hundred yeares since, it was to the Apparour of the town, and afterwards to the Agent or Prooost of the Empire.

VVhen any Malefactour is to be condemned to death, the Iudges make choise (as pleaseth themselves) of twelue other men of the town, or of the villages resorting thither; and then these foure and twenty men may condemne to death. Frawenfeld obtained this priuiledge of the Emperour Sigismund; and therefore they haue prisons purposely. From the time of the Austrian Princes, they hadde power to put criminall persons to death; now adayes the Cantons conserue and maintaine the rights of Frawenfeld: and although condemnation of death appertaineth to tenne Cantons, yet Frawenfeld stands excepted, which dependeth not, neither is subiect but to the leauen first Cantons, the priuiledges referred.

Moreover, this Towne hath some particular rights, touching testaments and inheritances, and the Bourgeses may exact their debtes thorough all the country of Targow (annuall reuenues excepted) according to the rights of Iustice of the Prouince, and may (without punishment) lodge such as haue bene banished by the lawes; but they cannot bee drawne into any strange iustice, but the demander must come and pleade at Frawenfeld.

some rightes at Frawenfeld, whereto the Bourgesies stand obliged, and (anciently) the most part of them wer subiects to the Abbey; but afterward, they enfranchised themselves from all charges of fernitude, and now addayes, before giuing any Oath vnto the Abbot, they receyue Letters from him, whereby hee promisseth them, not to sel, engage, nor alienate the rights which he hath at Frawenfeld, by reason of the Abbey; and besides, that hee will conferre and keepe all their ancient Priuiledges, Franchises, rights, and good customs.

Finally, in the times of war, anciently, the Seignurie of Frawenfeld elected the Capitaine, the Ambassador, the Ensigne, and other cheefe offices of warre: which all the country of Turgow followed, and tooke Oath to them. Also, the Standard of the Towne is adorned with Images of Saints, like to the Standardes of the Catholique Cantons, to wit, with a Crucifixe, and two crossed Keyes; and on the other side, is the picture of Iesus Christes face, as in a Linnen handkercher. But within some fewe yeares this of the Prouince of Turgow obtained leaue, to haue their particular Capitaines and Standard. In meane while the Towne of Frawenfeld, and the places that are of their Iurisdiction, haue their Capitaines, Ensigne-bearers, and their auncient Standardes.

Of the Baylywickes or Gouernments.

The custome obserued in most part of the Cantons for their Baylywickes.

WE haue already formerly set downe, how many Baylywickes or Gouernments the Switzers haue, to what Cantons they appertaine, and how they became Lords of them. The Cantons do send their Bayliffes turne by turne, and in the most part of the Cantons, the custome is; that the charge is giuen vnto one of the Councillers of the lesser councill. The Bayliffe continueth in his charge two yeares, and then giueth place to him that is sent by another Canton. They gouerne the Baylywickes according vnto the Lawes and customes of the people: neuerthelesse, in the Baylywickes on this side the mountaines, the Bayliffe doth not iudge alone in criminal causes; but hath (as adiunctes or assistants) the Iudges of the Prouince; in regard whereof, they do call this course of Iustice Sitt Landricht. They take knowledge of all suites of importance, and especially, those criminall, and giue sentence; Notwithstanding, the Bayliffe is soueraigne, for he sitteth President, and hath power to moderate the sentence.

The custome on this side the mountaines.

But in the Baylywickes of Italy, orbeyond the Mountaines, the bayliffes onely condemne to death: they may vuell call some learned men for councill, but those Councillers haue no power in the sentence. Finally, euery yeare about middle Iune, they render an account of their administration; they on this side the mountaines, at Bada, they beyond, at Lugano; before the Deputies, which the twelue Cantons then send thither, and then they iudge the subiects causes of Appeale. If some strange enemy make warre on the Switzers: all the Baylywickes send their people, who march vnder their particular Standardes, and euery baylywicke ioyneth with the Canton, vnder whose power it is that yeare. As in the warre of Bourgenne, they of the baylywicke of Turgow serued the Canton of Zurich. But if there happen any ciuill warre in Switzerland, because the baylywickes do stand as much obliged to one Canton, as another: they are not bound to giue succor, if the most part of the Cantons do not commaund them.

CHAP. XVI.

Of Bada.

HE Gouernement or Baylywicke of Bada, is much more magnificent then the other, because the dayes meetings and assemblies of the Cantons are held there: for the bayliffe of Bada euermore helpeth there, demanding for the causes in order, and lea-

sealeth with his Signer, such things as are written in the name of all the Councill. Moreover, if the voyces be equall vpon either side: hee maketh that auayleable, where he ranketh himselfe, and by that meanes endeth all variance. This Bayliffe hath no authorities ouer the Towne of Bada, but ouer the Countie, which is diuided into many Villages and small Iurisdiccions: where hee hath his Lieutenants and Officers, who hold their pleadings with Iudges of the Village in name of the Bayliffe; exact the Fines, and render him an account, and sometimes also himselfe is present in those Iurisdiccions. But when there is question of condemning a Malefactor vnto death, foure and twenty Iudges of the whole Countie of Bada, meete together, and the Bayliffe cleketh them: but the custome is, that after they haue bene once thus elected, they continue all their life time afterward in that charge, if some lawfull impeachment doe not preuent it: and when any one of them dyeth, or is dismissed, then the Bayliffe putteth another in his place. These Iudges giue sentence according to the Lawes: neuerthelesse, the Bayliffe (who hath the foueraignty in his hand) may mitigate their sentence. Next to this estate of the Bayliffe, is hee that is called Secretary of all the Prouince: for, beside the dignity, hee hath profite, because all the Cantons serue him, so long as the dayes are kept. Moreover and beside, hee hath a Lieutenant, who is cheefe of all the Officers belonging to the Bayliffe.

Two great Fayres yearly at Zurzach.

Many do hold opinion, that this village is the place, which Polomy calleth Forum Tiberij; and that on this occasion, these Fayres are very ancient, as hauing bene ordained by Tiberius. It seemeth to haue taken this name of M. Iunius Brutus, a famous Roman Souldier, cured in that place, as is testified by an ancient inscription. The Iurisdiction of this village is one of the dependances of Clingenow: the Bayliffe cleketh an officer yearly, in the Moneth of Ianuarie, and eyght Senatours, foure whereof, ate in seruice a whole yeare, and they are called sworne Senatours; and then the other foure doe succcede them, hauing foure Iudges giuen them as assistants. These twelue, with the Bayliffe of Clingenow, who presideth, iudge the causes, and meete once in xv. dayes; but if any man requirith (in the meane time) that the Iudges should meet together, they doe; the party paying thirtene Shillings of the Money of Lucerne.

Moreover, the Bayliffe to the byshop of Constance, cannot condemn any greater fine, then the summe of tenne pounds; but if the crime appeare to deserue more rigorous chastisements, to witte, corporally; then the Officer to the Bayliffe of Bada, executeth the sentence, and punisheth the faultie. But out of the Fayre times, Malefactors are examined, first, at Clingenow; after they haue confest their fault, and are convicted of capital crime, they are deliuered into the handes of the Bayliffe of Bada. At the times of the Fayres, to witte, the first day of September, and the first Holyday of the Weeke, after Pentecost, the day before the Faire, all the Iurisdiction of the Byshoppe ceaseth, and belongeth vnto the bayliffe of Bada, who hath sole power and authority of commanding and forbidding, euen vntil the end of the Faire. For in regard that a great number of people doe assemble there, our Auncelors were desirous, that these Fayres might be in the safeguard and

In former times, the Princes of Austria, were Lords of the Countie of Bada; but now it belongeth to the eyght first Cantons. As for the government of Zurzach, it is managed by sixteene councillors, to wit, the twelue before mentioned, and foure assistants. But if there be any businesse of importance, it is referred to the councill generall.

CHAP. XVII.

Of Turgow.

Mong all the Bayliwickes of the Cantons, there is not any more plentifully peopled nor of larger extendure then Turgow, which hath more then fifty Parishes. The seven most ancient Cantons send thither a Bayliffe; & to them appertaineth the Seignoury & ciuill Iurisdiction of the countrey. If Switzerland be assaulted by a stranger enemy, they of Turgow ranke themselves with the seven Cantons: but the knowledge of criminall causes, and such as are capital, belong to the tenne Cantons.

The Abbey of Aug.

Beside, there are many Noblemen, & Ecclesiasticall persons, that haue meane courts of Iustice in diuers villages of Turgow, yet in such sort notwithstanding, that all the villages are subiects to the Bayliffe of the whole countrey. The inferior Seigneurs may condemne fines of twentie shillings, and sometimes so farre as tenne poundes: but the moiety of the fines be- longeth to the Bayliffe, according to the ordinances well vnderstoode, and established among them.

All they that haue Iurisdiccions, are called Erchtsheren. The Ecclesiasticall, are the byshop of Constance, who hath his Prouosts in Turgow to witte, at Arbonna, Tanneg, Guttingen, and Gothliebe. The Chapter of Constance hath Iurisdiction within Altnaw. The Abbey of Ange the rich, nowe vnited and incorporated with the Byshoppricke of Constance, hath great reuenewes, and many Iurisdiccions in the countrey of Turgow, to wit, Stekbure, Bernange, Mannebach, Ermaringen, Tribeltingen, &c. Many Gentlemen are vassalles to this Abbey. The Abbot of the Hermitage, is also Lord of Eschemetz. In like manner, the Abbey of S. Gall, hath Iurisdiction in some Villages: as also the Abbeyes founded in the countrey of Turgow haue, as Tobel, the Comanderie of the Knights of Saint John, Fischinge, the Abbey of Benedictines, Ittinge, Chartroufe, Munsterlinge and Tennikon. The Abbey of the Monkes of the Cisteaux order. Also Veldbach, Calchere, Saint Katharine du Val, nere to Dissenhow, and some other Prouosts in one or two Villages, and sometimes in many, haue Iurisdiction.

There are great store of Castles, appertaining vnto diuers Gentlemen, who dwell there, and enioy their ancient Iurisdiccions: the names of which Castles I will recite, together with the Lords vnto whom they belong. The Lords of Plum dwell for the present time at Wellenberg and Griefenberg. Herder and Burgelle are to the Lords of Landberg. Wengie belongeth to the Lords of Giel. Spiegelberg, to the Lords of Montprat. Vinsfeld vnto the Lords of Schelsenberg, and of Gemminge. Vpon the limites of the countrey, there is a Towne belonging to the Count of Oberstein. Ruuenbourg and Mammer appertaine to the Lords of Tum. Salenstien and Blider, to the Lords of Hannule. Clingenberg, to the Lordes of Herdeheimer. Ottelshouse, to the Lords of Schenck. Epishouse, to the Lords of Hagenuille. Liebenfels, to the Lords of Lanz. Clinge, to the Lords of Brum. Neufere, to the Lords of Stecker. Sonnenberg, to the Lords of Gutenfou. There are many castles also ruined the most part of whose Iurisdiccions, doe belong vnto Ecclesiasticall persons: but other some of them belong vnto Gentlemen dwelling in other castles, and also vnto some particular men of the Countrey.

Beside, the Abbey of Rinow hath iustice both ciuill and criminall in the townie of Rinow, which appeareth to be very ancient, although it hath no store of beautifull buildings. Some are of opinion, that the Romaines planted theyr campe there heeretofore, to encounter with the Germanes.

The ancient townie of Arbonna on the Lake of Constance.

In the Isle which is not within the Rheine, the Abbey of the Benedictines is to be scene, one of the most ancient in all Switzerland. The Abbot is Lord of the Towne; neuerthelesse, if any Malefactor be condemned to death: he is deliuered vnto the Prouost or Amman of the Prouince, and his goods remaine seized and confiscated to the seven Cantons. They of Rinow haue their standard, vnder which they march in Warre for the Switzers. Moreover, there are some Towns in Turgow, which continue in the Switzers protection, and haue their Franchises & priuiledges verie ample, & Iurisdiction particular.

There is another Towne, named Bischoffzell, at the meeting of two Riuer, called Sutera and Tur, which is well into the countrey of Turgow: and it hath his Standard, where vnder the fouldiers goe to Warre for the Switzers. But the Governour of the countrey is only but to bee scene there, and can command nothing of the inhabitants, who are subiect (in some things) vnto the Byshoppe of Constance, yet hee gouerneth according to their ordinances.

The Byshop hath a Bayliffe in the Castle of the Towne, to whom appertaineth the moiety of the Fines: but the Townsmen doe elect the Councell, and the two Presidents out of them, whom they call ancient Senatours, that gouerne the Common-wealth with the Councillers. One of the two, iudgeth in criminall causes, and there is no appeale from the sentence of the Senate: neither is it lawfull to draw a Bourgesse before any other Iustice then that of the Towne. The Impost of Wine, and other Reuenewes belong to the common-wealth. When the Byshoppe taketh his Oathe of the Townsmen, hee promisseth first himselfe, neuer to diminish in any manner whatsoever, their ancient Priuiledges and Franchises.

Arbonna is an ancient Towne, on the Lake of Constance, whereof Antoninus maketh mention in his guide of the waies. It is vnder the dominion of the Byshop of Constance, who hath there a Bayliffe: but they of the Towne doe elect theyr Amman and Councell, who manage ciuill causes. The Switzers haue some Seignouriall rights in that place: for the castle is open to them in the times of warre, for best accomodating themselves; and the Inhabitants are theyr Souldiers for seruice.

Dissenhow, a Towne vpon the Rheine, betwene Stein and Schaffouse, as also of the countrey of Turgow, and besides the seven Cantons, who are Lordes of this countrey: Berne and Schaffouse haue some right in the domination of Dissenhow. Neuerthelesse, the Townsmen giue Oath onely to eight Cantons, and haue great store of priuiledges: their councel and Auger haue the Iurisdiction of some Townes about it. But all are esteemed to bee vnder the government of Turgow, and goe to warre with the other for the Switzers: but yet vnder the Standard of Dissenhow.

But besides the Iurisdiccions of the Ecclesiasticall, and of the Gentlemen: there are many Villages, whereof the Cantons are entirely Lords, and they are called the Iurisdiccions of the countrey of Turgow, and the Officers of the Bayliffe, doe holde the pleadings in these Villages. Heeretofore there were diuers formes of pleere, and manie customes: but the seven Cantons (by aduice and consent of the Lords of the Iurisdiccions) ordained and established a common manner of pleading, thoroughout the whole countrey of Turgow. Beside, if a particular man haue a suite against the Lord of a Iurisdiction, he presents it to the Bayliffe or Governour of the countrey, and of him demandeth iustice.

There are two kindes of Law and Iustice (in the highest degree) in Turgow: for they must pleade before the Iusticiary bench of the Prouince, or else before the Bayliffe and his assistants. The Law or Iustice Prouinciall, it appertaineth not onely vnto the seven Cantons, who establish a Governour in the countrey: but likewise they of Berne, Fribourg, and Solenne, haue therein their part, whereof wee haue giuen a reason in our former booke.

Sometimes this court of Iustice was held at Winterduer, when as the countrey of Kybourg was ioyned to the countrey of Turgow; afterward, it was helde nere to Constance, when the Emp. Sigmound had engaged Winterduer to the Bourgessees of Constance; & sometimes in other places: but it is fully resolved on at Frawenfeld, and the Cantons have concluded, that it shal neuer bee transported any whether else hereafter.

Twelue Iudges are chosen by the Bayliffe, foure of Frawenfeld, and four of Turgow: the Bayliffe sits President in name of ten Cantons; or the Amman of the country, established by the Cantons; or the Lieutenantwhom the Bayliffe substituteth in his place. The causes of appeale, concerning the whole countrey of Turgow, are decided in this Prouinciall Court of Iustice, together with the suits in matters of debt, the knowledge whereof may appertain to this court: also the causes of injuries, crimes, and other offences deferring death. The Bayliffe and his assistants (who most often are the Amman of the country, the Secretary, and the cheefe Vsher) doe censure also in the same suites: & it is at the discretion of the plaintiffe or demander, to make choise before which of the two courts he will pleade.

The Bayliffe causeth the sentences and ordinances to bee executed, with imposition of a fine of ten poundes, payable by him, that satisfieth not the sentence in ten dayes. The Prouinciall court of iustice, imposeth no fine of money, but banisheth: onely refused, that it condemneth him in a fine that pleadeth his owne cause in person (because the custom is, to take one of the Iudges to declare the fact) and enters it into the Court where the Iudges vse to sit. He that is accused to contemne the ordinances of the Bayliffe, is imprisoned.

A man may appeale to the Cantons, from the sentence given in either of the Courtes; and, according to the importance of the cause to the seuen Cantons, or to the ten in taking knowledge. Likewise al Fines (as the goods of persons put to death, confiscations, and fines imposed on such as are accessaries to crimes deferring death) doe appertaine partly to the seauen, partly to the ten Cantons. Heere may be alleged (for example sake) mighty and horrid injuries, yet not meriting death: violence done by any man to him that is strictly commanded to lue in peace with his aduersary, outrageous acts committed to a man vpon the publique high way, by wounding, robbing, or offering him any such like violence. Also, if any man vsurpe, encroach vpon, enclose, or appropriate to himselfe any part of the high-way, transpose or alter boundes, markes, and limits; or change any goods layed to him by way of pawning, or giuen him in trust to keepe; if he violate Fayth, or forswear himselfe openly; or if he carry himselfe insolently toward the Bayliffe or Iudges, &c.

Besides, all such as the Prouinciall court of Iustice declareth guilty of death: are sent vnto the other Iudges with their causes, to haue the sentence pronounced on them. These Iudges are in number foure and twenty, and heretofore the custom was, that the Bayliffe ioynd twelue Iudges, to the twelue of the Prouinciall Iustice, and chose them thoroughout the countrey, at his owne discretion: but now adayes (and oftner then any other) the Iudges of Frawenfeld doe pronounce the sentence of death. This is to cut off charges, which would be farre greater with-out comparison, if the Iudges should be called from diuers parts of the country, it being of so large extendure.

There is no appeale granted from this sentence: neuertheless it is permitted to the Bayliffe, to moderate the Iudges sentence, or to alter the manner of the punishment vpon the Offender; or else to saue the condemned mans life; but hee may not (by any meanes) aggravate, or make heauyer the condemnation.

CHAP. XVII.

Of Sargans.

THE Country of Sargans, hath heretofore had Countes or Earles, that gaue it the name, and sold it vnto the Switzers Countrey. Those Countes were of the house of Werdenberg, by reason of the Counties thereunto belonging, and also of Monforte, being then diuided into many families: but the countrey standeth separated by a certain small Riuer, named Sar. Part of it, about the Riuer, hath some villages; the cheefest whereof whereof is called Regauz, where the law pleas are held: as also the Abbey of Pfeuertz, the Abbot whereof hath iurisdiction in those quarters. It seemes that this part was heretofore diuided from the other, so as the name of Sargans belonged to them that dwelt beneath the Riuer, and whereof (vndoubtedly) they borrowe their name. For there is another Sargans, or of Sarunets, whereof Pliny maketh mention, which at this day is called Engadin, and neere the fource or spring of Rheine: but they which dwell about the Riuer, may bee of the quarter of the Rheguses and Rhucans, at this day termed Rhinthall and Rhuchenberg. They haue their court of iustice by themselves, and other weights and measures, then they beneath the Riuer.

The towne of Sargans is small, and hath a Castle, wherein the Bayliffe dwelleth, and it is the cheefest of all the Bayliwicke. There is a councill at Sargans, and an Auoyer, whom the Switzers (beeing Lords there) doe establish: as also in another Towne of the same Bayliwicke, named Walhenitat, on the Lake of Riue. But the lower court of iustice belongeth to them of Sargans, as likewise the principall Villages haue their Court. The last or latest appellations, for causes criminall and capital, are held at Sargans; where Iudges are chosen, both of the Towne, and from the whole Bayliwicke. Oftentimes, in stead of the Bayliffe, the Amman is President of the country. The Bayliffe himselfe pleadeth against the offender, and hath a Secretary and an Officer. If criminall persons are prisoners at Walhenitat; then iudgement and execution to death is done there: but the Bayliffe sitteth President, and not the Auoyer of Walhenitat.

CHAP. XIX.

Of Rhinthall.

THE Bayliffe of this Valley (which taketh his name of Rheine, and is vpon the left bancke thereof, about his entrance into the Lake of Constance) maketh his abiding in a small Towne, called Rhinek, somewhat below the Valley.

The whole Bayliwicke is diuided into certaine portions or free-farmes, which they tearme Hof; and these are their names: Alstet, a little Towne, Marpach, Bernnenge, Taall, whereon Rhinek dependeth, and Oberriede. Each hath his iurisdiction by it selfe, and two *Amman*s; whereof the one is entailed by the Bayliffe of the cantons, and the other by the Abbot of S. Gall. The moiety of the fines belongeth to the Abbot, and the other part to the Cantons. Neuertheless, at Alstet the fines are diuided into three parts, whereof the third appertaineth to the inhabitants. Some say, that the higher and lower iurisdiction of this place, belongeth to the Prince of Austria. The lower court of iustice of Lustenow (which is a Village in the Bayliwicke of Rhinthall) appertaineth to the Counts of Amisa. The acknowledgment of criminall causes, belongeth to the cantons: and their Bayliffe causeth the sentences to bee executed in those places where the delicts were committed, hauing *Amman*s for their Iudges.

The inhabitants of this Valley doe principally employ themselves in husbandry about their Vines, and spinning linnen yarne, which they sell at S. Gall, & lue very commodiously by these meanes. Also they of S. Gall haue store of lands, and many vineyards in this Valley, with plenty of Vine-dressers and Barne-keepers: in regard whereof, they set a taxation on the wine with the inhabitants of Rhinthall, and set downe a price to be payed by the Masters and others, who buy it before vintage time at publique sale, and pay the money to the Vine-dressers. This tax bindeth not them who haue not solde their wine before that time. When the vintage draweth neere, the Deputies of each Village doe meete at S. Gall, and the Seigneury appointeth one or two of the councill to fit with them; and then they (altogether) set a price vpon the wines, if they cannot agree, but that there are as many on the one side, as on the other: then the Village, whose turne it is to bee Arbitrator, sets downe the determination. For every Village (in his rancke and place) hath the right and priuiledge of arbitration, when as the taxers cannot, or will not agree together. The price agreed vpon, then they begin to cut and gather grapes for the vintage: but it is not lawfull

CHAP. XX.

Of the Barons of Altax.

BEtwene the Bayliwicke of Rhinthal, and the county of Werdenberg, you may see the Seignoury belonging to the Barons of Altax. Now, although the Barons are fouraigne Lords; yet notwithstanding, in regard of the situation of Rhinthal, I was not willing to passe any further, without making some mention thereof.

The race of the Lords of Altax is most ancient, and heeth hath written concerning lustes and Tournaments, declareth, that the Emperour Henry, surnamed the Faulconer or Fowler, made choise among all the Gentlemen of Swabia, of Frederick, Baron of Altax, to prescribe to others, the order to be observed in those Royall pastimes. They of Misauk in the Grifons country (whom Pliny calleth Hirfaxes, at the Trophee of Augustus) were sometimes subjects to the Barons of Monfax: to whom the Emperour Sigismund gaue the name and dignity of Counts, and Wolffe, Baron of Monfax was in the warre against the Obotrites, in the yeare nine hundred, thirty five. Some say, that those Counts descended of the house of Altax, and that there are many Gentlemen (of very ancient race) in the country of the Grifons, descended of the first Rhatians, who were of Tuscanie, and vaunt themselves also to be issued of the Romanes.

In Antiquity, the Lords of Altax dwelt in the Grifons country. For neere to the Valley of Leng, where they inhabit, who (among all other) vaunt and glorifie themselves, to bee of most noble and ancient race; theris the Village of Oberfax, which retaineth yet the name of that Family, and it hath a Cattle of the same name. I am of the minde then, that the house of Altax is Grifon by original, and descended (with many other of the Grifons) of the Tuscanes, who were before the Romanes. Also the country, whereof they are Lords to this day, was heretofore reputed to be of the Grifons: considering, that Strabo extendeth the Grifons limits, so farre as the Lake of Centance.

This Baronny hath had heretofore two strong Castles, to wit, Sax (which was burnt before the warre of Appenzell) and Fortegg, builded afterward, vpon the warranty of Virich of Altax, Abbot of S. Gall, at such time as the Barons were in warre against the Counts of Monfort. There are many Villages in this Valley, subiect to the Barons of Altax. If any warre threaten Switzerland, they chule their most valiant Soldiours, which they send to their succour. Also Huldrich, Father to Huldrich Phillip, now Baron of Altax, fought valiantly for the Switzers, in the warre which they had against the Emperour Maximilian, and the league of Swabia: and as a recompence and acknowledgement of his valor, the Cantons gaue him diuers peeces of Artillery.

It is a long time since the Barons of Altax haue beene Bourgeses of Zurich, the rest of the Cantons neuer had any dominion ouer the Barons of Altax: but themselves were soueraigne Lords, and no man might appeale fro their sentence, to any other iustice. At this day, there is no more of this race of the Barons of Altax left, but one, namely, the Lord Huldrich Phillip: but by the grace of God, it is now augmented, because this lord hath had (by two wiues) five sonnes, already of good stature, and which promise faire hope, namely, Albert Iohn, Tinbault Iohn, Phillip Iohn, Iohn Christopher, and Iohn Huldrich.

of as great and large extendure, as Lugarno. I will set downe in this Chapter, an exact description of the Bayliwicke and Towne of Locarno, made (at my request) by M. Thaddens Dun, Physitian, and a native of Locarno, my very good friend. For thereby may be knowne, what the gouernment of the other Bayliwicks is, which although they are not of the like extendure, neither haue the same policy, yet notwithstanding, they are gouerned in the same manner, in respect of the Bayliffe, and dominion of the Switzers.

The Towne of Locarno, is called Lugari by the Germanes, and Locarno by the Italians. Some do hold it to be so named, as being a place of flesh: because in all the country round about, there is no meane number of cattell. It is seated on a plaine, betweene the foote of an high Mountain, and the Banck of the Lake Maioir. Towards the East it hath the head and beginning of this Lake: to the South, the neck of the Lake, and the high Mountaines. It extendeth and shooteth it selfe out along the middle of the Lake, to his fall, and towards the North are also very high Mountaines. To the West, and against the lands belonging to the Bayliwicke of Bellinzona, is a plaine of great length, yeelding yearly a plentifull Hay-haruest, & thwart it passeth Thefina. Neere to the Towne, betweene this plaine, the Towne it selfe, the foote of the Mountaine, and the Lake banks, is a fruitfull parcell of Land for Corne and Wine, and a great goodly field, abounding with grasse; which heretofore hath beene much more spacious, but the neighbouring Riuer (by vndermining it) hath borne away a great part thereof. The Mountaines of long extendure, are very aptly husbanded, hauing goodly and faire vineyards in them.

Heereby we may coniecture, that Locarno is great, by reason of the Families therein, to the number of foure hundred, or thereabout: and there is not any greater Towne about the Lake Maioir, neyther are there more Gentlemen in any town of that quarter, by which reason, it is the cheefe and principall Towne. This description doth demonstrate, how pleasant the place is, the ayre also is thire temperate, sweete, and healthfull, euen as much as can be desired. The windes of the South do blowe there very little, and euen as tired, broken, and spent, by reason of the Mountaines defending before it. The North winde is there also sweet enough, because the high Mountaines doe couer the Towne. From the East to the West, the windes breathe at their ease: and there is not a Pond, or Marshy plot in this quarter, so thar to say all in a word, the place is sufficiently pleasing.

Heretofore, the town of Locarno had a great & strong castle, of very goodly shew, in regard of the many Towers & Turrets, and well engirt with sightly Ditches. It was sometimes the principall dwelling of the Counts of Rasques, and the French were Masters there, the space of thirteene yeares, but yet could not expell the Counts. There is a Pallace within the saide Castle, which is the Bayliffes house: there also abideth the Trucheman or Interpreter, and the two Switzer Archers of his Guard, of whom wee shall make more ample mention hereafter: within the walles enclosure of this Castle, therewas a goodly Hauen or Port, where the Ships for warre were kept.

The Castle was square and quadrangular, beautified with Towers at each corner, and had a very strong wall about it. At that time, the Lake Maioir washed the foote of the Castle, so that the Ships were easily sent forth vpon the Lake. But now, the Riuer of Madia hath gathered such a boundance of sand and grauell, as the place is become farre enough off from the Lake. Since the yeare one thousand, five hundred, thirty one, the Switzers wholly ruined the Castle, except the Pallace; the foundations are yet to be seene, and the walles of many houses, for there was not any castle so strong in all the country. Also it was munited with Artillery of all sorts, and other furnishings for warre, in great plenty. Frances Guicchiardine maketh mention in the first Booke of his Histories, that fiftene thousand Switzers got themselves together, to go and assault this castle; thereof he speaketh againe in the eleventh Booke, and at the end of the twelfth.

Long since, in the times of the Dukes of Milaine, the whole country was commanded by the Bayliffe of Locarno (except the town of Brisag) and it was a county, wherof the Rasques were Lords, they being Gentlemen of marke in the town.

towne of Coma, whereof also they were Masters sometimes, but after they surrendered it to the Duke of Millaine, in the yeare one thousand, foure hundred and sixteene. But afterward, this county was diuided in two parts, and the Vale Madia separated from the Bayliwicke of Locarna.

At that time also, the Vale of Perzafche and Gambaron (whereof shall be spoken hereafter) obtained leaue, to elect their Podestats. The extendure of the Bayliwicke of Locarna, may bee knowne by the Parishes, whereof there are twenty and more.

The foote-ground of the Mountains of Locarna, and a great part of the Territory, yeeldeth plenty of very good wines. In the Hilles and Mountaines, the Vines are bound high, and store of good grasse groweth vnder them. On the plaines they shoote vp about Elmes and other Trees, as Hops do about Poles; also the twigs as being wouen together, and bound at the ends, are extended from one Tree to another. But if they stand too farre off, where the branches come too short, then they fixe poles in the midst, where they fasten the branches, for feare lest they should hinder the Cornes encrease, or the other sorts of pulse, which are also there sowne. The Vines are of great and incredible yeelding, the grapes huge, and very ripe, which causeth an extraordinary plenty of wine.

The fields cannot be very spacious, in regard of the so neere neighbouring Lake and Mountaines: yet notwithstanding, they are very fertile, by reason of the grounds goodnesse, which the husbandmen do fatten and labour very diligently. For because there are no great store of fields and meadows, and the towne is sufficiently peopled; their paines are performed at the better leylines. Many times they render twenty graines for one, and they haue two Harueils in one yeare. In the Month of Iune, they reape and gather Wheat and Rie: In the Month of October, they haue the like of Miller, Pannicke, and other Pulses sowed in Spring time.

The Mountaines and Vallies are furnished with cattell in great abundance, especially Goates. Also there is plenty of Partridges, Pheazants, Larks, Hares, Co-

nies, Butter, Cheefe, and admirable store of Chestnuts, for the nourishment of country people. At the beginning, they eate them rawe, then dried, and afterward boyled, roasted, and fried. Also they make Meale of them for Bread, and that Meale serueth the to diuers vies: but Gentlemen eate chestnuts among their other delicates.

When therefore there is a good season of chestnuts, the dearth of other victuals is not great in that country: where also is store of good Figs, variety of Apples, Peaches, Peares, Cherries, and other dainty fruites, as Plums of diuers kinds, Pomgranets, Citrons, Oliues, Oranges, and other fruites in great plenty. The Lake aboundeth with Fish, dainty and good; especially Trowts, whereof store are brought & sold in Millaine. In briefe, the country is enriched with all good things, for the maintenance of life; yet sometimes there is scarcity of Corne, by reason of the countries narrowness, and Salt is brought thether from other places.

Euery Thursday there is a great Market at Locarna, where meete no meane store of people. You shall see many boats arrive there, from all the Townes of the Lake Major, from whence come diuers Merchants, rather to buy, then sell. They come thether also from sundry parts of the Dutchy of Millaine, from Lugano and Bellinona, neighbouring Bayliwicks: as also from Milank, and the Valley of Linnor, not speaking of them about Locarna, and the vale Madia. It is one of the goodliest Markets in all those countries. There is a very spacious place neere to the Lake, where the Merchants set vp Tents, to defend them from raine, and such like accidents.

The people of Locarna are diuided into three degrees to wit, Noblemen, ancient citizens, whom they call Bourgeses, and the inhabitants, descended from diuers parts, and whose ancestors began to dwell at Locarna, more then an hundred yeares before.

There is a fourth race noble, as of the Aurells, Muralter, Magorians, and Duns. That of the Duns is the most ancient, and before the other: their houses and goods beeing partly at Locarna, partly at Scome, which is a Towne neere neere to Locarna, but not so wel peopled, seated on a plaine neere to the Lake. At such time as the Counts of Rusque commanded, the Duns were fauoured and honoured, more then the other Nobles, and aduanced to great estates. And the Arms of the Counts of Rusque, magnificently illustrated, are yet to bee seene (outwardly) on the Duns Pallace at Locarna. Next, vnder name of the people, are reckoned all them that dwell in the Vallies and Villages, dependants on Locarna. The whole body of the Seignoury or Bayliwicke, is called the Comminality.

As for the Bayliffe, whom they call Commissary, hee is chosen by the twelue Cantons, and sent to Locarna euery yeare, by one of the said cantons; as it is then in rance, according to their lawes and alliances. This commissary is Soueraigne, and hath full power to chastise the faulty, yea, to condemne to death; if the case do lo require. His custome is to take wife & vnderstanding men, expert in the lawes and manners of the country, to bee his counsellors. Hee is not receiued into his charge, till he haue first solemnly sworn and promised, to keepe the lawes and ordinances, which the inhabitants reate municipal rights. Which being done, the people there present, do acknowledge him for their lawfull Governour; with solenne and publike acclamations, & swearing faithfully to obey him.

Now, because the commissary speaketh the Switzers language, and the people Italian; the Lords of the Leagues do allow him a Truchman, who vnderstandeth and speaketh both the languages, to whom they pay wages. By entremise of the Trucheman, the commissary the parties that plead as Attornies or Aduocates, do vnderstand each other, and so debate the causes: which the Secretary or Prognatory writeth downe in Latine. The commissary medleth not with the affaires of the common-wealth, because the people haue full power to elect Magistrates and Officers, to ordaine of all things concerning the publike estate.

Moreover, they elect an ordinary Attorney, who pursueth criminall causes, & keepeth the fines adiudged to the common purse, which they call, The fines Chambers. The Lords of the leagues giue order for the election of this Attorney; who is one of the Bourgeses of Locarna, and continueth as long time in that Office, as please the said Lords.

They establish also the Receiuers of the taxes. For euery yeare, in Summer, when the twelue Ambassadors of the Cantons come thether: they giue the farming of the taxe (mitigating a certain summe) to one, or to many Bourgeses, who then also receiue ample power, to exact the taxe, and at the yeares end they pay it.

The Commissary chuseth (oftentimes) a Switzer Officer, who walketh daily attending on him, with an Halbert and a Sword. He is the cheefest of the Sericants, that arresteth men, and guardeth offenders. When the Ambassadors come to Locarna, hee is their Vther: also, they pay him his wages, as well as the Truchman.

The same Commissary electeth his Lieutenant; some one of the Bourgeses, fitt to decide suites and criminall causes. This Lieutenant giues attendance in the Commissaries absence; or when hee is withheld by sicknesse, or any other hinderance: hauing in those causes, the same power and authority, as the Commissary hath.

Moreover, the counsell (of whom we shall speake presently) makes choise of some Sericants among the people. Their charge is to serue the Common-wealth, and to execute the commands of the Commissary.

The Bourgeses and inhabitants that are of this Country and Comminality, do meete together according to their custome, which yearly is the first day of Ianuary, and then they elect the one and twenty counsellors of the Common-wealth. Twelue among them are of Locarna; three of the towne of Scome, which is neere: the other fixe are of the Vallies and Villages round about. As concerning the twelue of Locarna: fixe of them are Noblemen, foure Bourgeses, & two inhabitants; yet sometimes three, and fixe Nobles. The three of Scome, there is one of the family of Gentlemen, called Duns, and the two other are of the body of the people. The other fixe, whom I haue said to be of Villages and Vallies, are of such places, as acknowledge no other Gouernour, but the fore-mentioned Commissary.

itary. This I speake in regard of the towne of Brissag, the Valley of Verzasche, & Gambaron: which haue their Podestats or Lieutenants, and some rights apart by themselves, as we shall shew anon, and they do not elect any councillors.

The councill of the Bayliwicke of Locarna, hath charge to watch and waite on the affaires of the common-wealth: to conclude on needfull expences & wages; to dispose and set in order, whatsoever seemeth for the good of the weale publike fit and conuenient.

Seuen Procurators or Attornies are added to the one and twenty councillors; who giue order, that the decrees of the council may be effectually executed, and that euery man do his duty thoroughly & faithfully. They stand also in stead of Voyers or Surveyors: because they take charge of publike buildings. In like manner, there is a Secretary whom they call Chancellor; and he setteth downe in writing, all things whatsoever that are concluded on by the councill.

And forasmuch as the Commonalty lockes not vp any of the publike monies, there is yearly a new Treasurer elected, who exacteth and collecteth of consuls and communities, such summes of money as are imposed by the councill. For euery community or parish hath his Consull (so called, because they councill and aduise that which is necessary for the communities welfare) and is in Office as a Receiver. They leuie vpon euery Father of the Family, or on each house, the money whereat they are assessed by the council, and afterward bring all to the Treasurer. The manner of assessing these summes, is according to the estimation of goods, & the number of households in euery community.

There is not any Parish nor Family (how little soeuer it bee) but iustly knoweth, how much it is valued at in the assessment. One of their cottisations amounteth to an hundred pounds of the Empire: which make seuen and twenty Florins of gold, or thereabout. The Consuls do first collect this summe of the Families, and then deliuer it into the Treasurers hands, and he afterward paies it to the Seigneurs of the annuall accounts. Then it is payed out in wages, to the Bayliffe, to the Physicians, to Masters of Schooles, Officers, and other persons, who are al at wages of the common-wealth: And besides, it acquitteth all other publike charges. The yeare being expired, hee receiveth vp his account to the councill, or to the Procurators. If there be more omitted then receiued; his successour disburseth it himselfe. Contrariwise, if hee receiue doe surmount the ordinary charge, the remainder is deliuered ouer vnto his successour. Moreover, the fore-named Magistrates make choise of two sufficient men, to haue a care of food and provision. And other two are elected by the councill, to see the wayes and streetes duely and decently repaired and well kept.

Now in regard that the country is environed with Mountaines and Vallies, repleated with woods of extraordinary tall trees, exquisite for their beauty and braue branching (among others the Pine, which produceth very excellent Agaricke, and the Firre-tree, notable for building, and whereof they of Locarna make very great benefit) the Merchant, dealing in wood, do elect a Iudge or Master of the Forests, who decideth all differences proceeding in such cases. When the taule trees are cut, they bring knowledge thereof to him, and then he ordereth their lesser cutting, for more commodious conuaying them through the narrow passages and vallies, as also the Rocky crooked windings, to the Lake Maier. When they are there shipt in apt Barques and Boats, they passe along the Lake, and then on the Thecina to Millaine and Pania, in great Trunkes; Beames, loists, and long Planks; together with great quantities of wood-coales, and other bruch-wood, for heating Ovens. Afterward, they descend with them from Pania, by the River Po (wherein Thecina dischargeth itselfe) so farre as Cremona, and Placentia, and may goe also to Ferrara, Manua, Venice, and to the Adriaticke Sea. The trunks of the trees haue their length and thickenesse iust, and the Merchants mark on them. The valley of Verzasche, the vale Madia, and other neighbouring places, doe also send away Trees very abundantly, when the Rivers swell higher then their vsuall wont.

The towne of Brissag, which is vpon the Lake Maier towards the North, and at the end of the country which the Switzers hold, is of the Bayliwicke of Locarna, and

It hath also to the East, the Vallie of Verzasche, taking his name of a Riuer so called, and thence descending: Also Gambaron to the South, and on the Lake Maier. These places haue their Podestats, who iudge in ciuill causes: for as concerning them criminall, the knowledge of them appertaineth to the Commisary of Locarna. There is appeale granted from the sentence in ciuill causes, if it seeme good to the party condemned. They of the Valley of Verzasche, and of Gambaron, do chuse (among themselves) such persons as they please, to be their Podestats: but the people of Brissag haue not that authority, but yearly doe elect a Lieutenant, who is of the Family of the Aurelles. Gentlemen of Locarna. The Inhabitants of this place are not cottised or taxed, as the other Communities be: but onely pay their part of rentage due, to the Lords of the leagues, and of wages to the Commisary. Beside, they furnish towards the charges that are in their Villages and Communities.

Of this Towne of Locarna thus described, are defended the Locarnians dwelling at Zurich, and in other places. It is not about thirty yeares since, that some Citizens of Locarna, yet liuing, affected to the new Religion, tooke knowledge thereof, by the reading of certain books, and afterward enstrusted it to many of their Townsmen. From the yeare one thousand, five hundred, forty two, vntill the yeare one thousand, five hundred, fifty foure, the zeale and number of them began to encrease, and notwithstanding the persecutions, embraced it the more earnestly. The most part of the Seigneurs and people, not willing to suffer it, expelled (in the yeare following) about thirty Families: namely all such as would not forsake that new opinion, and returne againe to the Romane Church. There were people of all kinds in this troope, Nobles, Gentles, and Yeomen; learned and vnlearned; rich and poore; great and small; husbands without their wiues, and wiues without their husbands; fathers without their children, & children without their fathers. The men of Zurich receiued them very louingly, and did, and yet do many kinde courtesies to them: so that diuers of the are embraced as Bourgeses, and the rest maintained at the expences of the Seigneury. At the beginning, they receiued a good sum of monie, sent by them of Berne, and another collected at Basile, and in some other Townes of Sauoye, where-with the poore people haue bene long time maintained.

CHAP. I.

Of the Kingdome and Court of Spaine; the Lawes, Customes, and manners of the people, as also the division and situation of the Country.

S Spaine, so tearmed of * Hispalis, or of * Hesperia, or Hesperus, by being a part of Ewrope, and neereft to the VVest; hath her Confines in this manner. On the East, the Mediterranean Sea: On the VVest, the Ocean: On the South, the streights of Gibraltar: And on the North, the Pyrenean Mountains, which make division of France & Spaine. The principall Riuer in this Prouince, are fixe in number: Myuo, Duria, Trais, Guadiana, Guadalquivir, and Iberus. This Kingdome (by our Auncients) was diuided into three parts, to wit, Batica, Lusitania, and Tarraconia. At this day, Batica containeth three Regions, namely, Granata, with her City Royall, which is called Granada; Andalusia, with the City of Siuitil; and Etihamadura, with the City of Menda. Lusitania hath two Regions, to wit, Portugall, with the City Royall, named Lisborne; and Galicia, with the city that is called Compostella, where the body of S. Iames is saide to be. Tarraconia hath nine Regions; as Arragon, with the city of * Saragossa; Nauarre, with the city of Pampalona; Cathalonia, with the city of Barcellona; Biscay, with the city of Vilacro; * Castile the elder, with the city of Burges or Braga; Castile the newer, with the city of Tolledo; Leopufca, with the city of S. Sebastiano; Valenza, with the city of Valencia; Murgia, with the cit-ty so called. In the kingdome of Granada, ther is an Island named Caliz, which hath a city also called by the same name. In the Ocean Sea, and in the Mediteranean, there are three feuerall Islands, subiect to the gouernement of Valencia, to wit, Ieniza, Maiorica, and Minorica. The Portugals vse their navigation into the East Indies; and the Spaniards of Siuitil and Caliz, into the VVest. The circumference of Spaine, is about 1893. miles. The kingdom of Portugall, fro the South part, beginneth at the city of Lepe, and on the North it extendeth to Baiona of Galicia. The most notable Ports or Hauens of Spaine, on the North part, are S. Sebastiano; the Port Galette; the Port Andrea; the Port di S. Vincenzo; the Port of Ribadeo; the Port Ieroll; and the Port delle Gragne, or of the Grayne. On the VVest part, are the Port di Monnedra; the Port of Portugall; the Port of Lisborne; & the Port Seeball. On the South part are the Port di Silua; the Port of Siuitil; the Port of Calix; and the Port of Caliz in the Island; and the Port Beger; & the famous Port Cartagenia. On the East part is the Port Calibre, now called Porto venero.

Spaine hath feuen Arch-Bishoppricks, and the residence is made in Tarraconia, in Saragossa, in Tolledo, in Compostella, in Braga, in Lisbona, and in Granata. Vnder the aboue-named Arch-Bishoppricks, are many Cities and their Bishops; as Barcellona, Girona, Lerida, Tortosa, Valenza, Maiorica, Ostia, Monnedra, Burges, Salamanca, Corduba, Legiu, Tariffa, Almaria, Siuitila, and others.

This Country (in many places) is not reduced to tillage & husbandry, because the ground consists of a very stony earth, and is much squallide and filthy through desertnesse: notwithstanding, in respect of Africa, it is very fertile, and this enueth through the ouer-great heate which is

They make no Salt by boyling or seething, but dig it out of the earth. And they have not so many windes as France; neyther are they so stored with marish and fenny grounds, wherby the ayre is much corrupted. There is not found any Gold, Silver, or Yron, so good and approued, or in such plenty, as in Spaine, and the gold is taken not only out of the Mines, but also out of the Riuer; which when they encrease by much plenty of rain; they doe produce fandes of gold; & especially the Riuer Tagus. There are found out in many places, diuers wells and springs of hot and cold water; maruailously good for the helpe of diuers & sundry infirmities, which happen to the bodies of men. There is likewise great abundance of Beasts, both wilde and tame; and especially of swift horses, which were supplied by our Elders, to bee conceiued by the windes. They haue no hurtfull creatures in any great sort, Conies onely excepted, who making their caues vnder the ground, doe much harme to the rootes growing in the earth. Their Riuer, glide away very gently, for hardly can their motion be discerned; and therefore they do not ouer-flow, or drowne the fields, being also well stored with Fith, because the Sea (by helpe of the Riuer) doth not send any plenty on land. Galicia is much commended for the Mines there breeding, and sometime it hapneth in this Region, that by plowing vp the ground, the people finde little graynes of gold. The language of the Spaniards, is not much different from the Italians; from whom they receiued it, whē they were subiect to the Romane Empire. On the Northern part, the Prouince is not so colde as in that climate of France; for it sendeth into France, Oyle, Hony, VVaxe, Saffron, Madder, Barly, dying-coulers, Chuchinelo, Snger, Oliues, Lemons, Dates, Cedar, Pomgranats, and other things; but especially many thousand weights of wool; & much wine, dried plums or prunings, rafines, almonds, chestnuts, bay-berries, salted salmon, and other things, which are sent into Italy, & first thence transported to France.

The temperature and complexion of the Spaniards, is much more hot and dry; and their coullor more dun & foggy, the that of the French: because they are more colde and moist, hauing their flesh more soft, and their coullor whiter, & the French women are more gentle, and apt to conceiue children, then the Spanish are. The Spaniards are more raw-boned men of body, the French, and in war they feed with counsell and arte, being silent by nature; as men that know most exquisitely, how to dissemble their owne intentions, walking very grauely, and vsing much ceremonious behaviour in their customs & qualities. They drinke wine temperately, liue with great respect, & are of acute vnderstanding & knowledge in their words. In Spain there are a great number of Princes, Dukes, Marquesses, Earles, & Barons, and euery one of them hath the reuenues and profits, from 50. to 60. thousand Ducates yearly. The Marquesses are 20. beside the like reuenues. The Earls are 60. with reuenues from ten to twenty thousand Ducates. Then there are Vicounts, Gouernours, and Barons, which are called Adalantades. There are great Masters of the Orders of knighthood; as of S. Iames, of Alcantara, of Calatrana, of S. Iohn of Ierusalem, of the Rhodes, of Montefe, and others; who dispend (each one) about 50. thousand Ducates in reuenues yearly. The women go pompeously apppareled, wearing rich care-rings of Pearl & Gold, hauing their garments plaited, after the manner of Italy. When they walk abroad out of their houses, the men-seruants goe before them, and the maids follow after. The most part of them do willingly drink water, and fo paint their faces with white and red, that it is most lothsom to behold. They are discreet in speech, yet prettily wanton and iaseuious, & deliuered with effectual gestures, especially in amorous matters. It is not many yeares since, that the people of this Prouince, hath gotten a great name of military feruice, as men that are most patient in labors, suffering most valiantly both thirst and hunger, and being matchlesse for subtilities in Soldierlike affaires, quicke and nimble of body, both for pursuit & flight. They haue conquered many countries, bringing thence very honourable victories, especially vnder Charles the fifth, Emperor.

The same for Military feruices, of no long antiquity among the Spaniards.

Of the Maieſty Royall.

THE Kings of Spaine, as great in power, and valorous, in regard of Military prouision, were alwayes held in no meane reuerence among their people. For men bearing ordinarily affection to their Soueraigne, their beneuolence is so much the more encreased, by how much the King liueth uirtuously and iustly, according to the ordination of his owne lawes, for so shall hee be both loued and serued. And in conclusion, the worthy deeds of his Lords, that are enriched with vnderstanding and iudgement, doe highly support him: euen as the wicked actions of such as know not how to rule and gouerne, doth ruinate & ouerthrow him. The Kings of Spaine haue possessed this Prouince many yeares peaceably, though it was (a long while) distressed by the Moores; whom at length they expelled, and reduced the whole politike body to a quiet condition, and greatly deuoted to the catholique church, whereon the King attained to the title of Catholique King. The King then is the cheefe Ruler of the kingdom, and ordereth matters as best him pleaseth: but heere it shall not much differ from our purpose, to sette downe some other obseruations, concerning the original & succession of this kingdom.

Spaine in her younger daies was held by sundry petty Kings and Terrarches; & afterward became diuided into many commonwealths, six in number, as some haue written. The Carthaginians, a people of Africa, hazzarding their fortune therein, held one part thereof, and possessed themselves of many Citties, Townes, and places; until they were expelled thence by the Romans, in the time of the Punicke wars. Since when, it was continually subiect to the Roman commonwealth, & reduced into firme of a Prouince, & in the reigne of the Emperour Augustus. So it remained till the Emperour Adrianus, in whose dayes, the Vandalas (a people of the North parts) brought it vnder their command. But they (were soon after) chased thence by the Gothes, who established there the seat of their kingdom; which they maintained (in that kinde) for the space of about 200 yeares. Nor were they then called kings of Spaine, but kings of the Gothes. In the reigne of Roderick, king of the Gothes, the Moores entered Spaine, in the year 715. they being brought thither by one named Iulian; in very desperate incignation, and to shap out a way to his bloody reienge, because king Roderick had dishonoured his Sister, or as others say) his Daughter, whereof heretofore we haue spoken more largely. And so did the Moores possesse themselves of all Spaine, seizing the city of Toledo, which was then the capital city. So ended the kingdom and name of the Gothes in Spaine. Nor rested they thus, but pursued on their conquest still, & there remained but Gallicia, the Assuries and Leon: which countries king Pelagius, Ynkle and Successor of Roderick, had fled too for refuge, & there shut up himselfe, in regard that those places were enuironed with Mountaines, and might well defend and shelter him for some time. But his Successors being hardly pressed by the Sarracins, could no longer resist: wherefore, vnder the reigne of Alphonso the second, they were forced to craue the helpe of Charlemaigne, king of France, by whose valour and vertue, the Moores were beaten thence a great way; and had bin quite cast out of the country, if the Spaniards mallice had bene no hinderance thereto. Afterward, the kings of Leon and Gallicia (for such were then their onely titles) being formerly preferred, began somewhat to encrease in power. And in regard of this expedition performed by the French, the strength of the Moores was so weakened & diminished, that many other kingdoms were established in Spaine, as that of Nauarre by Enecho, Count of Biscaye, in the year 950. which hee took away from the Moores and Sarracins, by a very valiant conquest of them. And afterward, in the year 1165 was Aragon reduced to a kingdom, by the will and testament of Sancho the great fourth king of Nauarre; for long to Ramiro his natural Sonne, who was the first King thereof. This was the same Sancho, who being Earle of Castile in the kingdom of Leon, tooke on him first the name of King of Castile, which he left vnto his Sonne Ferdinand.

The kingdom of Portugall was also conquered from the same Moores, by Earle Henry, Sonne vnto the Duke of Lorraine, who held it first of all vnder tytle of an Earle, in the year 1170. but quickly after, he brought it to be a kingdom: Spaine did did continue so (in this kinde of state) for a long time, diuided into many kingdoms: & the Moores had also their abiding there, possessing still a great part thereof; till such time as Ferdinand, the fifth, king of Aragon (who was married to Isabell, the only heire of Castile) wholly expelled the Moores out of Spaine, in the year 1492. In no great distance of time after, he possessed himselfe of Sicily and Naples, invading also the East Indies. But fraudulently he vsturped the kingdom of Nauarre, against John d'Albret, who was (indeede) the lawfull King. And it is this Ferdinand, and Isabell his wife, in whom onely wee may truly say, that the kingdom of Spaine had her first beginning. They left one only daughter, named Joane, who was married to Philip the first, of Austria, Sonne vnto the Emperour Maximilian, and Mary of Bourgundy: he succeeded in this kingdom of Spaine, and other countries beside. He was likewise Earle of Bourgundy, of Flamanders, and Lord of the Low-countries, in the right of his Mother. In this his marriage, was borne Charles the first, who was afterward Emperour. He reigned nine & thirty yeares, preferring his Prouinces very happily: and hee left for succession (both in Spaine, and the more part of his other countries) his Sonne Philip the second, who reigned three and forty yeares, having ioynd to his other estates, the kingdom of Portugall, in the year of our Lord, 1580. and so (consequently) at that which the Portugals held in the East Indies, and elsewhere; as in Africa and Brazil, which came vnto him by the death of Henry the Cardinal. He died, aged seuenty yeares, the thirteenth day of September, 1598. No long time before his death, hee had made peace with the mighty and most christian King of France, Henry the fourth. Philip the third, his Sonne, succeeded him, and reigneth as yet to this day. He married Margaret, daughter to the Arch-Duke of Austria, by whom hee had a Sonne, in the Moneth of April 1666.

Now let vs returne where we left before, concerning the king of Spaine, who being a good king, and liuing orderly, sheweth on him doe depend the following councillors, who are special members of gouernement, both in the Court and elsewhere.

Councillors of Estate Royall.

THE supream assembly of Spaine, which is the very same, that (in effect) hath the gouernment of most important affaires in their power; is the Royall or Kingly Council, so termed of the vobable king, because they are (among all other councillors) as the King himselfe among his greatest Lords. These councillors doe prouide for the peoples liuing, in all things that appertaine to a well ordered state: because from them do proceed all meanes and deliberations, concerning matters of Graine, raxations, customes, prouisions, and other substantiall occasions for safe being; but euermore assisted by the Princes authority. These councillors are in number twelue, all principall men of the kingdom, & noble by blood, hauing a President as their cheefe. And from these Noble-men, being assembled together, do come all orders, whereby the whole Realme of Spaine is gouerned: and the appellation of three Audiences, called the Chanceries of three kingdoms, do all resort to this council.

The Council of Inquisition.

In regard of the conquests which the Moores (in former times) made of this kingdom, reformation of the people was thought most conuenient, by bringing them to holy Baptisme, and procuring by all carefull meanes, that Religion might endure no danger throughout the country: this council was first created, and called, The sacred Council of Inquisition. Whereof there is a President, and hee is alwayes an Ecclesiasticall person, as the Arch-Bishop of Toledo, or the Arch-Bishop of Sinill. He is assisted by twelue other councillors, who doe altogether deale in matters appertaining to religion. They giue chastisement to heretiques; haue care of catholique affaires; and peruse all Bookes before they be imprinted, to auoyd them of offence or corruptions. Other the like busineses are referred to their charge, for the better preservation of holy faith.

The Council of the Orders.

In Spaine there are three seuerall degrees of Knights, all honourable gentlemen, containing every one by themselves, one proper & peculiar Order of knighthood, introduced in former times by diuers Kings of the Land. The first and principall among all the other, is that of the knights of S. James: the second, the Knights of Calatrava: and the third, the Knights of Alcantara. These three Orders haue (each one to it selfe) many Citties and Castles vnder their gouernment, gotten and obtained in diuers times: and because their managing is great, and as if it were a kingdom within it (else, therefore this Council of these Orders was ordained. Whereof there is a President, with foure Councillers, and these meeting all together, do prouide Magistrates of the Orders, of Lawes, and of all other things that appertaine to the foresaid Orders. The King is the great Master of these Orders, & when any expedition is to be performed by the Order of S. James, the King in his Letter, next vnto the ordinary stile or title that is usually given him, writeth; And perpetual Administrator of S. James, &c. Next vnto the King, followeth the great Commendator of Leon, as being Commendator of the Order of S. James; and after him, the Commendator of Castile. These altogether with the King, do dispense the commendums of spirituall livings: but for that, looke in our Booke of the originall of Knights.

The Councell of the Indies.

When it pleased God, by the means of Don Christophero Columbus, to open (in our time) that part of the world, which formerly was shut vp from all of vs now here dwelling, and whereof the kings of Spaine haue (in part) bin Patrones: for gouernment of that part (as necessity required) a Councell of the Indies was created, consisting of twelve Councillers, with one President. These then do attend vpon all such matters, as appertaine to the gouerning of India. And therefore they haue their full power, sendinge their Gouernors, Officers, and all kinde of prouision, as is fit for those kingdomes, which are vnder the Crowne of Castile.

The Council of Warre.

When it so belitteth out, that any matter of action is to be vnderaken, eyther for defence of themselves, or any new acquisition, the Council of Warre do meete together: among whom are the Lords of the Council Royall, the great Commendator of Leon, the Commendator of Castile, with other cheefe

Rulers.

The secret Councell.

All of all is the Councell for matters of secrecy, wherein the King is present, the great Chancellor, the great Commendator of Leon, and the third part of the Councell Royall, with the President. Being set together, they giue dispatch to matters of greatest secrecy, and which do most import the King, as appertaining properly to the State.

Three Judges, and the Restor.

For causes incident to ciuill and criminall iudgement, three Judges are ordained in criminall occasions, who, as being Tribunes of the common people, do dispatch all criminall occurrences. And when the ordinary Podesta, or cheefe Officers are there present, they attend on ciuill affaires: but if it fall out, that hee cannot be there in person, the three Judges doe then take order in ciuill matters. These are alwayes in those Citties, where the appointed Courts are kept.

The three Chanceries.

Over and beside the fore-named Councils and Offices, the King hath three Courts of audience, called three Chanceries, placed in three kingdomes, diuided the one from the other. One is in Valadolid, consisting of twelve Councillers, and with one President. These do sit every morning separately in foure Halls, three in each Hall. The second is in Granada, the principall city of the kingdom of Granada, as being the first and cheefe. The third and last is in Galicia, beinge neyther more or lesse in power, then the two former. To this Court of audience go all the causes of Spaine, and they may each of them (by themselves) expedite their causes, without any interuention one of another. The appeales and chalenges of the Restor of Granada, and those of Castile, to Valadolid, and so from hand to hand. But in regard that they haue superiours, and for the satisfaction of the people, such as liue themselves greued in the fore-named Audiences, or Chanceries, may appeale from them to the Councell Royall. Moreover, each of these fore-named Chanceries haue Restors or Commanders,

Vice-Royes, or Kings Deputies.

Because Spaine (as formerly hath bene said) is diuided into diuers kingdomes, the cheefe or principall whereof is Arragon: the King hath and doth usually send into those kingdomes, Deputies, or Vice-Royes, to gouern there in his name. They are elected and made choise of by him, being first affirmed by the councell Royall, to be Princes of the country, men of vertue and valor, and deserveng advancement to so high degree. Valencia hath her Vice-Roy, who gouerneth the kingdom of Valencia, by the same authority as was receiued from the former Kings of Arragon, and by the ancient lawes and orders of the kingdom. In Barcelona likewise, the principall city of Catalogna, ruleth another Vice-Roy, making vic of the lawes, customes, and ordinances of the kingdom of Barcelona. In Arragon also is another Vice-Roy, who maketh his residence in Sarragossa. This Vice-Roy gouerneth by the ancient lawes of Arragon (as other Vice-Royes do by the Castilian lawes) because it is the head of the other kingdomes. The kingdom of Narrarre hath also her Vice-Roy, abiding in Pampalona, who ruleth this kingdom according to the lawes thereof, and those of the crowne of Castile, because it was last of all conquered by Don Ferdinand, the catholike King. All the fore-named Vice-Royes, doe acknowledge the King of Spaine, and his councell Royall, in all their causes.

The Treasurer of Castile.

All of all, there liueth in Court the Treasurer, a most honourable degree, and of great importance, who receiue the monies of all the kingdomes reuenues. Hee hath foure Contadores or Auditors vnder his command, who doe gather and collect the monies from the people, and bringing them vnto the Treasurer, payments are continually made forth, as command is given by the King to the Treasurer.

CHAP. II.

Of the Kingdom of Portugall; the beginning, continuance, and present estate thereof, with the Customes, Lawes, and administration of Iustice therein obserued.

HE kingdom of Portugall began in the year of Christ, one thousand, five hundred and ten, and after this manner. Henry Earle of Lorraine comming thither, performed many valiant deeds against the Sarrasins, and his high deservings moued Alphonfus the first king of Castile, to giue him a Bastard daughter of his in marriage, named Teresa. And in way of dowry, he assigned also vnto him that part of Galicia, which was then contained in Lusitania.

Of this marriage was Alphonfus borne, who was the first that ever titled himselfe king of Portugall: and hee was the first also, that tooke the city of Lisbone from the Sarrasins. For he hauing conquered five of their Kings in seuerall battailes, caused his Armes to be adorned with five seuerall Crownes & Coat-Armors, which ever after continued the Ensigne of the kings of Portugall, in perpetuall memory of his valour. But he quickly staued this faire fame, with cruelty by him to his owne Mother. For after her second marriage, he caused her to be imprisoned, and albeit the Pope laboured the matter greatly, by the means of his Legate, yet could he neuer compasse his grace and fauour for her deliuerance. Which sinne was severely punished on him afterward by his enemies, who tooke him in battaile. And then his Sonne Santisio succeeded him, and after Santisio, diuers other, to John, who was the tenth king in direct and naturall line.

This John was (at the first) expelled from his kingdom, and made a Knight of S. Iohn of Ierusalem: but at length hee was recalled to his kingdom, where hee made very honourable proofe of his valour, and (among diuers famous deeds) he tooke from the Sarrasins the city of Seplia. Hee had seven Sonnes, among which, Ferdinand (for integrity of life)

Henry another of his sonnes, was the first that found Nova Insula, in the Atlanticke Sea. Hee being very skilfull in the Mathematickes, lived continually without a wife, and made his dayly abiding in a Promontorie, which was called the Cape of Saint Vincent, and there he died, in the year, 1460. But Edward, who was the eldest Brother, was made King; and he added to the kingdom of Portugall, by means of his warres, Zelia, Tegaz, and Alcazar in Affrica. Hee had two daughters, or sisters (as some say) named Joane and Leonora; the first was married to the King of Castile, and the other unto Frederick the third, Emperor, of whom was borne Maximilian the first, who was afterward Emperor, and Grandfather to Charles the fifth.

He had also a son, named Alphonso, who succeeded him in the kingdome, and begate John and Emanuel, that was the fourteenth King of Portugall. Emanuel had John, who tooke to wife the sister of the fore-named Charles the fifth, Emperor, called Katherine, and begate Lodowicke, that dyed an infant, and Isabell who was wife to the said Charles, and had another daughter also, which was married to Charles Duke of Sauoy. After these succeeded Sebastian, who (in our time) fighting against the Moors, was slain, & the King of Morocco with him, besides divers other great Lords of the Moors.

Henrie, Yockle to the deceased King, followed him in succession, he being then a Cardinall, and very aged, holding the kingdome some few months. But he dying, Phillip King of Spain, entered on the kingdome; withstanding the claime and title of Don Anthonio, being a Brothers sonne to the dead King Henrie, & so outweared him with troubles, that he could neuer attaine thereto in full possession, and so it remaineth still in the Spaniards power.

Concerning the gouernement of this kingdome, it hath the very same forme & obseruation as all the rest of Spain hath, as being a part of that Prouince. For, there is a high Constable, and a Lord Great Steward, with all other dignities elsewhere related. By the Title and name of great Lords, there is the Duke of Braganza, the Duke of Colimbra, the Duke of Viseo, the Duke of Trafossa, the Duke of Barcella and the Duke of Anaria. There is also the Marquess of Villa Reale, the Marquess of Torra Nuova, the Marquess of Monte Maggiore, and the Marquess of Ferrira, with an infinite number of Earles. There is likewise the Order of Knight-hood, called the Knights of Christ, honoured and esteemed much aboute all other, and whereof the King is the Great Maister.

Among these honourable persons in this Order, as an approoued man of valour, most signale for many vertues, liberal minde and courtesie, beside speedyest intelligence in matters of Military discipline, is the Lord Flaminio Zambeccaro, Lord of Castella in Campagna, who liueth at this day in Florence, and highly affected of the Duke.

CHAP. III.

Of the Antiquity, Originall, Customs, Lawes and administration of Iustice, obserued in the kingdome of Naples.

THE Citie of Naples, being most ancient and Noble in all respects, giueth the Title of kingdome vnto all the Prouinces which it holdeth and possesseth, even by his owne proper name. Therefore wee may thence frame our argument, what the greatnesse of that Citie hath formerly bene, in regard that all the parts by it possessed, deriue from thence the Title of a Kingdome; which I do not holde to be of any great antiquity, because the Normanes tooke it from the Grecians, who possessed the Prouince in diuers partes thereof, and then it was rearm'd the County or Earledome of Puglia, or Apulia; as some do yet call it.

Robert Guiscard, a verie valiant and worthy man, having expulsed (in a manner) all the Grecians thence, & taken Sicily also from the Sarrazins; would needs style himselfe Duke of Apulia and of Calabria, and Earle of Sicily. of Naples, which till that time had bene in the Grecians gouernment) obtayned the title of King of both the Sicillies, by Anacletus the Anti-Pope, in the year 1130. which afterward was confirmed to him in good and lawfull manner. And from that time, it was called the kingdom of Sicily, on this side Pharos; vntill the reigne of Charles the first, when it became diuided from Sicily, by occasion of that famous accident, called Fespro Siciliano, the Sicilian Euening, wherein so manie of the French were slaine. I finde moreover in many good Historians, that this kingdome hath had 3. seuerall Names, to wit; the kingdome of Naples, the kingdome of Apulia, and the kingdom of Sicily, on this side Pharos, the bounds or circumference whereof, at this day is thus described.

First of all, by Land-way, measure of the Line, and the Confines of the whole Kingdome, with the Sea-shores & stronds; as also Campagna di Roma, sometimes called Latum, which (at this day) terminateth the riuier of Ofento, on this side Terracina, and from the mouth of the sayde Riuier, where it entereth into the Terrene Sea, proceeding on still towards the Apennines, with Latum, and part of Sabina: then passing the Apennines, with part of Vmbria and of Picenum, now called Marca d'Ancona, vnto the Confines thereof, is the Riuer Truentus or Tromto, where it entereth into the bosom of the Adriaticke maine. Which Scale or Line, because it doth not directly extend it selfe forth, but passeth on by turnings and windings, euermore from one of the forenamed Riuers to another, by the terminations of those Regions, it containeth about an hundred and fifty miles in length. Passing on thence from Terracina, by the confines of the kingdome, to Ponte Corone, and Ceperano; and by the confines of Aieti, thorow the country of Trojano, to Interdoso, and Civita Reale, then to Maritima, and thence (by the river) to Aseoli, till we come to the mouth of Tromto; the Line here being directly extended, will containe about an hundred thirty miles in length, or little lesse. By the sea-coasts along the banke and shore, the whole kingdome windeth about, like vnto an Island almost round engirt with water, as towards the middest of the Terrhene Sea, and so on to the Sicilian sea. On the East side, from the Adriaticke sea, and so vnto the North, part of the Ionian sea, to farre as Monte Gargano, or Santo Angelo, and part of the Adriaticke bosome, from Gargano to Tromto, the Kingdome, extendeth it selfe, and imparteth her boundes with the faide sea: all which circumference, from Ofento to Tromto, and in length by the sea-shores, containeth in all 1418. miles, in this manner.

From Terracina to Naples, are eighty two miles. From Naples, to the heade of the gulf of Policastro, an hundred fortie seven miles. From the head of Policastro to Rhegium in Calabria, an hundred eighty three miles. From Rhegium to the head of Spartimento, so to Capo della Colonne, now called Lacinium, an hundred and ninety miles. From Capo delle Colonne, to Taranto, two hundred miles. From Taranto, to Capo di Leuca, now called Salento, thirtie miles. From Capo di Leuca, to Capo d'Otranto, sixe and twenty miles. From Capo d'Otranto, to Capo S. Angelo, now called Gargano, two hundred two and twentie miles. From Capo S. Angelo, to the uttermost confines, which is the riuier of Tromto, two hundred miles. All which sums in this roundure (by the sea boundles) do make one thousand, foure hundred, and eightene miles. Wherunto adioyning the foresaid hundred & fiftie miles, which is the space of the Land by measured line, wherewith if wee ioine to the other part of Italy, from Ofento to Tromto, it summeth vp, one thousand five hundred sixty eight miles. And this is now (at this day) the dimension or measure of the kingdomes circuit.

These following Regions and Prouinces, are contained and embraced within the whole bodie. Latia Munip, that is one part, so much as is from the Riuer of Terracina, reaching to Garigliano. For, one part of the true Latia, which anciently extended it selfe, so farre as to Baker Lazio, that now adays is called Garigliano, beginneth from Ofento thence to Pharos (the sea). And Adriaticke is that part, where there are three partitions made of all the Regions which lye between Terracina, Sabina, the Apennines, and Terracina, and termed by three seuerall names, to wit; Latia, Campagna di Roma, and Marchia Maritima, yet notwithstanding, in elder dayes, (so farre

Picenum, or where the Picentines inhabit, holdeth on from Sarnus, to the River Silarus, and the most famous Cities therein, are Sorrento, Nocera de Pagani, & Salernum.

Lucania, called sometimes Sao, contains it selfe betweene the river Silarus, and that called Saprio. And therein the Cities of most note are Pontecastro & Salerno elder times also there were Pesum and Buxentum, and among the mountains are many Castles.

Where the Brutii do live, it confineth with Lucania, and runneth along the river Saprio vpon the Terrhene sea, so farre as the Promontory of Lecopetra, at this day called Capo dell'Arme in the Sicilian Sea, where the Apennine Mountains do end, which beginning at the Alpes, run all along through the midst of Italy, and the vertie poore over the saide Cape, is now adays called by Marriners, Punta di Tarlo, the point of Tarlo. In this part, the most principall places are Cosenza, and Rhegium on the Sea, otherwise tearmed Iunio, as a difference and distinction from that Rhegium which is in Lombardi, so named by Lepidus.

Magna Grecia, or Great Grecia, runneth along from Capo dell'Arme, turning Northerly towards the Promontorie of Capo di Spartimento, now called Herculanum, by the Seacoast so farre as Taranto, where it entrench into the Adriaticke sea. In it, are Squillace, Taranto, and Cotrone.

The countrey of the Salentines, is on the brest of Taranto, so farre as Capo di Leuca, now called the Salentine Promontorie. In it are situated Calipolis and Pogento.

Calabrie selfe, which hath so continued, runneth vnto Capo di Leuca Northward, so farre as Brundisium in the Ionian sea. The famous Cities therein, are Lecci, Brundisium, or Brandisium, and Hydruntum, now called Otranto. These two Regions (I meane Salentinum & Calabria, which is that part of Land which extendeth towards the East, between the Gulfes of Taranto and the Ionian sea) being ioyned together with one name, now adays termed Terra d'Otranto, was called by our forefathers Capigia and Mesapesa. And it is an Island round engirt with waters; for from Taranto to Brundisium, which are vpon the two seas, there is not in firme land above 35 miles.

Apulia Pucetia, betweene Brundisium & Offento, vpon the Ionian Gulfe, is now adays (along the sea-coast) called Terra di Bari, and Loucanazzo, & lyeth betweene the fandy countreies.

Capitanato, of plain Apulia, with its extenture betweene Offento and the River called Fortore, passeth on, on the Ionian Gulfe, so far as Capo S. Angelo, & thence vpon the Adriaticke bosome to Fortore. The places of most note, are Salupis, Silipio, and Manfredonia, a new city built by King Maufred. It is also between Terra Luceria, or Nocera de Saracini, and Canoja.

Frentani are a people living from Fortore to the River S. Agria, or Sagra, now called the bloody river, on the Adriaticke Gulfe. Chiefe cities therein, are Eliotoni, sometime cald Istonium, Larino, & Laciano.

The Peligni dwell betweene the River Sagra, and that called Pescara, sometime Aternus. The fairest city, betweene Terra Sulmana, and Pentina on the seacoast, is Ortano.

The Marcini do inhabit from the river of Pescara, so farre as Tronto, the vnto ending of the kingdome, along the sea-shore on the Adriaticke gulfe. There is a Sea-Cittie, which is called Francavilla or Frentana, and a Land-city called Chieti.

Above the Marcini, betweene the land of the Apennines, and where they do take best rooting, beginning at the confines of the Peligni, so now called, and turning towards Marca d'Ancona, are three other people in order, to witte, the Veitini, whose City was named Penna, and now called the city of Penna; the Amietini and Furrani, of whose ruines the citie of Aquila was builded, some final distance off.

The Veitini, neighbor with the Prentini, of whom whom it is verily credited, that the name of the Brutii, now tearmed Abruzzesi, was first deriued.

The Marfi dwell more inward to the Mountains, whose most famous place is Celano, with her Lake Lucina, now tearmed of the Marfi and Albi. These fixe forenamed people, are all called by one name, Abruzzesi; but oftentimes by writers they are vnderstood vnder the nomination of the Samnites.

Samnio, from the point of Land, and almost to the middest of the Kingdome, hath Latinum and Campania in length, both on this side, and beyond the Apennines. At this day it is called Valle Beneuentana, the valley of Beneuentum, which extendeth it selfe in length, so farre as the River Silarus, eighty miles. Places of greatest name heretofore, were Esernia, Sepino, Tellio, Beneuentum and Boniano.

The 4th Hirpini, otherwise called Samnites, do confine with the Picentines, Lucanes and Apulians, partaking at this day with Principato and Basilicata. The most noted Cities, are now Avellino and Agnone.

I finde that all these Regions haue (by our Moderne writers) beene diuided into seuen feuerall principall partes or Provinces, if we may so tearme them, to wit, Terra di Lauoro, Principato, Basilicata, Calabria, Terra di Otranto, Apulia & Abruzzo. Vhich Prouinces haue (since then) according to order of later diuision, bene parted into twelue Regions, as I finde them in the Registers of Naples, in this manner.

Terra di Lauoro, which hath in lands, Cities, and Castles, to the number of 198.

Contado di Moniffo, hath 108.

Abruzzo the neereft, hath 155.

Abruzzo the furthest, hath 288.

Capitanata, hath 96.

Terra di Bari, hath 50.

Basilicata, hath 103.

Terra d'Otranto, hath 172.

Principato the neereft, hath 129.

Principato the furthest, hath 164.

Calabria the neereft, hath 162.

Calabria the furthest, hath 147.

All which being fully summed together, in Cities, Lands, and Castles, as hath formerly bene sayde, and all inhabited with plenty of people, and furnished with all things commodious for the life of man, do amount to one thousand seuen hundred, seuentie foure.

There are certaine Islands also in the bodie of this kingdome, which circle, neighbour, or are opposite: as on the Terrhene sea, directly facing Terracina & Gaeta, are the Isles of Ponza, and of Palmarola. And ouer-against Isola, is the Ile of Desfente. At the encountering of Pozzuolo, is that of Ischia; neere to which is Procida, or Prochyta, made famous by those yong Gallants that denified & performed the Sicilian Evening beside Africari and Capraia, so highly beloued of the Emperor Tiberius, opposite to Capo della Minerva.

The three Sirenusse do front Passitano; one of them being called Gale, another Anona, and the third S. Pietro. There is likewise the Ile of Lipara, which titlith aboute ten miles, wherein are some Cities. On the Adriaticke maine, right against Varino, are those of Rafaja & Cargano; and the foure other called Diomedea, now adays called Tremite, but they are very little; and the two greater thereof are called, the one S. Maria, the other S. Doimo, and the two lesser are, the one Gaiuzzo, and the other Caprara. These are Islands of some note and name, omitting other places, which bee comprehended within the confines of the kingdome of Naples.

With them might bee ranked that of Scily, an Italian Island, great & wealthy; but that it is an Ile of it selfe, & at this day deuided from the kingdome. Notwithstanding, it did sometime partake in name with the kingdome of Naples. For some Kings, as Fredericke the eleventh, Maufred his sonne, Charles the first of Anion, and Alphonfus the first of Arragon, posselving both the one and other, wrote their titles both on this side, and beyond Pharos. Whereupon, when we find it written simply the kingdome of Scily; it is meant of this Ile, & not of Scily on this side Pharos in Italy.

In this Kingdome are twenty Archbyshoppricks, to wit, of Naples; which hath fise Byshoppes vnder it: Of Capua, which hath ten. Of Salernum, which hath ten.

There are also an hundred twenty four Bishops, which are vnder the aboue named Archbithoppricks; only the bishop of Bisignano excepted, who is not subiect to any one.

It is also to bee noted, that the Title of Prince is greater in this kingdome, then that of Duke. And the Principalities there are ten in number, to wit, of Ascoli di Bisignano, of Evoli, of Melfi, of Molfetta, of Monchercole, of Squillati, of Siegliano, of Salerno, and of Venosa.

There are likewise three and twentie Dukedomes. As of Andri, of Amalfi, of Ariano, of Asi, of Baiano, of Castellmarsi, of Noerri, of Popola, of Rocca di Mondragone, of *S. The Marquesates are 29. of Anna, of Arienza, of Bellata, of Bucchanico, of Campagna, of Capo Vesio, of Castel Vetere, of Chierchiano, of Ciuità S. Angelo, of Corigliano, of Lama, of Lauro, of Sicilia, of Misurata, of Oria, of Oriolo, of Padula, of Beruentana, of Pulignano, of Quarata, of Santo Lucito, of Terza, of Torre di Francisca, of Torre Maggiore, of Trinico, of Tursi, of Valle Siciliana, of Pasto, and of Pico.

There are in like manner, 54. Earles of State, 15. Lords, and 443. entituled Barons. And it is verily supposed, that in any kingdome of the world, there are not so many great Princes and Lordes, as in this, because they are (by nature) of high and lofty courage. And nowe I call to minde, in this matter, that I haue read in some Registers, bearing date of the year 1521. that the Emperor Charles the fife, fold many Titles and Lordships in the kingdom, & that many Gentlemen sold their goodes at ten in the hundred, and bought these Lordships at three in the hundred.

This kingdome so highly ennobled, full of worthy Princes, most rich and fertile, as more cannot bee wished; was for long time gouerned by diuers kings. For beside the Normans, who helde it manie years, and (as hath bene sayde) wonne it the title of a Realme; it fell at length to Fredericke the second, Emperour, who had it of Henry the sixt his Father: after whom succeeded Corrado Emperour, son to Fredericke; and after him it came (by reason) to Corradino, Nephew to Corrado. But Manfredo the bastard son to Fredericke, feigning that Corradino was dead vsurped the State, and made himself king. But Pope Vrbane the fourth (beeing enemy to Manfredo) excommunicated him, and deputed him of the kingdome: inuefing therein in Anno 1266. Charles the 1. of Anion, Brother to Lewes the eight, K. of France, who (first of all) slew Manfredo, and afterwards causing Corradino to be beheaded, tooke it in full possession.

Charles the second, Sonne to Charles Prince of Salerno had it next; and then succeeded him, Robert the excellent Philosopher; who was a very louing friend to Petrarch. After him, the succelsion fell to Ioane, the Neece of Robert by Charles; and next succeeded Charles the third, K. of Durazzo.

After his death there happened contention for the kingdome, betwene Ladislaw sonne to Charles the third, and Lewes of Anion: but Ladislaw remaining full Patron, held it till the year one thousand and foure hundred and foureteene: and then succeeded Ioane the second, his sister; in whose place (making himselfe King by force of armes) rose Alphonso of Arragon the sonne to Ferdinando, who left it vnto Ferdinando his bastard son. Next to him succeeded Alphonso the second, who troubled himselfe not long in the Kingdome, by the comming of Charles the eight, K. of France into Italy, for recouerie of the kingdome, and then renounced it to Ferdinando the second, his son; from whom it came to Frederigo, Vnckle to the sayde Ferdinando.

Afterward it fell to Charles the fift, Em-

Emperor, who had the inuefiture from Pope Leo the tenth. For there was such a constitution betwene the Popes, Emperors, and Kings of Naples, that whosoever was Emperour, he could not bee King of Naples: and therefore he gaue it ouer to Philip the first, King of Spain, whose sonne Philip the second, now holdeth it, keeping there a Vice-roy, with most ample authority, and representeth there the Kings owne person. Whereby he is very much honoured and reuerenced of all his subordinate Gouernors, according as he causeth himselfe to be esteemed, both by his valour and authority.

The High Constable.

The Officers or Magistrates of the Kingdome, are seauen in theyr seuerall degrees; but he whom they terme Sindico, that representeth the whole City, and speaketh for all as chiefeft Aduocate, is the Constable, or rather high Marshall. He is the first man of the kingdome, and Captaine general for all ordinances of warre. He (as Lieutenant to the king) ordaineth and provideth all such things, as appertaine to the preparation for warre: hauing charge of the Sentinelles, encamping men, providing tents and lodgings, appointing the Ensignes Royall, and (in breefe) hee hath the care for all matters that concerne Armes. In which place, he hath authority to chaffeise, and to put to death such persons as commit Theft, Rapine, Homicides, and other misdemeanors in the Campe. And this Office continueth so long as warres lasteth.

When the King createth him in this dignity, deliuering a Truncheon to him, he vseth these words: Take this holy Weapon, wherewith thou shalt expell the aduersaries of my people.

The Great Iusticer.

The second Office, is that of Great Iusticer, or Lord chiefe Iustice, who hath iurisdiction as well in ciuill causes, as those that be criminal, and vnder his authority are all the Princes, Dukes, Marqueses, Lords, and Barons of the Kingdome; for to him belongeth care of offences against the Maiesty Royall. His Vicar or Lieutenant, is called Regent of the vicaria: who hath his Iudges both ciuill and cri-

minall, and his Tribunal is in the Court of the vicaria, hauing allowed him for his yearly prouision, fixe hundred Ducates.

The High Admirall.

The thirde Office, is that of Great or High Admirall, who hath the charge of Sea causes, and such things as appertaine to Nauall Art and profession. Hee looketh to the making, repairing, building, and appointing of all Shippes for Royall seruice, and keeping of all such vessels as come into the kingdome, from what parts soeuer. VVhen occasion fo requieth, and that it is imposed on him by the King, he setteth forth the Nauall Army in order. He appointeth both reall & corporeall punishments for delinquents, and hath ciuill and criminall iurisdiction ouer the Officers and others, that attend on Sea affayres.

The Great Chamberlaine.

The fourth Office, is, that of Great Chamberlaine, or the Chamberlaine of State, choofe-ye whether: whose Deputie or Lieutenant hath his iudgements Seate, in the Chamber called sommara. His charge is to haue care of the Kinges person, to prepare and adorne his bedde; as also his Garments, and to take order for all his vnder Chamberlaines, Guardians, and Treasurers. Hee keepeth all the customes of the kingdome, and taketh cognition of the matters belonging vnto the Royall Exchequer, the tonths, tolles, fines, reuenewes, and other things appertaining to the Kings person.

The Protonotary.

The fift Office is the Lieutenant, or rather Protonotarie. Hee standeth obliged to read before the King, and to conserue the writings and registers. He hath authority to create Notaries, Iudges, and to Legitimate Bastards. But the Catholike King hath (since then) transferred the Office of writings, and of the Registers, to the Kings Chancery.

CHAP. IIII.

Of a Law obſerued amongſt the Rhodians, which enioyned and commanded Fathers (ſetting aſide all other buſineſſe and affairs) to marry their daughters with all poſſible ſpeed.

Greece the Mother of ancient Lawes.

Here are very fewe people, (in mine opinion) that are ignorant of the Romaine Lawes, which came firſt forth of Greece, and are continued to this day, ſurpaſſing al other nations whatſoeuer, in the actions of Juſtice and Policy, and among them haue many Common-weales flouriſhed, not onely in Military and warlike affaires, but alſo in good manners and policies. Among the reſt, that of the Rhodians is to be eſteemed; which not onely eſtabliſhed great ſtore of Lawes, to render euery man what belonged to him, & preferre the weaker ſort from oppreſſion; but alſo concerning the marriage of their daughters, becauſe no inconuenience ſhould enſue to them, as to too many elſewhere happened. The Law then made for marriage of their daughters, was breecſely ſet downe in theſe words.

WE command, that a Father doe not torment himſelfe one onely day, for the marriage of ten ſonnes, if hee ſhould haue ſo many: but rather to labour and traugle tenne yeares, for the marriage of one onely daughter, being vertuous. That hee ſtand in water up to the mouth; That he ſweat great drops of blood, and labor in the ground, drawing like a Horſſe; That he do rather diſinherit all his Male-children, leaue all his wealth and riches to riſer abandoning, yea, and his owne proper life, onely to provide ſafeſtie for his daughters chaſtity.

This Law had bene worthy of obſeruation in the countries heereabout, where if it had liued in the like force and vertue, ſo many famous Families had neuer bin diſhonoured, by the ſhameleſſe immodities of ouer-many maidens, as haue remained to very woſull example. For, it hath bin noted, that Fathers (oſtentimes thorow greedy couetouſneſſe) would not allow Dowries to their daughters, anſwerable to their meanes and qualitie: in regard whereof, they haue cauſed them to be forſaken, and not fought vnto by any perſon. Sometimes alſo they haue giuen them greater eſtates then either was conuenient, or ſtood with their owne power, to the ruine and ouerthrow both of the one and other. Wee haue obſerued like wiſe, ſome ill aduifed fathers, who haue neglected their daughters marriages, being ouer-ſwayed with affection to their ſonnes, and bearing no reſpect at all to their daughters; yether ſuffering them to enter too farre into yeares, or elſe to bee ſhut vp in Religious houſes (by not affording them money meeſe for Marriage) where all their time they haue liued miſerably, and (many times) as vnchaſtly, and with much leſſe honour then they could haue done, if they had remained at liberty.

The common Prouerb is, that there are three things, which if men do them not, they will be done of themſelues: And the third of them is, that if men do not marry their daughters, then they will marry themſelues, and oſtentimes, to ſuch as are of bad life, or poore, or not agreeing with their owne quality, to the great diſhonor of themſelues and their parents. When this doth happen in any Commonwealth, alliances looſe themſelues, and there is nothing but reproch on the one ſide and other; whereby (too often) great quarrels do ariſe, ſuites in law, and other deſperate inconueniences.

To auyd all which dangers, Fathers ought to be aduertized, that it is not good to keep their daughters too long vnmarried; For as one ſaith very well; It is a merchandiſe, which being kept, there is nothing gotten by it. Prouiſion therefore (in this caſe) ſhould be made, when their daughters begin to enter into their puberty, which is, at 13. yeares of age, or (at the vttermoſt) at 16. or 18. and to make no longer delaying, if poſſibly it may be done: for then they are ripe, and ready to yeeld fruit. If they be kept any longer time, for the moſt part they loſe their beautie, and faireſt graces. They afford (according to common natural inſtinct, as well in beaſts, as in men, throwing all reaſon and reſpect behinde them) their affection to ſome ſuch, whom their Parents doe not thinke meeſe and conuenient, and (in the end) worke ſome taint or blemiſh vnto their owne modeſty. Or if they doe not, by reaſon of their frequent familiaritie with men, they ſhall be ſure talked of verie ſtrangely, which now adaies is grown ſo common and reproachfull, that euen the verie chaſteſt that liue, haue worke enough to doe, to exempt and cleare themſelues, from badde fame and ill reports.

Moreouer we daily behold, that when Parents doe provide for their daughters, ſuch as are ſomewhat entred into yeares, they will reſuſe the men that are thought meeſe for them, and made offer of to them in good diſcretion. Alledging that they haue already giuen their liking vnto another, and (as many times it comes to paſſe) to ſuch a one as is vtter enemy to their houſe; compelling their parents either to forſake them, without any choiſe at all, or elſe (with much ſorrow) to conſent thereto, onely to auoide the woort, whereby both Fathers and mothers remained diſcontented ſo long as they liue. Theſe warnings do ſpeake themſelues, as well vnto great perſons, ſuch as are not onely Emperors, Kings, Princes, and other illuſtrious bloodes, but alſo to Plebeians, and men of vſuall ranke, who do ſtand no more exempt from ill huſbanding their children, then the other do, but are euen as ready to faile therein, yea, and many times ſooner. Which I will approue by ſome Hiſtories, deriued from Bandello the Italian, and the Annales of France.

Adelaſia, daughter to one of the greateſt and moſt vertuous Emperors, named Otho, third of that name, that reigned after Charlemaigne, vntill his time, hauing liſtened vnto many Kings and Princes, who ſought his Daughter Adelaſia in Marriage, as well for her extraordinary beautie, as her other excellent graces, and Royall extraction; yet hee aſpiring (as it ſhould ſeeme) at ſome greater and more noble match, or a party of more worth (in his opinion) for his daughter, by means of theſe delays, brought incomparable miſfortune to his Imperial Houſe, which elſe had flouriſhed in manye happineſſe. Adelaſia grew enamored of a young youth, a ſonne to the houſe of Saxony, and both of them being ſecretly married, furniſhed with ſome ſmall ſtore of money, beſide a fewe Jewels and precious ſtones; beſooke themſelues to trauaile, attired and diſguiſed like Pilgrims. Adelaſia in the habite of a youth, with full deliberation, to make their abiding in ſome ſtrange countrey, far enough from Allemagne.

Thus wandering as fugitives, to ſatiſfie their owne voluptuous deſires, at the length, they were robbed on the Highway, and ſo by that meanes, were conſtrained (after long and importunate begging, traueſing manie Countreyes) to retire into a great Forreſt, ſituated betwene Ath and Saxony, in Italy, where (thorow great neceſſity) they began to exerciſe the labour of Colliers, enduring many ſtormes and hard afflicti- ons, for the ſpace of eighteen yeares together. In the end, it pleaſed God to be ſatiſfied with their humility & repentance, and to make them better knowne, by the meanes of one of their ſons, named William, who following the nature of his extraction, beſooke himſelfe to make one in the Imperial Armies in Italy, & greatly reſembling in fauour the Emperour Otho, whereby he was imagined to be iſſued of Adelaſia; which being found to fall

our true, and the poore retreat of the Collars (his parents) made knowne, the Emperour pardoned them; & calling them home into Allemagne, gaue them great and liberrall meanes; but much blamed himselfe, that he hadde not married his daughter in such time as was fittest for her. The like happened to that far more puissant and great Emperour (his predecessor) Charlemaigne; whose eldest daughter was found paillardising with one named Eginhard, his Secretary, or (as some say) Chanceour vnto the saide Charlemaigne.

Some Kings of France haue also bene payed with coine of the same stampe, as well as these fore-named Emperours; wit-nesse Judith, daughter to Charles the Bald, second of that name. Her Father refused to giue her in marriage to diuerse young Allemaigne Princes, of great extraction, as Dukes, Marquesses, and others: affection (much rather) to giue her in wed-locke to a King of England, who had formerly beene an Archbyschop, a man aged sickly, and impotent, with whome the remained eight months only, and without any hope of yssue. Repassing the sea, to returne home into France, the sent vnto Baldwine, Gouernor of the colliers coun-trei, then termed Pais Charbonnier, but now adayes called the countrey of Flanders, a poore Prouince, wherto no other Lieutenants or Gouernours were giuen by the King, but such as were of smal and slender renouwe. This Baldwine had clandestinely promised marriage to Lady Judith, before shee was sent into England,
he being a goodly person, faire and of absolute forme, as many of that countrey oftentimes are, yet of no great discrecion,
a Gentleman in the midst of many necessities, who surprized her on the seas (he being willing enough to be so taken) & carried her home with him into his government. The King was so displeased herewith, & that iustly, that he appointed di-uers forers to goe punish the rauisher of his daughter, being his owne disloyal subiect. But he was round engirt with so many Vvares, as well against his Nephewes, as his Brothers, and the Danes, that he was sodainly enforced to defer his intention for that time, dying not long after, bearing no meane greefe for this rape
(with him) to his graue. By means wherof

Baldwine & she liued a long while as pri-uate persons, not hauing any great store of meanes for their maintenance.

Lewes the flammerer, succesor & brother to Charles the Bald, as much offended as the father of Judith, persisted in resolution to punish these two louers. Neuer-theless, by the humble entreaties made vnto him by diuers worthy Church-men, of holy life & vntained fame, beside diuers
other great personages of his kingdom, (who deliuered lively representation to him of the young yeares wherein they then were, subiect to the prouocations of nature, who hath not alwayes reason for her guide, and laying the blame on her deceased father, that would not admit her to marry, when she was so sought and sued vnto) he pardoned them, giuing vnto his Niece Judith and her heires, the countrey and Forrest of the Colliers, wherof Bald-wine had formerly bin Gouernour; yet afterward deprived, & thus restored. And albeit it was a matter of small moment in these times; yet he referred the homage thereof to the crowne of France, which homage the kings of France successiuely enioyed, vntil the taking of Frances, first of that name, who quitted the soue-raignty thereof to Charles the first, and Em-perour. At this day it is a goodly & wealthy countrey, populous; hauing great store of faire Cities and Towns, and greatly mer-chandized in regard of the sea, and diuers faire riuers which adorne the Prouince.
But let vs now see, if Gentlemen haue slood free from this disaster, more then Emperours and Kings haue done; it shall not be amisse therefore to alledge some,
as well of Italy, as of France.

In Verona, a famous City of Italy, liued a yong Gentlewoman, named Iulietta, of the noble house of the Montesches, or Montacutes. Her father being not willing that she should marry, when both the decency of time, and aptnesse of her yeares made tender of themselves: therefore (in her fairest flower) hee espoused her selfe, vknown to her parents, to a gentlemen son of another house and family, cald, the Capelets, whose name was Romeo, and the Capelets were mortal enemies vnto the Montesches or Montacutes. This marriage forced vnto the lamentable death of both the louers, as you shall briefly hear in this manner. They being secretly married, and by the hand of a Cordelier or Franciscan Friar, a man most expert in the secrets of nature, who rooke great compassion on their earnest reciprocal affection & dayly torments between them indured: it happened on a certain day, that an vnkle to Ju-lietta, in regard of the inuetered hatred between both the families, drew vpon Romeo, who (defending his owne body) slew

the said vnkle, whereupon he was banished, or enforced (at the least) to be absent from Verona. The wofull Gentlewoman hauing made her moane vnto the honest minded Friar, vnder the shaddow of confession, concerning the irksome absence of her best esteemed friend; he gaue her advice to receiue a little potion when shee went to bed, which should cause her to sleep for more then 30. houres, so that she should be verily supposed to be dead. She boldly aduentured on his counsell, & her parents imagining her to be dead indeed caused her to be buried in the Tombe or vault belonging to the house of her predecessors. From thence the Friar purposed to fetch her, at a certaine houre of the night, & to conduct her (in the habit of a Nouice) to banished Romeo, who liued in the land of another iurisdiction, yet no far distance from the city. All this was possible & easy to be performed, for it was and is a common custome there, not to burie deceased bodies in graues, as it is obserued among vs, but in Grottes or vaulted caues. Vvile these things were framing themselves according to premeditated purpose; it fortuned that a seruant belonging to Romeo came to Verona, to bring Letters of recommendation to Iulietta, & being returned back to his master, reported the certaine tidings of her death, and that himselfe was present at her interring.
Romeo, confounded with greefe & extremity of passions, found the meanes (in a disguised habit) before the shutting vp of Verona gates, to enter the city. In the dead time of night also hee compassed his intent, entering the Church with a lighted Torch in his hand, hauing opened the doores by the help of his seruant, and also the tombe wherein she lay inclosed. Hauing commanded the absence of his seruant, he entred into the vault, & after kisses infinitely bestowed by him on Iulietta, whom he verily conceited to be dead, he dranke a most deadly poyson, which hee

had formerly bought of a very needie Apothecary, and which immediately fel to operation, so slept hee (for euer) by the body of Iulietta. After her drinke hadde wrought his full power, she awaked; and by meanes of the burning Torch perceiued her Romeo to bee quite dead; wher-enraged with greefe, and snatching a pon-yard that hung at his girdle, she presently there slewe her selfe. The honest Friar came, and (as he thought) at such a conuenient houre, when Iulietta should awake from her artificial sleepe, that truly represented the shape of death: but when he beheld that tragick wofull spectacle, let his sorrow be censured by them of best iudgement. On the morrow after, the death of these two Louers was discouered, and all matters rehearsed by Fryar
Lawrence, for so was the Cordelier nam'd,
All which mournfull disaster happened,
because Iulietta's father would not suffer her to marry when reason required. Now
I will declare another French Historie, which happened within the compass of mine owne memory.

nary in the Court of King Frances the 2.
espoused her selfe by word only, & without knowledge of any in his fathers house, to one that was Schoolemaster vnto her brethren, named Medard, a Piccard by nation, borne in Laon, a yong man of passable handfomnes, and of indifferent knowledge for his time, being about 23. yeares
old. She found her selfe to be conceiued with child, and fearing the displeasure of her mother more then the frowns of her father, because she was a very suere woman, forsooke her Fathers house, and the goodly city of Paris, accompanied with none but her troth-plighted husband and the schoolemaster. Trauailing thorow the countrey, they made their stay in a great Borough town of Champaign, where likewise he became schoolemaster, taking great paines to supply their necessities. Within som few months after their residing ther, Medard dyed, and the fise dayes after the death of her husband, one Euening after supper, in a publike place, declared to all such as gaue fauour to hear her, the whol

done by her to her seruants, desiring (very heartily) pardon both of God and this. So, feigning as if she intended to goe to bed with her young infant, which was about six weekes old; she went and hanged her selfe that night, on a beame end of a poore Cottage, which they had taken vpon hire, of which mishap, the people of the Towne soon aduertised her parents. For mine owne part, in the same manner as I haue set it downe, it was reported to me by the forenamed Monsieur Megrelin, who made no small account of my friendship, and dyed with verie great griefe; often saying vnto many, that this misfortune thus fell vnto him, by refusing his daughters marriage with a yong Adocate, one of sufficient wealth, and that had requested her many times to bee his wife, which still hee denied, intending to bestow her on a Gentleman.

In the City of Rome, no long while since, there was a young maiden (named Lucrecia, daughter to a rich Marchant) secretly elpoused to a yong man, called Paulo, sonne also to another Merchant, the two fathers beeing vowed enemies, and both alike enuious of each others Fortune. The father of Paulo perceiuing how fast aged yeares came stealing on him, determined a marriage for his son, acquainting him therewith, that he hadde made choise of one meete for him, commanding him also to fashion himself to good liking thereof, because hee would haue it accomplished within very few dayes. The sonne deferred it off so long as vwell hee could; yet to declare some obedience to his father, hee craued respite to consider thereof; but in the mean while, it was generally noised thorow the City of Rome, that Paulo must be married vnto another. These newes coming vnto the eares of Lucrecia, she dissembled her inward conceyded displeasure, verily imagining the matter to bee already done. Paulo coming, as oftentimes hee did when his time favoured him, to visit his Lucrecia in the night time, so iocund and merry as at no time more; after accustomed kindnesse passed betwene them, Paulo fell into a very sound sleep. Lucrecia beholding him in that fearless state, with a great knife she gaue him so many stabbes and deepe wounds, both in the brest and belly; that he fell downe stark dead, and afterward committed the like violence on her selfe. This act, so full of sorrow and sadde mischance, came to the eare of Pope Paulus the fourth, who would not allow them to haue Christian burial. But a learned diuine, a Jacobine by Religion, made fo excellent an Oration to the Pope, agaynst the unkinde parents of the deceased Lovers; that Obsequies were granted, & buriall giuen them. And an aged woman, a seruant to Lucrecia, who had beene the meane of their priuate marriage, was (by authority of Iustice) burned alive, because she had not aduertised the parents thereof.

If these Emperors, Kings, Gentlemen and those of meaner condition, had obserued the Law of the Rhodians, which I haue alledged in the beginning of this chapter; they neuer had fallen into those dreadfull mischeeses, which they owne wilfull folly brought vpon them. They may also serue as a good warning to Fathers at this instant, and such as shall bee hereafter, how to auoyde so enorme an error. I will giue aduice likewise to such Maidens, as hauing past the age of five and twenty yeares, if either auarice, or any other bad humor in their parents doe make them negligent of their marriages, when men of meet match and quality are offered to them, to be bold of their owne liking and choise in marriage; provided, that they first make it knowne vnto their parents. And then if they will not yeeld consent, they may proceed on further: alwayes provided, that they are equall in quality, and no way infamous. And least their Fathers should disinherite them, the Emperor ordained thus in the authenticall rule; Sed si post. C. de inofficiosa testa. The like ordinance is to be found in the French Code, in the chapter of clâdestine Marriages, made by king Henry the second. And there may be noted another inconuenience, which vnadvised fathers do incur themselves, that in due time, and vpon iust reason, will not yeelde to their daughters marriages.

Tyrants at all times and in all places are full of feares.

Tyranny is the Nurse of feares.

The History of Dyonisius
the Tyrant, & his flatterer
Damocles.

CHAP. V.

That Tyrants doe liue continually in feares:
and that their ends are most miserable.

THE life of a Tyrant is full of hatred; euery man detesteth him; all are offended at him, and he is subiect to infinite perils. What was the life of Aristippus, to whom the very walles were dreadfull? VVhat that of Alexander Phareus, who liued in an hourly suspicion of his owne wife? What that of Dyonisius the Syracusane, who neuer durst trust his Barber, for feare least in trimming his beard, hee should cutte his throat. Hee had the carnall knowledge but of two women onely. Aristomada and Dorida, and yet he would neuer let them come neere him, vntill they had put off all their garments. The Chamber wherein hee vided to sleepe, was round engirt with a wide deepe ditch, and there was no entrance to it, but onely by a draw-bridge.

All things whatsoever, are continually suspected so much by Tyrants, that it was not spoken without good aduice; That Tyranny is the Nurse of feare. For it commonly cometh so to passe, that such as liue till men feare them, doe also feare them by whom they are feared. This kinde of life, so full of care and dread, Dyonisius the Tyrant discouered to his Orator Damocles, of whom the History followeth in this manner.

Damocles defending in an Oration, which hee deliuered in the presence of king Dyonisius; that neuer was any man more happy then he, for his innumerable wealth & treasures, beside the abundance of all things in his kingdom. O Damocles (instantly said the Tyrant) seeing my life is so well liked by thee, I desire that thou wouldest presently but taste and experiment my fortune. Whereunto Damocles consenting, the Syracusane king caused him to sitte vpon a stately & sumptuous bed, richly embroidered with gold: and before him stood Tables and Stooles in magnificent manner, all couered with vessels of Gold and Silver. He was serued by many young children, endued with singular beauty, &

the seruice was extraordinarily magnificent, with all kindes of delicious and exquisite viands. The golden Hall, which glistered round about him, was perfumed with vnguents of excellent odors, beside Flowers, Chapplets, and curious Nosegayes. To be short, in this so triumphant and royall furnishment, Damocles helde such a proud, enflated, and swolne vp countenance, euen as if in Maiesty Royall: King Dyonisius called to him, and bad him lift vp his head, to behold what was instantly ouer it. There he shewed him a fayre bright Sword, which he had caused to be fastened to the plancher, directly ouer the head of Damocles. Hee seeing the naked Sword, which hung but by one haire of a horses mane, ready to fall on the least occasion; considering thereon with deliberation, and perceiving that death was his present companion; he began to dispraise the royalty and riches of the King, desiring to bee deliuered from that kinde of felicity.

Heereupon Dyonisius said vnto him, Doe'st thou not see, O Damocles, how greatly thou art decieued in thine owne opinion? Such is our life, which (not long since) thou heldest to be so happy: but now thou plainly perceiuest, that eminent death is alwayes attending. By which example we may easily iudge, that he can neuer be happy, that is daily afflicted with feare. To this purpose Horace writ these verses.

Not the fine fare of Sicily,
Will saueour sweet and daintily,
Nor the rare sound of the Lyre,
Nor the sweet Birdes in their quire:
All these afford no pleasure can,
To that wofull wretched man,
That beholds aboue his head,
A naked Sword to strike him dead.

And as Iob saith, The sound of feare and dreadful affrights is alwayes in his eares: and although peace be certaine, yet is hee daily doubtfull of close ambushes. Tyrants loue not any body, and therefore (vpon iust occasion) learned men rearmeth them to be cruell beasts, and plagues to mankind. In the human figure of who is so much savage cruelty, that Salomon saide directly; A wicked Prince is a roaring Lyon, and an hunger-starued Beare ouer poore people.

And yet God hath and sometimes doth permit, that Tyrants shall reigne, for the chastifement of wicked men, saying, I will take vengeance on mine enemies by mine enemies. God (saith Iob) maketh the hypocriticall man to reigne in regard of the peoples finnes. And in Hosea God speaketh thus: I will giue thee a king in my fury. And in Esay, Asbur is the rod and staffe of my fury, I will send thee a deceitfull people. Neuertheless, they are not acceptable to God, who throws them at length into the fire, as a father doth the rod, when he hath there-with beaten his childe. And it hath alwaies to faile out, that all these Tyrants, or the most part of the, haue ended their liues miserably, & oftentimes by violent death, caused by their owne friends; and approoued by consent of all the people. But because the examples of tragicall endes in such Tyrants, are handled in a number of other Treatises, & experience hath made it daily manifest vnto vs; I may the sooner conclude this Chapter.

Miserable & violent deaths of Tyrants.

CHAP. VI.

A most horrible cruelty vsed by the Numantines against the Romanes; and in the end vpon themselves.

Scipio having continued sledge before the City of Numantia in Spaine, the space of a yeare and seven Moneths, and neuer ceassing: munition and victuals began to faile among the besiedged, so that very many died with famine. Whereupon they made a vow to the Gods, that the first morfell they would eate every day, should be the flesh of some Roman: and that they would drinke neyther wine nor water, till they had swallowed the blood of such as they slew.

Extremities are the occasion of desperate vowes: & promises.

The Numantines having all sworn to this vow, they issued forth of the City, and like men, more then desperate, chased the Romanes, euen as if they had bene brute beasts: and such as they flew or surprized, immediately they killed and broyled inhumanely, or being sliced in peeces, they sold the by weight in the Shambles or Butchery. So that a Roman taken by them, or slaine, was of farre greater price and estimation, then to liue and pay his ranfome. Finally, the Numantines perceiving, that they had no more means of suppartation, being oppressed with famine, and enclosed on euery side: they consulted among themselves to kill all their aged people; yea, all the women & children in the City; which (without any feare or respect at all) they put in execution.

When they had done thus, all the wealth and moueables of the City, the Jewels & Treasures of the Temples, were brought together in spacious places, & there consumed with fire, yea, and all parts & quarters of the City, without leauing a house standing, suffered the very same consummation; and euery man tooke a sudden & speedily dispatching poison, whereby they might the soonest dye. Thus the Temples, houses, goods, and persons of the Numantines, which had continued in prosperity foure hundred, sixty & six yeares, had finally conclusion all in one day. A sight most horrible it was to behold, that the Numantines did those things liuing, so full of gastly terror, and not be remooued from them at their houre of death. For they left not to Scipio, any goods as booty or pillage, nor so much as a man liuing, for a Trophee or Triumph.

Scipio seeing Numantia flaming, and afterward entring thereinto, beheld all the buildings demolished, and turned one vpon another, all the Inhabitants burned; he grieved very greatly, and being vnble to containe himselfe from teares, cryed out thus: O most happy Numantia, to whom the Gods appointed, that thou shouldst rather remaine destroyed, then conquered! Numa Pompilius king of the Romanes, caused this City of Numantia to be builded, & Scipio the Roman, being aged then but two and twenty yeares, saw the ruine of it.

The propriety of 466 yeares consumed all in one day.

The words of Scipio on ruined Numantia.

CHAP. VII.

That a valiant Generall or Captaine, ought first to embrace wisdom & prouidence, before he do make experiment of his fortune: and also that after victory he should be milde and pitifull.

To be a Captain or Generall, is an Office very honorable, but yet attended by

The dangerous Office of a Captaine or Generall.

by many dangers. For notwithstanding he shall performe but what hee may and ought, yet if misfortune be present in giuing the battaile, and returne him off with our victory; hee shall neuer satisfie the vulgar, but the people will hold him in bad reputation, although it value his life in the aduenture. Let euery man bee of what quality and wisedome hee may, or would wish to be, & vse the best carriage he can possibly denie; yet we shall neuer heare a conquered Captaine called wise, or him temerarious, that gets the victory. It is a good thing that Captaines should be wise, but yet much better to be fortunate.

The saying of Scipio Africanus.

Cicero said.

A great difference in mens natures.

Scipio Africanus vsed to say; That all things ought to bee essayed in warre, before they lay any hand to weapons. And (in truth) he saide well, because there is no greater victory in the world, then that which is wonne without effusion of blood. Cicero writing to Attica, saith; That the Captaine which conquers his enemies by counsell, ought to be no lesse esteemed, then hee that did it by the sword. Silla, Tiberius, Caligula, and Nero, they neuer knew any other course, but to command, and kill: whereas contrariwise, Augustus, Titus, and Traiane knew no better way, then to entreate fairly and pardon, so that by pardoning, they conquered more, then the other could do by bloody fighting. If Captaines would but consider these things, perhaps they would not be so ready, in opposing their Armies to such multiplicity of dangers: whence oftentimes ensueth, that in thinking to be reuenged on their enemies, they (in the ende) become vanquished themselves.

A noble mind in the Emperour Theodosius.

Theodosius the Emperour, when hee besiedged any City, he would not suffer his Souldiers to erect any scaling Engines, or make any battery, vntill ten daies were fully past: during which time, hee offered no offence to the Citzizens, but daily admonished them, saying, I grant ye the terme of ten daies, wherein ye may preuaile with mee by fauour and mildeesse, rather then hazard the trial of my power. When great Alexander saw the dead body of Darius: Julius Caesar the head of Pöpey; when Maecellus burned Syracusa, and Scipio beheld Numantia flaming; and in our later times, when that heroycall Emanuel Philiberts, Duke of Sauoye, & Prince of Piedmont, beheld the illustrious & magnanimous Prince, Frances of Bourbon, Duke of Anguien, lying dead vpon the ground at the taking of S. Quintin: All these great persons could not refrain from teares, although the other were their deadly enemies. For albeit their generous soules were well satisfied with obeyning victory, yet notwithstanding, such great and weighty losses did much discontent them, considering their cases might haue bene the like.

Pitty and clemency neuer lost the victory in warre; but on the contrary, the Captaine bloodily minded, cruell, and reuendgefull, hath eyther bene slaine by the enemy, or betrayed by his owne followers. Therefore it was not without great reason, that Julius Caesar carried immortal renowne among all Princes and Captaines of the world, not for being more faire, more strong, more courageous, and fortunate; but only because far greater was the number of enemies, to whom he frankly afforded pardon, then those that hee had vanquished and slew with the sword. The famous Captaine Narsetes, who subdued the Goths, vanquished the Bastrians, and dominated over the Allemaignes, neuer vnderooke a daies fight against an enemy, but the night before, hee kneeled and wept to himselfe in the Temple. Trogus Pompeius recordeth, that the most signale victories of the Romanes, were not wonne in regard that their Armies were mighty and strong; but because their Captaines were dexterious, active, and gallant, in all seruices they vnderooke.

It is expedient also, that the Generall or Captaine (about all other things) should be vigilant; & procure, that among the Captaines of his Army affaires (concerning warre) should be kept secret: because the highest enterprizes neuer can haue good successe, when they are discovered before they can be effected. Suetonius declareth, that it was neuer heard said to Julius Caesar; Must wee do this to day, or shall we do that to morrow? Only he would answer; Doe this instantly, & to morrow wee shall see what it then to bee done. Plutarch writeth in his Morales, that Lucius Metellus being requested by one of his Captaines, to know on what day he would giue the battaile, made him this

A signe of a most honorable disposition in such Generall.

And especial care is to be taken, that no consultation be had with such men, as are either obstinate in their counsels, or rash and headstrong in their actions: for in cases which happen sometime in war, it is lesse harme to retire, then run wilfully on losse.

te to be obser-
ued.

Alcibiades, a valiant Captaine among the Grecians, yfed to say: Men of magnanimity and courage, should sometimes rather flye then tarry; because honour commands attendance, and wisdom wil flight. For in greatest perils, it is better that men should submit themselves to reason; then that they should be commanded by fortune. A Captaine ought to be counselled in all things, except when he meetes with a danger not foreseene. For many Capitaines at diuers times in warre, haue lost themselves by no other occasion: but because at such time as they should haue brought to effect some notable deed, which admitted not the least minutes trifling, they stood then musing, & idely called a counsell to no purpose. It is necessary also, that a wife Captaine, after he hath obtained a victory, should vnderstand how to vfe and enioy it. For if Hanniball, on the day at Cannas, could haue told how to haue vfed his fortune, Scipio the Affricaine had neuer conquered him.

Of the Salique Law the originall thereof, and who were the first Authors and Inuentors of it.

See a Tract
written by John Perard,
and L.C. thereon.

IN the time of Pope Boniface, the first of that name, and of the Emperor Honorius, in An. 420. the *Francia*ns hauing forsaken their Country, came to inhabit along the River of Rhene, which hauing passed, they remained for some time at Treues. Now as these people were of barbarous inanners, liuing vnciuilly & without law; Pharamond their first king, Son vnto their Duke Marcomir, chose foure cheefe and principal men of the Scambrians, who by their counsell and determination, might giue a law to the people: The names of those fourmen, were Vencast, Loxodast, Salgaft, and Vissgaft, who by authority of the king and people; set downe a Law in writing, which Pharamond approued and published, causing it to be called Salique; eyther by the name of the place Salaham, where it was made, as some say, or else by the name of the said Salgaft, who was Chawncellor to Pharamond, and cheefe of the foure.

This Law contained the forme of succeeding in the kingdome of France, & the manner of reigning; and it hath ever since bin obserued by the kings of France, and their people vntill this present. Among other articles therein contained, women are declared vnable to rule the kingdome, and deprived of succession to the crowne, although they are the sole & only daughters to the Kings: nor can they haue any portion of inheritance in the Gallician Lands, but onely vse and profites by the owners consent, implying necessarily, that after their deaths, those allowances returne to the Crowne againe. And this Law is conformable to the Roman Law, vnto Voconia, which was made at the time betwene the second & last war of the Romans with the Carthaginians, and which was pronounced by Voconius, Tribune of the people. And Aulus Gellius saith, that there is nothing more profitable to the common wealth, then the said Law, which deboueth women from successions, which Tit. Lilius saith, Marius Cato (a grame man) perswaded in an Oration made by him.

And although it may be said concerning this Law, that it containeth no equity, because it toucheth the succession of priuate persons: yet on the behalfe of the kingdome, for which it was ordayned, it is iust and reasonable, and by disposition of womens right, they ought not there to succeed in the kingdome, nor rights of the crowne, except there be some priuiledge or custome to the contrary. So noteth John de Imola, on the Chapter Grande, de simpliciter neglegen prela to the sixth. And for this was made the tenth chapter, *Qui secunda possit hoc autem. Baldus is of the same opinion, speaking expressly concerning the kingdome of France, and saying, that the king of England, Sonne to one of the daughters of France, in regard of this law, might not pretend any right to the Crowne, and saith, it is cleare and certaine, as hee quoteth on the first law ff. de Sena. And as I haue formerly saide, it hath euermore bin so obserued and held in France.

For example, when Lewes Hutin deceased, he left one daughter, wife to the Count d'Euveux: Philip le long, his Brother, succeeded him, (neuerthelesse) as well in the Crowne, as in all the Landes thereto belonging. And after the death of Philip le long, although hee left foure daughters; yet Charles le Bel (his brother) succeeded him, as well in the Crowne, as other inheritances. And after the decease of Charles le Bel, notwithstanding hee left one daughter, named Blanche, wife to Philip, Duke of Orleance, his cousin: yet Philip de Valois succeeded him. In like manner, after the death of king Charles the eight, Lewes Duke of Orleance, his cousin succeeded him, before Madame Anne of France, his Sister, wife vnto the Duke of Bourbon, and this was king Lewes the 12. who although (by his decease) he left two daughters, Claude and Renee; yet neuerthelesse, Frances Duke of Valois and of Angouleme, the very neereest in the line collateral and masculine, succeeded him as well in the Crowne, as also in the Duke-dome of Orleance, albeit the said Lewes the twelfth, Charles his Father, and Lewes Duke of Orleance his Grandfather, had held the Duke-dome of Orleance, by the gift and inheritance which Charles the 5. had made to the said Lewes, Duke of Orleance his Sonne.

Concerning
such lands as are once vn-ited and incorporated to the Crowne
of France.

For right and iustice requireth, that all Lands which are once vnited and incorporated to the Crowne of France, shall be of the proper nature, quality and condition as the same Crowne is; as well in regard of successions and acquisitions, as other causes. For at all times, and as often as a Land is vnited to the Crowne, it taketh the nature of the kingdome, and must be governed in all things, according to the conditions thereof. For the kingdome is an vniuersall thing, which comprehendeth many other in particular: as it is said in the Law Peculium ff. de Lega ij.

And not onely the Salique Law is kept in France, but also it is found in many statutes in Italy, and elsewhere, prohibiting women to succeed, which is done, saith the Text of the Law. Faybre agnationis conseruanda, ut dignitas familiarum aliqua sit. And Baldus saith, that a woman is not the head or Prince of the Family, but the ende thereof.

Paulus de Castro, on the Law Maritus, C. de procur. saith, that the lineage and family beginneth in the males, and is continued by the males. And so it seemeth, that the Etimologie of the word Soror declareth, which Labeo Antistius giueth in Aulus Gellius. Soror appellata est quod quasi sorsum nascitur separaturque ab ea domo in qua nata est. Et in aliam familiam transferatur. That is to say. A sister is so called, as shee that is borne almost apart by herselfe, and is separated from the house wherein shee was borne, and changing the place, goeth to dwell in another family.

HArpagus writing to Cyrus, concerning the treason of King Astages, hauing cunningly vnbowelled a Hare, put his Letter therein, and after hee had ingeniously sowed it vp againe, deliuered it (with the Hayes or Nets) to one of his Huntsmen, the faithfullest of all his household, and hee carried it to king Cyrus.

Hyllanus, desirous to write to Aristagoras, did shau the head of one that was his trustiest seruant, and wrote vpon the skull-skinne what hee would, containing three or foure Characters, and afterward kept him in his house, vntill the haire was growne ouer as thicke as before, and then he sent him to Aristagoras, willing that he should cause him to be shauen againe, so soone as he was come vnto him, and so he vnderstood the others minde.

Cæsar sometimes sent him Missiues, when he had any vrgent occasion, and to some peculiar places: and in them were letters formed onely, without any sillables annexed to them. So that when they were lookt on and questioned, no word could be collected to any purpose, but by himselfe, and him to whom they were intended, being a mute and secret inuention, yet familiar to such as vnderstood them.

Many (saith Frontinus) being desirous in actions of warre, to send their letters missiue secretly, so haue their inuentions known, and yet to auoide all meanes of discovery, haue written within the Scabbards of their Swords, and sent them as acceptable presents, whereby they haue cleanly escaped.

Demetrius desiring to make knowne to the Lacedemonians, how king Xerxes was armed and prepared for his journey against Greece; did write the counsell of the king in small Tablets of wood, which he couered ouer with waxe, and in that manner sent them to the Lacedemonians, who taking off the waxe, read all the contents there written.

Hirtius the Confull sent letters written vpon Lead (but not knowne how to be read, being intercepted) to Marke Anthony, besieged at Madena; they were carried by an honest Soldiour, who wore them as bracelets about his wrists, & with them swam ouer the River Scutena. The same Hirtius likewise tyed letters about the necks of certaine Doues, which hee kept close lockt vp in a conuenient place, where no light was to bee setie, neither did hee giue them any food; that when he should let them loose neere to the walles of the City (as easily he could doe) they being greedy of light and food, might mount aloft vpon the houises, where being taken by Brutus, and by the meanes of food, purposely appointed there for the, he vnderstood what he desired.

Paradise, in his history of our times, writeth, that when as Rhodes was besieged by the Turke, a traytour named Friar Andrew de Merall, a knight of Portugall, making a shew of carefull looking to the Watch; shot a letter (bound about an Arrow) into the enemies Campe, whereby he gaue them aduertisement, in what estate the City stood.

Frontinus hath many other examples of secret Letters, in matters of loue, of which I will relate two onely, remembred by Aeneas Sylvius Picholini Pope Pius the second. Pachorus a young man (saith he) sent a loue-letter in a Nefegay of Violets to Lucretia, whom hee dearly affected. And finding no successe, wrapt another in a peller of waxe, which he couered as a snow-ball, and so threw it in at his Mistresses Window.

CHAP. X.

A Discourse concerning the originall of the Normanes, what valiant actes haue bin performed by them: and of Robert Guiscard.

THE Normanes are anciently descended of the Gothes, and vsurped that great half-Iland; sometimes called Dacia, and since Dacia: whereby the kings of that Prouince, were named kings of the Danes, and of the Gothes. They had a custome, that the kingdome came to the eldest Sonne, and therefore sent the other Sonnes to seeke their fortune. It came so to passe, that Lutrocu their king (who was not a Christian) hauing two Sonnes; according to the precedent custome, sent the youngest named Bieregottus out of the kingdome, albeit hee loued him very dearly, and therefore committed the care of him to a Gentleman of his Court, named Allengus, to whom he gaue in charge, that he should furnish him with a troupe of valiant men.

An indifferent Army being giuen him, they came vpon the confines of France, and entring Picardy, possessed themselves of most of the Townes and Bourroughs, burnt Saint Quintins and Noyon, and for the space of forty yeares, did infinite harmes to the Realme of France. For after that Bieregottus was dead, they elected (as their cheefe Commander & Capitaine) a very valiant and gallant Knight, called Rollo, who made three Campes, which entered France on three seuerall sides: the one mounted vp the Riuer of Seyne, the other along the Riuer of Loyre, and the third by the Riuer of Gerunda, sometime called Garona at Bourdeaux, and so scattered themselves throughout France, rauaging and burning wherefoeuer they came. Which being perceived by Charles the third of that name, and called the finishing of France, and knowing also, that he had no meanes to resist them; he treated a peace betweene Rollo and him, by the Arch-Bishop of Roane, named Francoys, which was concluded neere to the Riuer of Epte, the King being on the one side of the Riuer, and Rollo on the other. Therein was an appointment made, that Charles should giue his Daughter, named Giletta, in marriage to Rollo, to whom he assigned as her Dowry, and an inheritance for the children borne in this marriage, and not otherwise, the Prouince of *Neustria, which Rollo caused afterward to be called Normannia, which signifieth a Northern people. For Nort (in the Dacian tongue) is as much to say as North, and man implieth Homo, so interpreted of it selfe, from whence, by a corrupt kinde of speech afterward, it was called Normandie.

The king created that Country to be a Dukedome, and gaue his Daughter in marriage to the said Rollo, as formerly it was concluded, yet with this condition, that Rollo should become a Christian: whereto hee condescending, he was baptized in the yeare 900 and 12. & by Francoys, Arch-Bishop of Roane, being then named Robert, by Robert, Count of Poitiers, who was Godfather to him at the Font. And by the example of Rollo, all the Normans that were Pagans, caused themselves to be baptized, which caused Duke Robert to do homage to king Charles, for the Country of Neustria, then conuerted to be Normandy.

Historians doe report a pleasant and ridiculous acte, which Rollo did on the day when hee came to performe his homage to the king, for some aduised him to kisse the feete of his Maiesty, according to a custome in that case obserued. But hee disdainyng to fall on his knees, tooke the kings foot, lifting it vp to reach his mouth, and so ouer-high, that the king fell backward from off his seate. VVherat the Normanes fell into a great laughter; but the French were offended and vexed, taking this behaviour in very ill manner. Neuertheless, this deed was imputed to simplicity, because Rollo, in making his excuse, auouched, that such kinde of kissing the soore, had bene an ancient custome in his Country. About a yeare after, Rollo seeing himselfe peaceably possessed of all Normandy, repudiated his wife Giletta, & put her to a pittifull kinde of death, not hauing any child by her in which respect as well by right of forfeiture, as by other conditions contracted in the marriage, without all question, the Country and Dukedome should haue returned to the Crowne of France again, as at the first.

Long time before Rollo became a Christian, hee had carnall knowledge of the Daughter to Berengarius, Earle of Beauuais, the being named Pompeia, by whom hee had a Sonne called William, that afterward was tearmed Long-Sword. Hee being borne in vnlawfull and fuisall copulation, out of marriage, and the acte committed by a Christian with a Pagan, was consequently disabled from succeeding in the Dukedome. But howfoeuer it came to passe, the Normanes finding themselves so strong and dreadfull; possessed this William of the Dukedome, and the kings of France were enforced (by reason of hauing so slender meanes in those times) to endure and suffer all. So that the Successors of Rollo or Robert, enioyed still that Country, though by corruption of faith, and no true tytle thereunto.

Of this William came Richard, surnamed Long-shankes; and of that Richard a second Richard; and of this second Richard a third Richard; who was Father to Robert, that was Father to William the Bastard, which conquered England. Wherby it very plainly appeareth, that of the fore-named Rollo or Robert, the Dukes of Normandy, and three Kings of England receiued originall.

Now concerning Richard, the Sonne to William, Sonne to Rollo or Robert, hee had two Sonnes, the one named Robert, and the other Richard also, who being desirous of glory and fame, went into Sicily with great troopes of men, and there they made war successfully many yeares together. These two brethren being dead, the Normanes being then in pay to the Duke of Salerne; made choise of a new cheefe Commander or Capitaine named Tristram Gistello, who hauing slaine a Serpent, and being in-fectured with her poyson, dyed thereof. After him succeeded Raymond, and some other (afterward) elected for their Capitaine, William Ferrabach, Sonne to Tancred, Conte de haute uille, who had twelve Sonnes, to wit, Sarno, Godfrey, Dragon, Tancred, William, called Ferrabach, that is to say, Arme Strong, Hausfrey, Robert, surnamed Guiscardo, Roger, Piccard, Godfrey the second, or younger, Frumentino, and Malogor.

Tancred with his twelve Sonnes, continued among the Normanes in the exercise of Armes, and Michael Catalaicus, Emperour of Constantinople, held then by usurpation Ponilla and Calabria, vnder the government of Malocco, one of his Captaines, and Lieutenant for him in those Countries. Some other places also were invaded by the Sarrazines, who possessed Sicily, continually molesting the said kingdom. The valiant and generous William, being created Capitaine of the Normanes, made a league with the Princes of Capua and Salerno, and also with Malocco, Lieutenant to the Emperour. All these passed together (with their Armies) into Sicily against the Sarrazines, and hauing vanquished and expelled them thence, diuided the prize equally among them. But Malocco surrendered the lands of that Isle to those Governors which the Emperour had lent thither before the warre. Whereat William being offended, yet dissembling his anger and intentions, marched with his Army towards Ponilla, where hee possessed himselfe of many places, and entering Melpher, there strongly fortified himselfe.

Melpher surprized by William.

When Malocco heard these newes, he departed from Sicily, and suddenly went with his Army to Melpher; but William being come forth of the Towne, gaue such a valiant assault vpon Malocco, that killing the better part of his followers, & chasing him from the greatest iurisdiction of Ponilla; hee fully enjoyed it, and made himselfe Earle thereof. After the death of William, Dragon his Brother obtained the Seignury of Ponilla, and being a man of great valency, as also very well experienced in Arms, fought three times in one day against the Grecians, and ouercame them, encreasing his Countries daily more and more.

About seven yeares after, Dragon died, and Hausfrey or Hunfrey his Brother succeeded; and after him, Godfrey, who left Galagard his Sonne successor in the Earldome. But Robert being a most valiant young man, displeased that his Brother Godfrey had not left the place to him after his death; expelled his Nephew by force of Armes, and so held the Counties of Paulla and Calabria; annexing also Troy thereto, which (till that time) had continued subiect to the Romanes. This is that Robert, who for his excellent spirit & witty prouidence, was surnamed Guiscardo, which in the Norman Language, signifieth ingenious and cunning; although some others say, that such a surname signifieth errant and wandering, because the Normanes went wandering thorough many Countries. Afterward in the time of Pope Nicholas, second of that name, hee was created the first Duke of Calabria, & of Ponilla, in the yeare one thousand and sixty.

In the ende, Robert hauing by his prowesse, and with his Brethrens helpe, wonne (in eightene yeares) the whole Isle of Sicily, and many other Regions in Italy; sought moreover to make himselfe Emperour of Constantinople, for which he leuied a mighty Army, and fought with the Venetian and Imperiall Armies twice, and vanquished them. But being retired to Cassopolis, a Promontory in the Isle of Corfue, and there surprized with a most violent Feauer, hee finished his dayes in that place, in the Moneth of Iuly, in the yeare one thousand, eighty two, hauing liued gloriously (and won many victories) for the space of threescore yeares.

This most noble Family of the Normane Guiscardoes, had a lamentable ending, in the yeare one thousand, one hundred, ninety five, in William, whom the Emperour Henry the sixt caused to be executed; to the ende hee should haue no ability of producing any more issue by him. And moreover, he made him to lose the fight of his eyes, by Basons extremely heated, which hee constrained him to looke vpon so long, vntill the reuerberation of the heat, had vtterly deprived him of sight. This impiety, and more then barbarous cruelty, did the Emperour vnto him; because none of that race (afterward) should hinder his enjoying the kingdom of Sicily.

CHAP. XI.

Of two young youtnes of Paris, that translated to the Indies, to cure themselves of the Neapolitane disease, or French Pox.

Anthony du Verdier, Lord of Vauprinax; in his Booke of diuers Readings; hath well described the original of the Neapolitane disease, otherwise called the great pox, & how it was brought from the Countries of the new found world, discovered first by Columbus, in those Islands which the Indians call Haity, and Quisqueia. And as this disease is very familiar in those lands; so is the remedy thereof also found there, by the means of a wood, called Guyaich, whereof there are diuers Forests, and by the vse thereof it is easily healed. Many people in these parts, who haue read the fore-named Chapter, haue highly contrariet: especially such as haue had, and yet at this present, do finde no ease thereby, albeit they haue drunk euery morning and euening of that decoction, hauing afterward soundly sweated twice a yeare, in those two temperate seasons, the Spring time, and fall of the leafe, nay moreover, haue drunke no other drinke (with their meate, and without) for a whole yeare together.

For mine owne part, I dare maintaine, that the said Lord of Vauprinax, hath said nothing but the truth, and if the greater part of sicke persons, infected with that disease, haue found no remedy by the wood; the fault is in such as sell it, & haue not well ordered it, nor hauing knowledge what kinde of Guyaich should be vied, nor the place, nor the climate, nor by whom it is brought thence, being ignorantly periwaded, that there is but one kinde thereof onely, against the opinion of some that will meddle with prescriptions, not hauing bin in the country where this wood naturally groweth. Wherefore I purpose, to make good what I write, by a history of two Parisian youths, who were healed by the vse of Guyaich; not such as is brought hither to vs, and how it hapned, I will set downe the whole discourse.

I being at Paris, in the yeare 1563. I had great familiarity with the two youths; being both borne in the City, of good and worthy houses; but I conceale their names, by reason of their infection with that venereal contagion, it beeing most commonly taken by dishonest dealing with leud women, and so by consequent, carrieth shame with it. This sickness they concealed so long as they could, but in the end, it made it selfe to be knowne, by losse of their haire, by red pufles appearing in the fore-head, by aches in the bones, both of their armes, legs, thighes, and shoulders, as also in the former part of their heads, from the beginning of night, till break of day the next morning, with other such like signes, as paine in the throat, being scarcely able to swallow any food. Now, albeit that all these euidences are not scene, in all such persons as are touched with that disease; yet it plainly appeared, that in both these young bodies, all the fore-named testimonies, and many more beside (which I let sleepe in silence) were apparently noted.

In regard of these rehearsed accidents, which were so manifest, the Parents to them both had intelligence, that they were touched with this disease; and yet for more certaine assurance therein, they caused them to be visited by very skilfull Physicians and Chyrurgions, who performed all that which arte could permit, and yet they were not able, neither could they cure them. A second time, other Physicians were called to this business, who applied likewise the vtmost of their knowledge; but all in vaine, and the disease it selfe grew worse and worse, rising into knots and tophies in the foremost part of the head, and in the bones of the armes, thighes, and legs, they procured insupportable nightly paines. For when night drew nere, and all the time while it continued, they cried and complained incessantly, so that the neighbors (on all sides) heard their pittifull lamentations, by means whereof, their bodies became wholly dried vp.

The Physicians alledged, that there was some great extraordinary matter in

When the hope of man is at the weakeſt, Gods helpe is then ſtrongeſt

The Lord of Chantonny heareth one of the young men hourly complaining

the disease. For these two young men came nothing neere to one another in confanguinity, but were of diuers temperatures and complexions. For the one was delicate, soft, merry, whitish, and of tender disposition: but the other was of blackish color, strong, hardy, and many times addicted to penitence. Neither theſe, contrary to the common order of nature, and all the Apomes in the arte of Physicke; their diseases seemed conformable, which neuer hapneth to other persons, offered with the same contagion, because some haue accidents farre different and contrary to other. Hereupon the Physicians referred the cause of this disease (ſympathizing ſo directly, yet in ſuch different bodies) to the venom of some paillardizing women, that had infected them.

But to make ſhort, after these youthes had endured much extremity of paines & anguiſh, as well by Physicians and Chirurgeons, as Empericks that had charge of them: the harme had extended ſo farre in expences, and no meane heart-greeuing of the Parents, al which notwithstanding, they were giuen over as incurable, & because there was no likely-hood of their healths recovery, they daily desired the ſeizure of death. Matters ſtanding in this lamentable estate, God tooke compaſſion on them and their Parents, because they were deuout persons, & gaue almes very liberally to the poore daily, preſenting them remedy in this manner. The Lord of Chantonny, a Gentleman of Burgundy, and of the Franche Comte, was ſent (by the King of Spaine) Ambaſſador to Charles the ninth, King of France, who ordinarily made his reſiding at Paris. This Ambaſſador was lodged directly ouer againſt the houſe to one of the Fathers of the ſicke young men, and both their chambers being outward, on the ſtreets ſide; it cauſed the ſaid Lord Ambaſſador (who was none of the ſleepieſt men) to heare the greuous moanings, which the poore ſickly Neapolitan continually made, whereupon he entreated his Hoſte to inform him, whence proceeded theſe woſull lamentations, thus nightly made by the ſick young man. His Hoſte hauing tolde him nothing but the truth, the Ambaſſador wrought ſo by his Hoſte, that he might come to ſee the ſickly youth; which accordingly he did, in the company of his Mother.

The Lord of Chantonny, well vnderſtanding whence the diſeaſe proceeded, & thoſe nocturnall heauy greeuings, ſaid, that he had ſeen many in diuers Provinces, as in Bourgundy, Germany, Flanders, Italy, & Spaine, afflicted with the ſelfe ſame ſickeſſe; and notwithstanding all curious and carefull attending, yet they could not any way be cured, but onely by going to the Indies. For inſtance hereof, he called for his Secretary, who preſently came thither, and had (as well as his Lord) paſſed the voyage, therefore hee was the better able to confirme his ſpeeches, and related at large, how euery thing happened.

The Mother to the ſicke youth, after ſhe had thanked the Lord Ambaſſador for his aduice, withdrew herſelfe, and acquainted her husband (who was Maſter of the * Chamber of Accounts) with all that the Lord of Chantonny had ſaid vnto her. He being a very learned and wiſe Gentleman, conferred further (concerning this matter) with the Secretary to the ſaid Lord Ambaſſador; whom hee found to be a man of good iudgement, & one that had paſt through the Pikes, as we ſee to learne it.

The Sonne to the Maſter of the Accounts, imparted this matter vnto his ſickly Companion, who aduerted his Mother alſo therof, and ſhe her husband, who was a Merchant trading in ſilkes, and furniſhed the houſe of the Queene, Catherine de Medicis, then Regent in France; and hereupon both the Fathers conferred together. In breefe, they concluded to hazard their Sons in the performance of this voyage, perſwading themſelves, that ſeeing they reputed to be incurable; it might ſo fall out, that changing the ayre of the climate, and by their paſſage vnder the * Equator, vnder which, ſuch as ſayle, doe oftentimes become ſicke, and dye in the voyage, making the Sea their graue, as the moſt part doe, of them that adventure to the Indies, to which fortune they freely committed their Sons. no little diſcontentment and ſhame, beſide the charges attending thereon; they could not determine on any eſtate for them, neyther make mention for their marriage, the reaſon of their ſickeſſe being ſo noyſed quite through the City of Paris. Thus theſe two Fathers reſolved to ſend their Sonnes to the Indies, eyther for their vtter loſſe, or healthfull recovery.

Now becauſe it was not lawfull for any to paſſe thither, without permiſſion from the King of Spaine; Queene Mother, vnderſtanding by her Mercer (Father to one of the ſicke youthes) the purpoſed voyage of his Sonne; wrote vnto her Daughter, then Queene of Spaine, for her aſſiſtance to the poore paſſengers, to ſauour them with Paſſe-ports, and recommendations vnto the Kings Lieutenants in the Indian Countries, to ſuch as were Captaines of the Seas, and other. Being aſſiſted by two men, who had formerly voyaged both by Land and Sea, and peace being accorded with the Proteſtants and Catholiques, they trauielled to Spaine, and there preſented their Letters.

The Queene immediately ſollicited their licence and diſpatch: but firſt they were viſited, to know whether they were Spyes or no. For it was no long time before, that the Spaniards had ſlaine all the French, which were to be found in that part of Breſile, called by the Tononemabours, ſaying, that all the Indians appertained to them, by due right granted to them by the Pope. When they were found to be diſeaſed persons, they were diſcharged, and going on to the Port of Sinilh, fortune was ſo ſauourable to them, that there they found a Fleet of Shippes, ready charged with men of warre & Merchandizes, bound alſo for that part of the Indies, whereto theſe ſicke men intended to go; which was the Iſlands of Haity and of Quifqueia, named by Columbus, Hispaniola, and afterward the Iſle of Saint Dominico.

They went aboard a Merchants Ship, hauing agreed for threeſcore Ducates, both for their paſſage thither, and their returne backe againe. The voyage ſucceeded ſo well, that although it contained aboute righteene hundred leagues by land; yet within two Moneths, they arri-ued there, landing in the Iſle of S. Dominica, where the Vice-Roy lay. To him they preſented their Letters of ſauour and recommendations, who gaue charge to a Gentleman of his Court, to ſee that the young men and their company ſhould be kindly entreated, ſending them vnto Phyſicians, that remained there in the Country at the Kings pay. But they thought it more conuenient for them to paſſe thence to another Iſland, which was called Saint John de Portorico, where the women there dwelling, were very ſkilfull in curing that malady, and when they were come thither, thus it ſucceeded to them,

Fiſt, the Gouverneur of the Iſland, by commaundement giuen him from the Vice-Roy of the Indies, lodged the young men ſo well as hee could in that ſavage Country: which was in a Lodging made with paliſadoes, or a wall of Pales, which being but badly ioyned together, was filled vp with bundles of leaues.

The Rooſe conſiſted of leaues of Trees, ſo were their Beds alſo, and in ſtead of Feathers, they were filled with Cotton: their Sheetes being of plaine Fuſtin, and all their vtensils of wood, or of earth.

Their ordinary feeding was on Cowſteſh ſomewhat tender, of great Serpents roaſted, which ſerued highly to their healing, and alſo on ſtrong Tortuiſes, as great as an indifferent Porket.

Their bread was Biſcuit, and is much better in that Country, then elſewhere; for within the ſpace of foure and twenty houres, it will grow mouldy, and if it be eaten hot, it is indigeſtible. But howſoeuer it were, the Spaniards gaue them courage, not to grieue themſelves, and brought a Muſſian vnto them to delight them, whoſe Inſtrument was made of the bone of a mans thigh. They likewiſe ſent a woman to attend them, that made little or no account of them; but tolde them, ſo ſoone as they were cured, ſhe did aſſure herſelfe, that they would very well content her.

This Woman ſo affrighted our young Parifians, that they could verie willingly there haue dyed, as neuer hoping of any helpe by her means. For ſhe went ſtarke naked, her ſkin being of an Olive-coulour; flat nosed, like to a little dog: her breasts hung dangling downe, like to the dugs of an olde Sow. Her head was shorne close before, but behinde, the hayre hanged so low as her heeles, all frilled, and like to the tayle of some ill-favoured Cow. The nayles of her hands and feete, exceeded halfe a fingers length, and were bowing crooked. She had no haire where nature commonly affordeth, neyther in her arme-pits; and her teeth looked of a hew betwene red & yellow, long, cleare, and wide enough afflone. At each of her eares hung a Stone of violet coulour, the least of them weighing above two ounces: her upper lip was slit in the midle, in the top whereof stood another Stone of grayish coulour, and thence passed her spittle continually. All the other parts of her body were round & fat, and in indifferent fashion, sweete, faire, & affable enough for a savage creature.

This woman prepared a drinke, which she made of the little loppings of a yong Guyaicum tree, having first bruised them betwene her goodly teeth, the afterward she boyled the in an earthen vessell, without any thing to cover it, and contrary to all courtes observed in our Countries. This drinke she caused them every morning to take, each of them to the quantity of a * Paris Chopine, at two or three draughts. Then they must walke a while, exercise Fencing, or some other cheerefull stirring of their bodies; or else trauell to a Mine of gold, which was not far off from the Village, to so wear out the space of two houres. Then returning backe againe to the house, all sweaty, they would change onely their shirts; and going to dinner, they must drinke of no other water, but of a much-troubled standing Poole, wherein was nothing but rainewater. The Spaniards would offer them Gallypands or Cocks of India, which they did care foddren for the most part. But after they had bene vfed to it eight or ten dayes; they could eate Toads, Serpents, and Lizards euen as well as other, and found them very sauiory meate; beside diuers kindes of fruites, the like whereof hath neuer bene seene in these parts. About three houres in the euening, they must drinke as much of the Guyaicum, as they did in the morning, and vfe the same exercises. And without any other ceremony, remedy, or deuises vfed to them, they found themselves to bee thoroughly healed, just within the space of six weeks: onely their gums excepted, which were become swolne and enflamed. But they were made found, with a sharpe-pointed bone of a Fish, by pricking and piercing them therewith in many places, and they thus healed, were perfectly recovered. The knots and bumps on their bones, vanished away, all their nightly afflictions ceased wholly within fiftene daies: appetite came afresh to them both, and their haire being lost, was restored againe in more firmer manner then before. And now there remained, not so much as the print of any push or blaine, eyther in their fore-heads, or on their breasts, likewise all vicers which they had in their secret parts, dried vp and were gone.

They perceiuing themselves to be thoroughly cured, were willing to content the woman with golden coynes, as hoping they did well therein: and this they did, by the aduice of a cunning crafty Spaniard, relegated to that place, and to worke in the Mines. He very well knew, that the Indians, making no account of Gold or Monie, purposed to begge it of her, not doubting but easily the world giue it him. But it fell out farr otherwise, for shee refused the Gold, and would by no means touch it, but ran into the house, and took a Bow and Arrows, intending to kill them, but that they fledde away from her. Perceiuing this, they called another Spaniard, who had alwayes made signes of amity towards them, and caused him to speake to the woman, because they understood not her language. Conference by signes having past betwene them, the Spaniard learned of her, that shee would be payed in some small wares or trifles. They not knowing where they should fo provide themselves, the Spaniard tolde them, that there dwelt a man in the Village, who made profession of selling such things; and of him, for the value of two Ducates (which amount heere but to twenty Solz) they bought these following trinkets. Six very bigge Combes, six little knives, sold for a Sol a peece in Paris, with their sheathes, six small looking-glasse, a dozen of points, six needles, a glasse spoone, & a dozen of Ballads. Wherewith she was extraordinarily pleased, & tooke

CHAP. XII.

Why there is not found so much vertue in the Guyaicum that is brought hither, as in that whereof the Indians themselves do make use, against the Neapolitane disease, and the description thereof.

S God hath benee, is, and euer more declareth himselfe to be good & mercifull, knowing the inhabitants of the whole Countrie of India fore-named, to be naturally subiect to this infection of the Pox; so hath he giuen them the Tree of Guyaicum, by the meanes whereof they can cure themselves, which they attained vnto, onely by experience; for they haue not anie knowledge of Letters. The Spaniards which had conquered those countreyes, having co-habited carnally with the naturall Women there abiding; receyued from them this disease. For at certaine seasons, this malady possesseth the Indians; as Fellons or VWhirlawes, and Feauers do seize on vs. And hauing perceyued that they recovered themselves by Guyaicum, our Merchants brought some of it hither; which in the beginning, rotted of it selfe, by reason they brought thence the very youngest: which to prevent, they brought then of the oldest that in regard of his solidity could not rotte or perish. And our Physicians (by their own report) appointed the receipt of that, to such as (in these parts) were so infected; but to little effect; for beside the breuage or drinke made thereof, they sayed in annoointing (oistentimes) the diseased body, with hote Oynments, compounded with Quick-silver, whereby some of good habitude, perceiued themselves to be cured, and others not.

Now, by that which I could gather, from the discourse of these two yong Parisians, the olde Guyaicum, which is brought hither to vs, is of the grosse trunk and strong bodie of the Tree, that hath no vertue against the disease, neyther doe the Indians any way vfe it. And our decieued Physitians, appoint the receipt of this her selfe highly beholding to them. She presently sung a Song, after her countrey manner, made them a Feast, wherein were serued foure small Gnimy hennes boyled, two Toads very fat, vnbowelled and roasted. They dranke a Beuerage, made of Turkey wheate, passable enough. And afterward, she gaue them halfe a dozen of Bowes, and some store of Arrows, to beare away with them homeward, beside she gaue to each of them, fine Handkerchers of Cotton, properly made.

They returned thence to the Island of Saint Dominico, where they presented themselves vnto the Vice-roy, who was most ioyfull to see them recovered; and there they remained one moneth more, not feeling any sickness by the change of ayre, or of the climate, whereat each one greatly meruailed. In this time, the Merchants made them ready for their return, and some bands of soldiers, who went to refresh themselves in Spain. Being entered their ship, within two other months they arriued happily in the Port of Stuill. Thence they went to Madrid, humble to thanke the Queene, who gaue them Letters and Passe-ports, for their more secure arriuing in France. Being come to Paris, they were most louingly entertayned by their parents and friends, who did conceal their voyage and sickness, so much as in them lay.

It was my hap to finde them there, and to me they reuealed the whol aduenture, euen in such maner as I haue set it down; to the end, that such as fall into the like inconuenience, & being forsaken of Physicians heere, may trauaile for their recovery, as these two yong men did. At this day they are provided of great and honorable Offices, the one being officer for the Finances, and the other a worthie Commander in Armes, hauing performed many signal seruices, in the last wars of the vnion to his Maiesty. And because this Chapter should not seeme ouerlong: I will heereunto adde another Discourse, concerning the Tree of Guyaicum, which healed these two yong Parisians.

this blacke Guyaicum, which is of those great trunks, and call it, the heart of Guyaicum. They also perswade these lues that there are two kinds of Guyaicum, to wit, one that is wholly blacke, and the other nothing blacke at all. Neither the less, they are both of one tree, inasmuch as that which hath no blacknesse, is of the branches, and euermore the oldest, albeit they take it for the yongest. These young Parisians, being of good and apprehensue spirits, did well perceyue, that that which men brought hither to vs, had very little power or efficacy: for they had made many diets, without receyuing the least ease thereby.

But the other of India, which was yong, somewhat tender, hauing hardly attained to two yeares growing, and no higher the stature of a man, did heale very easily. For in the making thereof, there would beefelte and perceiued, a very delicate and Grape-like gumme, pleasing vnto the heart, which is not to be found in that made heere among vs. And they concluded, that the drinnesse and coldnesse of the trunks of the trees, then which there is no other brought to vs, is the only cause, why such an inkefome disease cannot be cured.

Yet do I not inferre heereby, but that the aged Guyaicum brought hither to vs, hath some power and vertue: as in preparing the bodie (to receiue the vnguent fit for the disease) that is of a cold or melancholly nature, and hauing made vs thereof eight or ten dayes, then to take the vnguent. Or else, when one is supposed to haue that sicknesse, and there remaineth paines or aches in some parts of the body, or some Vicer is feared: some haue bene obserued, that by the vs of this old Guyaicum, within three weekes they haue appeared to be found. Some also haue bene fore afflicted, yea, diuers times left in deplorable condition; yet hauing made vs hereof for a year or two, as in their ordinary drink, and their bread commixed with a decoction of Guyaicum, and their meate boyled in like manner, they haue bene cured, and (among other) an Attorney of the Parliament at Rouen: but this is very rare and extremely painful.

The voyage to the Indies seemeth not so dolorous, nor yet so greatly chargeable: for these two young Parisians, of whom we made mention in our precedent Chapter, it cost but three hundred Crownes betwene them, yet each had a man of honor with him, and a groomer or seruant to attend them both.

The decoction of the Guyaicum which is heere among vs, doth not serue only for the Pox, or those offended therewith, but likewise for all persons ouer-abounded in moysture, or that haue diseases caused by some cold humors. Also for such as haue opilations in the Liuer, Spleene, and other of the bowels, causing them to sweate after the receite. Many haue found great comfort and ease also thereby; as some touched with palsies; others that haue had swolne legs; others with vlcers subiect to certaine times; and defluxions, deafferres, catarrhes, rheumes, and other imbecillities, they haue found themselves thereby to be releafed. But people offended with hectique Feauers, must keepe themselves from any way vsing it. I will now describe the forme of this Tree.

The Tree of Guyaicum is great and grosse, as are the Oakes in these our countries, hauing the Barke or Rinde of blackish coullor, thicke, gummy, and fat. The wood thereof is much harder then lboyny, and the rinde separateth it selfe very easily from the trunk, when it is dry. The Leaues doe appeare like those of Plantaine, but they are much lesse, and more hard. It beareth a yellow flower, and the fruite is as big as a Nut, hauing within it stones, like to those of a Medlar: no vs hath bene made of the fruite, so farre as I can learne, and yet there must needs be some vertue in them. Thus you perceiue what I know, and haue vnderstood, concerning the Vood called Guyaicum, in the vertue whereof many heere among vs haue found themselves to be deceiued; by thinking that it had the selfe-same faculties, as that which is young and tender, and found in the Indies.

From whence it proceedeth, that Graine or Corne is not so long time preserved in our Countreies, as it hath bene, and still is in Egypt. Also in what manner our Lands and Pines should be corrected and qualified, without dunging, With many remedies for the preserving of our Corn from corruption, and being eaten with diuers kinds of Vermines.

Coniectures concerning the long Keeping of Corn in Egypt.

The Grain or Corne of Egypt may be kept sound 5 years and more.

The reason why our Corn cannot be preserved for any long time.

Some haue supposed, that such seuerall kinds of corn as were kept for the space of fifteene daies, or thereabout (safe and soundly) in the royall Granaries of Egypt, by the aduice of Ioseph, to prouide agaynst the dearth of Graine, which should for seuen yeares after follow, according as he Prophetically foretold; came to passe as by matter of miracle, and extraordinarily. I must needs confesse, that there was both great abundance, and as great sterility of Corne, in the seuen consecutive yeares, and all thorow the extraordinary power of God. But for the conseruation of them, it is a matter ordinary to Egypt, that Corne should be kept there sicke and twenty yeares in pure goodnes, yea much longer time. Alwayes prouided, that it bee not transported from place to place, and be not made subiect to any heating: neither that it should bee eaten by anie Vermine, as many times our Corne is heere in our Countreies, and the cause thereof I will declare vnto ye.

The reason for it, is, that the Egyptians neuer vied to fatten their grounds, but contented themselves with such manurance, as the soyle it selfe, and Nylus ouerflowing them, onely afforded: neuer vsing any dung, as heere we do, neither Vrine, Leytals, and other excrements of beasts, which is the onely cause, why our Graine cannot be preserved; but is subiect to Wormes, VVeevles, Mites, and other small creatures, that doe great harme thereto, whereby it yeeldeth no sauourie taste, neither can bee kept in goodnesse for any long time. Hippocrates seemeth to be of the same opinion; affirming, that such as vsed breade made of Corne, which any dunged ground hath yeilded, they cannot liue so healthfully, neither so long a time, as others, feeding on the cuntry.

Some one may say vnto me, the what shall we do in these countreies, where if our fieldes be not manured and dunged, the Land will yeelde nothing, or (at the best) very little? Is it not apparant euery where amongst vs? That there are euery good meanes whereby to franke and fatten grounds, with other things than dung and filth, Hesiodus plainly enstructeth vs; for in his Booke of Husbandry, he sayth: There is nothing better, to cherishe & fatten a leane and meager Land, then the strong straw of Lapines, the chaffe of Chiches, of Beanes, of Tares, Lentilles, and other (such like, utterly reiecting all vs of dung, which many haue charged with blamefull imputations.

Of this opinion also, Liebard appeareth to bee, in his Booke called Maison Rustique, or the Countrey Farme, where he saith; In stead of dung, they may vse the straw of Lapines, hacks or cut small. Or else to sowe the ground with Lapines, and other Pulses, and afterward when they beginne to grow, to labour then the land ouer and ouer, and this will serue for dung, much better then that of any beast.

There is mention also made, of another kind of manuring the ground, which is not so good as the precedent, alledged by Hesiodus; but approaching somewhat neere it, as thus. To cut some store of Heath, Broome, Briars, and Thorns, and all other kinds of shrubbes that haue bushy stalkes, or vnder-woods, and then to couer all those Lands therewith, which are intended to be sown: then let these seuerall matters ly drying about the space of ten or twelue dayes, or longer time if neede require it. Then in the night time, let them be set on fire, and so carefully tended, that they may be altogether reduced into ashes, by kindling the fire still where it would not fasten. Afterward, let those grounds be Tilled after one manner onely, and then sowed and couered. This kinde of Husbandry will cause great quantity of Corne, which the poore make vs of in many places, where they haue no Cattle:

Another manner of manuring ground, by Heath, Broome, Bryars, &c.

Cattle: and it causeth the earth to yeeld a great myltt graine, which is not subiect to corruption.

Here it is to be remembred, that where I say in Egypt, the grounds are not manured: I meane none but those that lye along the current of Nylus, on cyther side three or foure Leagues in largenesse, or little lesse on either side. But in other parts, as in the mountaine countreyes, they manure their Lands, though they be greatly fruitfull: yet not with dung, but with straw of diuers Pulses, according as I haue formerly sayd. Howbeit they haue great Herds of Oxen, and Flockes of Sheepe, altho their fields are almost couered with flights of Pigeons, which after their owne manner manure the grounds, and it is verie excellent good in that Nature.

As for the dungs heere in our Countreyes, they are very laborious to bee made: for some dung must lye rotting a whole yeare together, before it can bee well employed. And then it is (oftentimes) full of feedes of wilde or sauage Hearbes, which fall into the Hay, that beasts of labour eat, and so passe thorow in their excrements vndigested, or else are found among the strawe, whereof they make their litter. Vwhereby enslieth, that the earth (oftentimes) produceth more store of bad Hearbes and VVeeds, then of good Corne, because they take away his true vertue of nouiture, and do meere ly fowther it.

Beside all these things fore-named, especiall care is to be hadde, in knowing what dungs are good or bad; and for certayne groundes, and for some peculiar feedes. For Horffe dung will serue well in one place; that of Oxen and Kine in another; and likewise those of other, Cattle, Sheepe, Goates, Swine, Pigeons, and others beside. It may not be forgotten also that some grounds are to bee fattened in certayne quarters of the Moone, and others in other seasons: which is not any way to be obserued, in those other kindes of manuring, whereof I haue formerly written.

Heere I must not ouer-passe, to write somewhat concerning the husbanding of Vines, which some vse to dung, albeit to much lesse purpose, then grounds bearing Corne. As about Paris, in the lower Ly-mosine; about Lymoges, and else-where. The dooing heereof is a great deale lesse tollerable, because it is a matter very difficult, that a ground nourished and made fat with dung; should not still retaine in it, the fauour of the layde Dung, and so (in the end) impart it to the wine. For, our people are verie ill aduised, to charge their Vines euery yeare: by reason it is the cause, that their wines (for the most part) haue an vnpleasing tast, and becoming fat and Oily, are easie to turne to themselves. Moreouer, dung maketh our Vines to waxe aged immediately, and soone to grow barren; because they are too liberal of their goodnesse in the first yeares.

Seruius hath lesse written vnto vs, in those Commentaries which he made on the ninth Booke of the Eniades, that the man was named Pitunius, who inuented this manner of manuring groundes by dung. And therefore he was called Sterquilinium, that is to say, a dung-hill carrier. It is to be presumed, that he was bred in the Latines countrey, in some place that was neuer fertile. These few notes I haue selected out of verie good Authors that did well vnderstand themselves in Husbandry, concerning the manuring of groundes & Vines, but they neuer approved the vse of dung.

Now, because I know verie well, that whatsoeuer Hesiodus, those other authors and my selfe also haue written, that our groundes and Vines should no longer bee manured in such stinking, foule, and grosse manner, but to follow those other instructions, most sweete and wholesome in excuse of their neglecting so good aduice I will say with them, that that which hath taken roote for so many thousandes of yeares, can hardly be taken away vpon the sodaine.

Therefore, I wil now set downe vnto you some certayne receipts and aduices, for the long conseruation of our Cornes safe and soundly, and that they may not bee any wayes bitten or eaten with Vermine, because it will bring exceeding great healthfulnesse vnto the people. For, without all doubt, when Corne and other nourishments of life haue any corruption whatsoeuer, they doe daile increase and augment diseases amongst the people.

First

First of all then, men ought to be very circumspect, that before they bring their Corne in sheaves into the Barn, the said sheaves be very dry, and free from all moisture.

Next, not to lay them on the earthen floor, without there bee some dry boards betweene the Corne and it. Then that there bee no muck-hill, or lakes; cyther in the Barne; or neere it: for ill fauor will soone communicate it selfe to the Corne; and about all, let the Barne bee very well ayred. If it be in such a place, where they haue no vse of Barnes, as in the most part of Langwedocke; then order must be taken, that the Stacks of Corne be (at least) so well couered and enclosed, that no raine may get power of entrance, for otherwise, the Corne will sproute it selfe, and afterward rot, corrupt, and putrifie.

After that the Corne is thresed, and meete to bee laide vp in the Garner or Corne-loffe, choise must be made of one that receiveth the bright splendour of the East, breathed also moderately with the North and West windes: but the Southerne blasts, and those leaning that way, by no means to enter it. The couerture ouer head, need no great coslinesse; because of the ayres easier entrance thorow the Tyles, or other sheltering, that the Corne may not be heated or chafed. The floore may bee of earth, or paving tyles; and the walles of whitened mortar. You must bee respectiue, that your Corne-heapes bee not great or thicke, to auoide ouer-heating; removing and changing them from place to place, at two Months and two Moneths. The Garner must be farre enough from moist places; especially from houses of office, which yeeld a noyfull fauour, or any such vnfit being; from Stables of Oxen, Horses, Swine, & such like.

The planchers and walles of the Garner, wherein you purpose to house your Corne, must be washed with vineger, or such water, wherein hearbes, or some bitter drugs haue bene boiled: as Wormewood, Southernwood, the leaues of wilde Cowcumbers, the pithe or graine of Coliquintida, or of Lupines, or Oxe gauls; without all question to the contrary, these haue bene truly tried, that no VVeecils, Mites, or Wormes can bite or touch the Corne, where they haue bene used. And they that seeme to take this paines, may lay some wormwood vnderneath, also; and about their Corne-heapes, or Southernwood; or dried wilde Marierome. For God saith by his Prophet Isaiah, That hee will preferue the goods of them that keepe them to helpe the poore. And contrariwise, That he will suffer them to rot, and their Corne shall bee eaten with vermine, that hoord it them vp; to get great gaine by it; and hurt the people vexed with famine.

Of the great difference, which both Ancient and Moderne Writers haue obserued to be betweene the Royall title of a King, and the disgracefull name of a Tyrant.

Efore I begin to describe the difference, that is betweene a King and a Tyrant; I hold it to be a matter most convenient, to set downe a definition both of the one and other, to the ende, that the deportments of them both, may the better be knowne.

ture, as he desireth his Subjects to be towards him: forsaking naturall liberty, & a propriety in the goods of any man. I observe in this definition, that Subjects ought to be obedient to the Royall Monarch, to declare thereby, that in him consisteth Soueraine Maiesty. The King also ought to be obedient to the Lawes of nature, that is to say, to gouerne his Subjects, and to guide his owne actions by naturall iustice, which maketh it selfe to be seene as cleare and brightly, as the splendour of the Sunne. It is likewise a Royall mark or note, when the Prince sheweth himselfe as milde and pleyable to the lawes of nature; as he willeth his Subjects to be obeyant to him. Which he may easily do, if he feare God aboue all things, be pitifull to the afflicted, provident in his enterprizes, hardy in exploits, modest in prosperity, constant in aduersity, firme in his word, wise in his counsell, carefull of his Subjects, succourable to friends, terrible to enemies, courteous to good men, dreadfull to wicked persons, and iust to all.

A Tyrant is such a man, as desireth the lawes of nature with his feete, abuseth the liberties of free-borne Subjects, euen as if they were his slaves; and maketh the goods of other men to be his owne. The name or word Tyrant, is Greeke, in his owne propriety, and was honourable; signifying nothing else in times of antiquity, but a Prince that had possessed himselfe of the State, without the consent of his Citizens and Subjects, and of a companion, had made him his Master. Such a man was called a Tyrant, although he were a most wife and iust Prince. In like manner, Plato writing to Dionysius the Tyrant, gaue him this quality as his honour: Plato to Dionysius the tyrant, health. The returne and answer was: Dionysius the tyrant, to Plato greeting. And to declare that the word tyrant, was as well attributed to iust & good Princes, as them that were wicked, it evidently appeareth herein: because Pittacus and Periander, two of the feuen Sages of Greece, were called tyrants, for hauing seized the Estates of their Countries.

But such, as eyther by power, or else by cunning had invaded and obtained the Souerainty, perceiving that their liues were exposed to the mercy of their enemies; were constrained (for the better security of their liues and goods) to haue Guards of strangers about their persons, & strong Garrisons in Castles, for whose payement of wages and maintenance, great tributes & impositions were leuied. And when they saw, that their liues could not be secured, hauing but poore friends, and potent enemies; they did eyther put to death, or banished some, to please and enrich others: and they that stood in desperate condition, they made rape both of their goods and wives. And this was the reason, that tyrants were extremely hated and maliced. For we reade, that Dionysius the elder tyrant, of one part of Sicily, had daily ten thousand Soldiers for his Guard, and ten thousand horsemen, and foure hundred Gallies, readily hired and armed. And when he could not make vp this account among so few Subjects as were vnder his seruice; he wrang & griped his people in so small an Island, whercof hee gouerned but in part onely, and contained no more then six hundred and sixteene Italian miles in all.

Now because euery one hath not the iudgement to distinguish a good King from a Tyrant, calling him a Tyrant, that (for great store of good reasons) maketh himselfe formidable, and stood in awe of, beside that which I haue already sette downe, I will make him some what more easily to be knowne.

The most notable difference betwene a King and a Tyrant, is, that the King conformeth himselfe to the lawes of nature, and a tyrant trampleth on them with his feete, that one maintaineth piety, iustice, and faith, the other hath neyther God, Law, nor Faith. The one maketh whatsoever he doth, serue for the weale publique, & tuition of his Subjects: the other doth not any thing, but for his owne particular profit, reuenge, or pleasure. The one enforceth himselfe to enrich his Subjects by all the best meanes he can deuise: the other will not build his owne house, but with the ruines of theirs. The one reuengeth the iniuries of the publike Estate, and pardoneth his owne: but the other reuengeth cruelly his owne iniuries, and pardoneth them that are done to others. The one spareth the honour of modest women: & the other triumpheth in their shame. The one taketh pleasure to be aduised in all freedom and liberty, and will be wisely reprehended when hee faileth; but nothing is more ikelesome to the other, then the counsell of a graue and vertuous man.

The one striueth to maintain his Subjects in peace and iustice; but the other moueth dayly diuisions; to make the one part to hate the other, and then to fatten himselfe with their Confiscations. The one delighteth to be sometimes seene, and heard of his Subjects; but the other euer more hideth himselfe from them; as from his enemies. The one, maketh reckoning of his Subjects Loue, but the other of their Feare. The one, neuer feareth; but for the well-fare of his people; but the other dreadeth nothing more then them.

The one, will not charge his Subjects more then needes must, remembering alwayes the publike necessity; but the other drinketh their blood, gnaweth their bones, and sucketh the verie Marrowe of his people, onely to weaken them. The one searcheth out men of best condition, to employ in publike Offices; but the other employeth none but Theeues, and most wicked persons in his seruice, like to Spunges. The one maketh free giue of estates and offices, to auoid concussions, and crowdes of people; but the other selleth them at as deare rates as hee can, for their better meanes of enfeebling the people by Theft; and then (afterward) cuttes the Theeues throates for their vvealth, because he would be repured a good Iusticer.

A King measureth his actions and maners, by the foote of the Law; but the tyrant maketh the Law to serue his maners. The one is beloued and reuerenced of his people; and the other generally hated of them all. The one hath no other recourfe in war, but to his Subjects: but the other, will make no warre but with them. The one, hath no Guards or Garrisons but of his owne people; but the others defence is onely in strangers. The one delighteth in an assured repose and tranquility; but the other languisheth in perpetual feare. The hope & expectation of the one, is euerlasting life in blessednes; but the other cannot auoid eternall punishment. The one is honored in this life, & desired again after death: the other is infamous in this life, and torne in peeces with shame after death: But because the continuation of this chapter might seeme ouer-redious to the Reader, if I should verily al these relations by historicall examples; I will referre such as are willing to take the paynes, to reade the histories themselves, both in Greece, Latine, & other languages, wher they shal find that to be most true, which hath bin spoken of Kings and Tyrants.

CHAP. XV.

In what high account and esteeme, Philosophers, & other men of knowledge (in what Sciences neuer) were held in elder times, by Emperors and Kings.

E need not now complaine, that in these dayes of ours, there is such want of excellent spirits, in all kinds of Arts and Sciences; but if we survey with more wary iudgment, we shal plainly perceiue, that there are learned men now, who may iustly find fault, that neither they are in such esteeme, or any way so well recompensed of Princes in these times, as many worthy men were heretofore, by Emperors, Kings, Princes, and great Lords, in those famous daies of reuerend antiquity. Instead of concluding, and acquainting yee with the iustice of their reason, I will lightly passe ouer; & instead of long speaking, onely remember ye with some histories and examples of famous Potentates in former ages, who were Friends, and Nursing fathers to Philosophers and Schollers; to the end that their actions being compared with those of these dayes, it may be knowne, whether they haue cause to complaine, or no, in a case so highly important.

And first of all, I will beginne with the excellent and renowned Captain Pompey, who (as we read) after he had vanquished the puissant king Mithridates, & obtained many other victories and adventures in war, coming to Athens with all his warlike furnishment, such as the Roman Consuls and Captaines vsed to haue borne before the; he was aduertised that Posidonius the Philosopher lay sicke in his bed. Being desirous to go and see him, he would not only honor him with his personall Visitation; but when he came neere the door of the house, he caused his Standards and Imperial Ensigns to march in before him. For it was euermore his saying; That Kingdomes and Empires ought to obey vertue and Learning. Thus he behaued himselfe to this poore learned man, which hee would not haue done to the greatest Potentate then liuing.

Dionysius the Tyrant, king of Syracusa, hauing obtained of Plato the excellent diuine Philosopher, that he would come & see him in Sicily; when hee heard of his neere approaching, he went to meete him on the way, causing him to sit with him in his owne Chariot, drawne with white Horses. Such was the reputation which wife and learned men had in those times. When Alexander the Great, had determined the vtter ruine & subuersion of the Thebans, he gaue especiall charge first of all, that no man should touch the house of the Poet Pindarus, but to leaue it wholly standing. If I should tell yee, how highly Virgill was honored and esteemed by Octavianus, it is a matter so perfectly known, that it needeth no report of mine. According to Pliny in his scuenth Booke, whensoever he entered into the Theater, there to deliuer some of his Verses, all the people would stand vp on their feet, and offer as great reuerence to him, as if it had bin to the Emperor. And that which is much more, Silius Italicus, a Spanish Poet, did yearly solemnize the day of his Natiuitie, and with farre greater deuotion, then hee did his owne. The gifts and presents daily giuen him by Octavian, Mecenas, and many more, were so great, that Seruius (who writeth of him) saith, that his goods (in very short time) amounted to the value of fixe thousand Sesterties, which arise vnto two hundred and fiftie thousand Crownes. He had in Rome a very honorable Palace; in regard whereof, Iuuenall in his 7. Satyre saith, That he was one of the richest men in those dayes.

Vpon a day, in the presence of Octavian, and Linus his wife, the mother vnto Marcellus, Virgill vttered certaine Verses of his bookes Aeneidos, and comming to the end of the fixt Booke, where hee discouereth most elegantly of Marcellus lately dead before; the hart of the mother became so strangely and passionately moued thereat, that she fell into a swoond, not hauing any power to heare the rest. But being reuiued to her selfe againe, she commaunded, that for each of those whereof shee had lost the hearing, Virgill should haue ten Sesterties giuen him. The remainder (which she heard not) being one and twenty verses in number; the valewation of his reward, contained the summe of 5000. Ducates, of our instant money.

It is found faithfully recorded, that the Syracusans had some Athenian prisoners, that could rehearse (by heart) a certayne verses of Euripides the Greeke Poet, and dayly pronounced them; by which occasion only, and in honor of the Poet, they were deliuered, & permitted freely to go home to their owne country. Scipio the Affrican, during his life time, had alwayes with him (in his wars) the Statue of Ennius; and when he died, he tooke especial order, that it might be buried in his owne Sepulcher with him. The Emperor Domitian, caused Silius Italicus (an excellent Poet, and borne in Spain) to be made three times Consul of Rome, as Marshall witnesseth in one of his Epigrams, beginning, Augusto Piaethura.

But I know not what to say, of our moderne and later times; or what our late liuing Princes haue done, either to Politian, Pontanus, or Sannazar; and to speak of our Modern Frenchmen, as Ronsard, Belay, and other excellent Poets. But perhaps you will answer me, their hopes may be to come heereafter, because some of them are yet liuing, young in yeares, but old in wisdom and vnderstanding, and worthy to be equaled with many of former times. But because I see so little respect, let vs goe backe againe to those renowned Ancients. King Mithridates held Plato and his learning in so high reputation, being desirous to haue his statues erected to find out a Syllabus to performe it, because he was a most excellent workman. For in those dayes, the greatest honour that could be, was (in publicke places) to erect Figures & Statues; yet none might be permitted, except it were of some worthy man, made famous, and knowne by some vertuous deeds, or for his dignity in learning. For this cause the men of Athens made one of Demosthenes, with a title of the

the very greatest honor that euer had bin giuen vnto any other; and these were the words of the inscription. If the power and strength of Demosthenes had bin equal to his spirit, wisdom, and learning; the King of Macedon could neuer haue surmounted the Greekes.

Iosephus the Jew, being one in number amongst the captiues of Ierusalem, was brought prisoner to Rome; & yet notwithstanding, in regard of the Bookes hee had made of the Iewes Antiquities, they repute him worthy to haue a Statue. The Athenians considering the wisdom of Demetrius Phalerus, scholler vnto Theophrastus, caused his statue to be erected in thirty places of this City. Now if men of merit were so highly honoured, doubles they were as well rewarded. For Athenus writeth in the 9. book of his Gymnosophists that Aristotle for his Booke de Animalium recieued of Alexander 800. talents: which of the current money now in France, valeweth foure hundred & fourescore thousand Crownes, which is verified by Pliny in his eight book. There hee declareth, that Alexanders desire was so great to haue this book performed by Aristotle, that he sent many thousands of men thoroughout all Greece and Asia, with letters and expresse commandement, that they should be obedient to whatsoeuer hee required, touching the manner of hunting and flying of Fowles, Fishes, and all the like exercises, because they should know & vnderstand, the nature and properties of all kinde of Beasts, Birds, and Fishes, & then to aduertise Aristotle thereof. Vndoubtedly if Hommer, the very best of Greeke Poets, had liued in the time of Alexander, it is to be presumed that hee wold haue bin as bountifull and beneficiall to him, as hee was to Aristotle. Because when a chest or Casket was presented vnto him, wherein K. Darus kept his most precious Vnguent, the Chest being very pleasing to him, he said; I will make this Chest the keeper of far richer treasure; and presently hee did put thereinto the Workes of Hommer, which heeuermore tooke great delight to read in continually.

The Emperor Traiane, in regard of his learning onely, did so especially honour the Philosopher Dyon, that when hee rode abroad in the fields to take the Ayre, hee would haue him to sit neere vnto him in his owne Chariot, and so ride on along with him thorough Rome, making it as his triumphall entrance.

In the warre which the Emperor Octavianus made in Egypt, against Mark Anthony, hee sayde; I had bee did forbeare to destroy Alexandria, for the respect hee bare to Alexander, that builded it; but much more for his loue to the Philosopher Arius. The same Emperor also, made Cornelius Gallus Tribune of the people; onely because hee was a most elegant Poet.

Suetonius in the life of Vespasian, sheweth, what rewards were anciently giuen to the Learned. For he sayth, Although Vespasian was taxed with conuotnesse; yet notwithstanding, he greatly fauoured exercises and Artes, and gaue as pensions to each Master of them, such quantity of golden peces, as being reduced to the summes of our monyes (according to Aerolais and Budaus) their stipends valewed two thousand and five hundred Ducates, but as some say Crownes.

By the Testimony of Pliny, in his scuenth Booke, and the ninth Chapter, writing of Socrates the Greeke Orator, a man may very easily perceyue, in what account and estimation the learned were then. For hee sayeth, that this Socrates, hauing made an Oration for a certayne man; hee rewarded him with twelue Talents, which valew (according vnto our present computation) twelue thousand Crownes.

Wee finde it likewise written, in the life of the Emperour Antoninus, Some vnto Senerus, that hee gaue to Appian, 500. Ducates of Gold, as there were number of Verses in a great worke which hee had (at that time) made, concerning the Nature and property of all kinde of Fishes.

The Emperour Gratian, knowing that Antoninus composed well in Verse; gaue him (onely for his desert that way) the Consulshippe, which was the vertie greatest dignity, nay euen next to that of Emperour.

Domitian, albeit hee was a most wicked man, yet he gaue great honors & gifts to the Poet Enitathus. And in a solemn Feast, hee caused him to sit at his Table, Crowned with a Garland of Lawrell; where, with all our graue Elders vsed to Crowne their Poets. Seleim Nafius, a Ly-

Nor were these learned men thus honoured during their life time, but also after their death. As may bee noted by Ptolomy, who was King of Egypt, who made a Temple and Statue to Homer, as he did to his other Goddes. For Virgil likewise, there was a Statue erected in Mantua, long time after he was dead. The excellent Poet Horace, although we are not certaine how wealthy he was; yet notwithstanding, he had great dignities of Octavianus in Rome.

I could produce many examples vnto this purpose, which I forbear, onely to avoide prolixity. But heere, if any man shall obiect vnto me, that wife and Learned Seneca dyed by the command of Nero; I answer, it was most bloodye Nero that did it, not any defect in his learning, and before his death, he attained to great dignities and honours in Rome, onely by the meanes of his Learning. It is an olde, but a true Prouerb; That Honors and gifts, are both the makers and maintainers of Arts. Therefore wee finde, that in those times when Emperors and Kings fauoured studies and learning; there wanted then no store of Learned men. As in the daies of Octavianus, Claudius, Adrian, Vespasian, and Antoninus. CHAP. XVI.

That Learning is not onely necessary in Kings and Princes: but also for Generales, Captaines, and Commanders, that follow the Exercise and Art Military.

Could alledge manifold Histories, besides true, good, and sufficient Reasons, that Princes (in ancient times) found no better forme, or direete rule for their orderly gouernment, then Learning, and Knowledge. And because the euidence hereof remaineth so plaine and pregnant vnto vs, I will obserue some few examples, tending to this purpose. When King Phillip vnderstood the birth of his sonne Alexander, and knowing Aristotle to liue then in Athens, he sent a very notable Letter vnto him (recorded by Plutarch, and Aulus Gellius) wherein hee thanked the Goddes, not so much for the safe birth of his sonne, but because hee was borne in the life time of Aristotle. By which few words, may be apparently discerned, how much the King thought learning and knowledge fitte for his sonne, to the end, he might proue to be such a King and Captaine, as hee was indeede afterward. Whereupon, when hee grew vnto yeares meete for the embracing of studie; he made Aristotle his Mayster, sent him great gifts, and (in meere loue to his son) builded a Cittie, which he had formerly destroyed, and erected also a Schoole (admired for cost and curious workemanship, such as no time before had afforded) wherein his sonne might receiue instruction.

Antigonus, King of Macedon, knowing how needfull a thing Learning vvas, for his owne good gouernment; and beeing mightily prouoked by the continuall renowne of Zeno, a singular Philosopher, and Prince of the Stoickes; desired earnestly to enioy his company, which hee further laboured by Letters, and manie Embassies. Of which Letters, Diogenes Laertius reciteth one, in this manner following.

The Letter of King Antigonus, to Zeno the Philosopher.

Antigonus a King, sendeth greeting to Zeno the Philosopher. I know very well, that in worldly goodes, fauours of Fortune, and the reputation of such things, I doe farre exceede thee. Nevertheless, I know withall, that in true felicitie, knowledge, discipline, studies and liberal Artes, thou reachest a higher pitch then I can doe. In regard whereof I desire, that thou wouldest come and liue with me, which I pray thee to yeelde vnto; that I may enioy thy company and conuersation. In the doing whereof, be well assured, that thou not onely shalt be master of me, but shalt also be a teacher to all my Macedonians. For he that instructeth the King, making him to become vertuous and good: teacheth those vertues likewise to all his Subiects. To proue the truth hereof, it is commonly seene, that such as the King is, such are his vsailes, and such as the Captaine, such his Souldiours.

Farwell.

These Letters being receiued by the venerable Philosopher; in regard of his deepe steppes into age, it was not possible for him to condiscend thereto, or (in person) to satisfie the Kings earnest request. But he sent him two of his Schollers, excelling the rest in knowledge & learning, by whom he was worthily taught and instructed.

The learning of Aristotle, vnder whom Alexander was tutored fure whole yeares together, tooke such roote and efficacie in the Schollers, that he became so excellent a King, as no one in the world was able to compare with him. Being in the midst of his Armies, he would not giue ouer study, but euermore layd (with his Sword) on the pillow of his bed, the Iliaides of Homer, and other bookes. And it appeared, that such was his loue to Learning, that he could as easily apprehend it, as he conquered kingdoms by force of Armes. Plutarch, Aulus Gellius, and Theophrastus doe asseme, that Alexander had published certayne bookes of naturall Philosophy, whereof he had been an Auditor vnder Aristotle; in regard whereof, he wrote a Letter vnto him.

The Letter of great Alexander, to his Master Aristotle.

Aristotle, thou hast done ill, in publishing those Bookes of speculative Philosophie by thee composed. For, in thine owne judgement, wherein can I possibly excell other men, when the Science wherein thou hast instructed me, cometh to be common to all men? I would haue thee to know, that I more couet to preceed all men in Learning and knowledge, then in riches, pompe, power and dominion.

Farwell.

When this was vnderstoode by Aristotle, to comfort and please so puissant a Prince, he commanded that his Bookes (formerly common) should be so obliuied, that it was not possible to vnderstand them, but by his owne interpretation. Pirrus that excellent Captaine, and king of the Epirotes, who maintained great warres against the Romaines, and diuers times ouercame them; did exercise him selfe, not onely in the reading of the Sciences: but also composed sundry bookes, among which was his precepts of warre. As the like hath bene done lately in our time, by that famous man, Guillaume du Bellay, Lord of Langoy.

What shall we say of Julius Caesar, the first Emperour, and (without all comparison) the very best Captaine of all them that had the managing of war? We may truly say of him, that he was no lesse inclined to Learning, then to Armes. For he made himselfe a Scholler, before hee was a Souldier: and afterward as often as he had any leysure, he frequented the Academies of the Poets, and in walking, he would both reade and write. Vpon a time, being at Alexandria in Egypt, to saue himselfe from an imminent perill, he aduentured swimming, bearing the bookes which he had written in one of his handes, declaring thereby, that he affected them as dearly, as his owne life; hauing as much care to saue the one, as the other; and what his learning was, his Commentaries (yet remaining with vs) can sufficiently witness.

Notonely Cesar, but all the Romanes also, do beare witnesse of that which wee say, who (in my poore opinion) were reputed and knowne to be good Captaines and Gouernors. For, the first thing which they vndertook for their children in their infancie, was to haue them well instructed, and therefore provided good school-masters for them, which they chargeably sent for out of Greece. Both the Catoes were knowne to be excellent schollers, & soldiers. The great Censor was wonderfully addicted to learning, as the Bookes written by him do plainly testifie: hee was a worthy Orator, Historian, and endued with many vertues, and euen toward the ending of his dayes, hee learned the Greeke tongue. The other Cato, styled of Utica, though he was not of such a sharpe ingenious spirit in apprehension of Sciences; yet notwithstanding, hee kept company with most excellent Schoole-masters; among whom was the Philosopher * Antipater. And he gaue his minde so much to studie, that Cicero sayth, in his Booke De Finibus, he did nothing else but reade; yea, whensoever he late in the Senate house, hee alwayes had some Booke or other about him, to reade at all times when he pleased.

Scipio Africanus, the victorious triumpher ouer Hanniball, was extremely addicted to Learning, and euermore had the Poet Ennius with him. After all his Victories, he gaue himselfe againe afresh to Learning and reading. Hanniball his Competitor, although he was of Africa, had alwayes bookes with him in his Tents and Pauilions: in the time of waite, hee would not giue ouer reading, but in one place or other (howsoever it were) hee would haue Silanus and Saxylus (two learned Lacedemonians) with him, by whom he was well instructed in the Greeke Language. We haue formerly read, that Dionysius the Tyrant of Sicily, had Plato to be his Schoolemaster, and kept company also with many other learned men. Afterward, when hee was expelled out of his kingdom, one (in mocking manner) demanded of him, whereto now serueth the Philosophy which he had learned of Plato, to whom hee returned this answer, It serueth mee to support my present necessities with patience. Themistocles, a most excellent Captaine, declared himselfe to be no lesse diligent in learning, when hee was in Armes: his Master was * Anaxagoras, the Milesian. Epaminondas, and the other Captaines of Greece, were all studious and worthy Orators. Alcibiades, in the warres which he had against the Romanes, for the space of forty years together, notwithstanding all the furious assaults, destined not from his studying, haue euermore diuers schoolemasters and Philosophers with him.

Octavius Augustus, limited to himselfe certaine houres in the day, onely for study; and when he was in warre, yet he kept his times of studying still: hauing therefore diuers worthy Masters with him, as Apollodorus of Pergama, the Philosopher Alperarius, Asinius Pollio, Valerius Messala, Virgil, Onid, and many other. And before this Emperour, there was a famous Captaine, named * Lucius Lucullus, who during the wars, gaue himselfe to study; & when the wars ceased, hee applied all his diligence, in cherishing and maintaining learned men. Paulus Emilius, victorious ouer the king of Persia, ouer & beside his being a very learned man, endeauoured also that his children might bee the like; so that at his infant request, the Athenians gaue him * Metrodorus to bee their Schoole-master. But wherfore do I take so much paines, in naming so many one after another? Pompey, Quintus Fabius Maximus, Marcus Brutus, Tyrane, Adrian, and Marke Antonie, were all learned men, and compiled Bookes, Orations, and Letters of great learning, and memorable example.

In briefe, if I erre not greatly in my judgement, it may plainly appeare, that few Captaines are found of ancient times who were excellent in nothing so much as by their learning. There are two only, of whom wee finde nothing remaining written, expressing whether they were learned, or no: the one being named Caius Marius, and the other Marcus Marcellus. And yet I reade, that Marcellus highly loued and fauoured men of knowledge: whereby it is to bee credited, that surely himselfe was learned, though nothing (to that effect) bee written of him. And it may the more manifestly appeare, by the prohibition he made (as we haue formerly alledged) at the surprizall of Syracusa, that Archimedes should not bee slayne. And

And although he miscaried, notwithstanding his strict command to the contrary: yet it was not without great griefe of the said Marcellus.

Let then the Captaines of these our dayes, say what they list, that learning is not so expedient for them (I meane such as thrust the file of Captaines on themselves) coueting with their owne opinion, or rather oblinacy, to cloud and couer their dulnesse and ignorance. It is sufficient for vs, that wee see how highly our graue Predecessors esteemed Bookes and Learning, equall with the courage and manhood of infinite Captaines, worthily affected and addicted to learning; as we finde it vnpartially set downe, in that iudicious Booke of warre, written by Robertus Valturinus.

CHAP. XVII.

Of diuers secret naturall properties, being in the Viper: and how he may be sed on, and eaten, without any danger.

THE Viper is a kinde of Serpent, sufficiently knowne to many: and although it be little, yet notwithstanding it is very venomous, for with a little pricking it can kill a man. But as the Lord God made not any thing but to profitable vse: euen so this creature, with all his venome, serueth man for diuers medicines and maladies, especially for any paine in the throat. It is a thing very excellently good (by a secret property in nature) to beare the head of a Viper about a man: for lusing, it killeth, and dead, it bealeth. Tiriacle, or Treacle, as we vse to terme it, is properly good against venom: but in the making thereof, and in the confection, there is necessarily required some part of this beast, to the end it may be the more perfect, and of the greater efficacy. And it was named Tiriacle, because that the worde Thirion in Greeke, signifieth a Viper or venomous Beast. Some (and not vnfittingly) doe giue another etymology, and reason for this name. But before we report the benefits ensuing by the Viper, me-thinkes it were not amiss, to remember what is said by Pliny, Isidorus, and Aelianus. They report, that when this Serpent conceiueh, the Male putteth his head in at the mouth of the Female, whereby hee receiueh such immeasurable delectation; that with her ouer-sharp teeth, she byteth off the head of the Male, becoming thereby widowed, yet violent in assaulting. The matter conceiued by her, groweth to bee Egges, which forme themselves within her body, according as the spawn of fishes doth: and of those Egges do Vipers ensue, at such time as she is to deliuer her young ones, yeelding euery day, one, till they amount to twenty. Now because they are so many in number, they which remaine behinde, haue no power to attend their fit time, do teare the belly of their Damme, so that by her death, they enter into the world, and liue. If it be so, surely it is a matter very maruailous: for it should seeme thereby, that (euen naturally) the children do reuenge the death of their father.

With this opinion of Pliny, do many other Authors consent; as Plinarch in his Treatise against Scorfers. Neuertheless, there are a great many other, who do contrary it, denying that the Viper dyeth in her teeming: with which opinion, I also rest resolu'd, because the other seemeth to me not naturall; neyther haue I seene the experience thereof, or know any person that hath seene it. In like manner, Philostatus is flatly against it, in the life of Apollo Thyaneus, introducing Apollo himselfe, who reporteth, that hee had seene a Viper, that after she had fully yeilded all her young ones; licked them very louingly, and liued healthfully. As much may be gathered from the words of Aristotle, who setteth them downe thus, The Viper only (among all other Serpents) deliuereth her young ones, because she first formeeth them in her body of Egges, as the spawn of fishes is. Afterward, when they are formed, they remaine three daies wrapped up in a tender thinn skin, which breaketh at the limited time, and so affordeth the young ones liberty (in regard wherof, Apuleius, in his Apologie, calleth them Omperes, and not Vipers, as much to say, as engendered of Egges) and very often it happeneth, that that wrapper breaking (of it selfe) in the Dammes belly; they issue forth euery day one, to the number of twenty and more: these are the very words of Aristotle. In another

I meane in his third Booke of Beasts, speaking of the reeming of Serpents, he saith. Before the Viper yeeldeth her young ones, she formeth them within her body of Eggs. And I am perswaded, that hence ensueth those speeches, of the young ones tearing the belly of their Damme. For it seemeth to them that stand in defence thereof, that when Aristotle speaketh of this first fawning or reeming: hee purposed to say, that they did then breake or teare the belly of their damme.

reth not any thing all the time of winter: but hideth her selfe (as dead) in the earth; and whosoever then findeth, toucheth, and handleth her, she cannot bite him: but when summer cometh, she then resumeth all her forces. The like affirmeth Plinie, of Lizards, Snakes, and all other kinde of creeping creatures.

Aristotle saith, that they containe themselves three or foure moneths, without feeding on any thing. Aelianus auoucheth, that those vipers which breed in the Provinces of Arabia, although they doe bite, yet their biting is not venomous; because they doe feede on the Baulme tree, and sleepe vnder the shadow thereof. Aristotle further saith, that they are very desirous to drinke wine; and many people doe take them, by setting vessells of wine in the places where they resort: for they will become drunk by drinking, and after they take them sleeping. There are many things more to be spoken, concerning the qualities and properties of the viper, which I doe purposely omit for breuities sake.

CHAP. XVIII.

Of the admirable property of a little creature, the biting whereof is healed by the sound of Musique: likewise of many other infirmities, which are onely holpen by the same Medicine.

That which we haue sayd in our precedent chapter, vnder the authority of Theophrastus, concerning the biting of the viper, and that it may be cured by Musique; will make our present report to be the better credited, because it tendeth to the same purpose. Alexander of Alexandria, in his booke of Veniall dayes, and Petrus Gellius, a moderne Authour, doe affirme and say, that in Apulia, a Countrey of Italie, there is a kinde of Spider, which the Inhabitants doe tearme Taramula. P. C. Rodianus calleth it Phalangium, which at the beginning of summer is so venomous, that whosoever is bitten or stung thereby, except he be very suddenly succoured, he loseth all all sense and vnderstanding, and dyeth instantly. But if any one (being so bitten) chance to escape death: yet he remaineth insensible, and wholly voyd of any capacity; for which dangerous inconuenience, experience found out a remedy, and that is Musique.

The affirmation of good Authours as eye-witnesses.

The iudgement of Authours hereon, speaking as eye-witnesses, and hauing scene the proofe thereof, is thus. So soone (say they) as any one is bitten or enuomed, the best helpe is, to bring instantly before him, such as vse to play on Vialles, Flutes, and other Instruments, to play diuers Lessons, & sing many Songs: which Musique being heard by the party wounded, he will presently begin to daunce, deliuering variety of gestures and motions with his body, euen as if all his life time he had well inured himselfe to dancing, in which fury and power of dancing, he continueth, vntill such time as the venome be dissipated. Alexander Alexandrinus proceedeth farther, affirming, that he beheld one wounded by this Spider, to dance & leape about incessantly, and the Musicians (finding themselves wearied) gaue ouer playing: whereupon, the poore offended dancer, hauing vtterly lost all his forces, fell downe on the ground, as if he had bene dead. The Musicians no sooner began to play againe, but hee returned to himselfe, and mounting vp vpon his feet, danced againe as lustily as formerly hee had done, and so continued dancing still, till he found the harme asswaged, and himselfe entirely recovered. Heereunto he addeth, that when it hath happened, that a man hath not bene thorowly cured by Musique in this manner; within some short while after, hearing the sound of Instruments, hee hath recovered footing againe, and bene enforced to hold on dancing, and neuer to cease, till his perfect & absolute healing, which (questionlesse) is admirable in nature.

Asclepiades writeth, that the sound of Instruments, and voyces sweetly singing to them, hath wrought extraordinary cures on Lunatics and mad men. We reade also, that Esmene the Thebane, healed many diseases and infirmities, only by his sweete and melodious playing on Flutes. Theophrastus and Anlus Gellius say; that Musique appeaseth the paine of the Sciatica, and of the Gout. wife finde it recorded in the sacred Scripture, that Dauid (by Musique) cald Saul of the passion, which the euill spirit wrought in him: so great is this property, proceeding from the entire amity, which the nature of man beareth to Musique. And if good consideration be made hereof, wee shall not account it strange, that infinite infirmities haue bene cured by the means of Musique. For it hath evidently bene scene, that there are diuers heats and other creatures, that kill by laughing, others by weeping, and others in sleeping; according as Plutarch writeth of Cleopatra, and as diuers other good Historians haue faithfully affirmed.

Many infirmities cured by the means of Musique.

CHAP. XIX.

Of a strange medicine, whereby Faustine of Rome, wife vnto the Emperour Marcus Aurelius, was cured of an infirmity of disbonest loue: and of many other remedies against that powerfull passion.

Concerning that affection, or imprisonment of the will, as we may iustly terme it, which ordinarily is stiled by the name of Loue; whether it be a powerfull passion, working wonderful effects in the soule or no: there need no further question to be made, but examination of such mens iudgements, as (by good experience) haue knowne it, and whose examples remaine notorious to vs. More especially of very worthy and excellent persons, who haue suffered their wils to be so strangely transported thereby, that extremity of death hath ensued thereon. Julius Capitolinus, among diuers other examples, reporteth what happened to Faustine, Daughter to Antoninus, and Wife to the Emperour Marcus Aurelius, who became so excessively enamored on a Fencer or Sword-player; that by ouer-abounding in desire to enioy his company, shee fell into such a consumption, as very greatly endangered her life.

for this extraordinary folly. In the end, it was concluded, that the Fencer should be put to death, and some of his blood be secretly given to Faustine to drinke, and after she had thus ignorantly drunke thereof, the Emperour her husband should company with her in bed. This remedy wrought very wonderfully, for it quite tooke from her that fantastick affection, so that (never after) shee did so much as once remember him. And the History saith, that of this her companying with the Emperour, Antoninus Commodus was begotten, who became so cruell & bloody, that he resembled rather the Fencer, of whose blood his Mother had drunke before his conception; then any iote of Marcus Aurelius, to whom he was Sonne indeed; in regard wherof, Commodus was a daily companion with the Gladiatores or Fencers, as Entrepins witnesseth, in the life of the said Commodus.

Physitions among the Greekes and Arabes, do reckon this disease of Loue with the most greuous infirmities of the body, and thereupon have disputed many remedies. * Cadmus the Milesian (according as Suidas reporteth, in his Booke of Collections) wrote a Booke discoursing on particular remedies, whereby vterly to expell this dangerous sickness of loue: as Ouid also hath saide sufficiently, in his remedies against loue. Wherefore among all other remedies, which Physitions have aduised against this infirmity, this is one; that the patient endangered, should undertake some great affaires, importing highly his owne honour and profite, onely to this end, that his spirit being busie about diuersity of things; hee may the better retire his imagination, from the party by whom he is offended. They do moreover wish him, to thin and forsake all embracings, or ouer-kinde conuersation with other women. Pliny sayeth, that against this enflaming heate, it is very good to obserue where a Mule hath tumbled or wallowed, and to gather the dust of that ground, which must be cast vpon the amorous party, and powder his garments therewith, or else with the sweate of a well heated Mule, as Cardanus also auoucheth, in his Booke of Subtilties.

Physitions likewise haue taught, the meane, whereby may be obserued, which person is beloued of the amorous party. And that is the selfe-same rule, whereby * Erasistratus, Physition to king Selouchus, vnderstande the loue that Antiochus did beare to Queene Stratonica, his step-mother. For hee beeing sicke, euen to the venemous extremity, and affecting much rather to dye, then any way to discover the cause of this disease, and that it proceeded from the loue he bare vnto his Fathers wife: Vpon a sudden shee entred into the Chamber, euen as the Physition was the feeling the pulse of his patient, which moued so strongly vpon the Queenes entrance, that Erasistratus evidently gathered thereby, that not onely he was enamored of her, but also, that it was the maine cause of his desperate disease. Heereupon, he practised how to acquaint the King therewith: which at length (by good and acceptable means) he did, that would require too long time here to relate, because the History is sufficiently knowne.

The case being likewise experimented by the Father himselfe, and he perceiving the danger wherein his Son was thought good (although it went quite against his Sonnes intention, who desired death, rather then to be recovered by his Fathers losse) to deprime himselfe of his Queene, and giue her vnto his sickly Sonne. And to speake vprightly, the age, beauty of the Lady, and equality for marriage, agreed much more conformably with the youthfull Sonne, then the ouer-aged Father. And this was the cause, that Antiochus liued healthfully and pleasantly (for many yeares after) with his best beloued Stratonica; as the History more at large declareth, being recorded by Plutarch, in the life of Demetrius. And this is the reason, why Physitions do aduise to raise the pulse of any amorous person, and to recount diuers names to him or her, among which, may be the name of the party affected: for so soone as that is once vnderstood, the pulse will beate apace & strongly, by which meane, the party beloued is knowne. By diuers other signes, it may be perceived, when any one is in loue, and to whom the affection tendeth: which signs I cease to speake of, because they are knowne to too many.

CHAP. XX.

Of the strange and furious loue of a young Athenian: and of the ridiculous loue of King Xerxes: and how Beasts haue many times affected both men and women.

OR a man to loue a woman, and a woman a man, it is a matter conformable to nature, and worthy to be beleeued and embraced: but whee blinde-fold folly attaineth to such a head, as those things wherof I am instantly to speake; it may well appeare to be impossible, and no way deserving any credite. Very learned and good Historiographers, haue written and recorded for truth, that in the City of Athenes there liued a young man, descended of an honest parentage, of competent wealth, and sufficiently knowne; who hauing oftentimes earnestly obserued a Marble Statue, most curiously and ingeniously wrought, and created in a publicke place of Athenes, became so extremely enamored thereof, as he had no power to absent himselfe from the place where it was fixed, but would hugge and embrace it very affectionately, & alwayes when he was not by it, hee found himselfe very ill and sickly disposed. At length, this passion grew to such extremity, as hee ran to the Senate house, and there before the reuerend Senators, he made very liberrall offers of money, humbly entreating the so much to fauour him, that hee might haue the Statue in his owne possession. This seemed no way pleasing to the Senate, neither could their authority stretch so farre, as eyther to giue or sell a publicke Statue. VVhen he perceived his request to be denied, hee became much afflicted with griefe and anguish of minde, & repaying to the Statue, enriched the head thereof with a Crowne of gold, and the body with garments and iewels of vnuallable price. This being done, hee would stand amorously beholding it, and many times fall on his knees before it, offering all worship and adoration thereto: and so long he continued in this vnreprouable folly, till (being stridly commanded the contrary by the Senate) he slew himselfe before it with rage and anger.

Doubtlesse, this was a case very admirable, and yet I must acquaint you with another, much more strange & ridiculous; yet credibly auouched by so many good Authors, concerning the loue of King Xerxes; as it may well be said, that hee exceeded all men of the world in folly. He grew enamored, of a Plantaney of Plane-tree a Tree sufficiently knowne, except in some few parts; and he would kiss & embrace it with like affection, as if it had bin a beautiful woman.

If these accidents haue happened among men endued with reason; what shall we say then of brute Beasts; that haue affected both men and women; and the same confirmed by great and famous Historians? As of Glauce, so extremely affected by a Ramme; that it would neuer be from her: and Dolphins also haue bene very admirably affectionate towards men. Helianus reciteth in his Booke of Beasts, a matter well deserving to be related. He saith, a Dolphin espousing young children playing on the Sea-shore; one among all the rest, which seemed to him the most lovely and beautifull, hee became so enamored of, that at every time when the Dolphin saw him, hee would draw nere to the Banke, and shew himselfe vnto the childe, who (at the first) was much affrighted, and fled away from him. But afterward, by the perturance which the Dolphin vsed from day to day, expressing manifest signes of entrie loue to the childe, he grew the lesse timorous, and by the pastimes which the Dolphin continually made before him, hee waxed bold and hardy, and would venter into the water to him, not fearing to mount vpon his back, making a signe, and commanding (as it were) the Dolphin, to swim a great way into the Sea with him, and then (vpon a contrary signe or command, and when he was weary) to returne backe againe with him to land. In this pleasure and pastime, diuers dayes were spent, for the Dolphin euermore would be ready at the Bancke, when as the childe came to make vse of this delight.

But one time, the most vnhappy of all other, the childe would needs put off his cloathes (as formerly hee had not done) because he purposed to swimme farre into the Sea. And being not carefull in seeing himselfe on the Dolphines backe, or how to sit for his safetie holding on his chace, tracens of the shipp-pointed finnes, which riseth out of Dolphines wings (for so are they termed by Pliny, and others) ran fo for into the childes belly, & wounded him in such sort, that instantly he fell downe dead in the water. Which when the Dolphine perceiued, and the blood of the dead child trickling downe his sides, he took up his deare lou'd child so well as he could, and returning backe to land suddenly, euen as if hee intended to revenge this offence vpon himselfe; hee swam furiously on land out of the water, and presently dyed by the childre.

This Historie is also recorded by Pliny, with many other examples of Dolphines that haue declared great love and kinde to men. Particularly hee reports howe, in the time of the Emperour Octavianus, that a Dolphine (in the very like sort) tooke delight in an infant, on the Sea-coast, nere to Patoli, and when hee took this childre, being named Simon (for ioisfaid, that Dolphines will suddenly runne to the very sound of that name) came to the shoare: the childre would mount vpon his backe, and be carried into the Sea, passing and returning alwaies safely to land. He saith moreover, that the childre dying by sicknesse, & the Dolphine often comming to the viual meeting place, & not finding the childre there, dyed with griefe and sorrow. The younger Pliny, Nephew to great Pliny, declareth many meruailes of a Dolphine, in the 9. Booke of his Epistles: especially in that Epistle which beginneth, Indici in mari-am verum.

CHAP. XXI.

Of a man, that by receiving a wound at his enemies hand, was delivered from a deadly danger, wherein he had long time liued: With sundry other examples to the same purpose.

We haue formerly related, that Musique hath beene the meanes of curing some diseases, and no way to be reputed incredible: considering, that wee finde by other stranger meanes, very great infirmities haue likewise bene holpen. Plutarch, in a notable Treatise by him composed, declaring how men may deuise profite or benefite from their enemies, reporteth; that a man had a certaine enemy, named Prometheus, who hated him extremely, and fought all the meanes he could deuise to kill him. It fortuned, that meeting with him on a day, hee gaue him diuers hurts, and among the rest, hee chance to wound an olde vicer, that had long liuen in the flesh, couered ouer with skinned, a matter of great danger to his life, and (for which) all helpe was viterly denied him. Neuerthelesse, this wound proued the onely meanes of his helpe, and safe deliuerance from the former danger: for in thinking to kill him, and to quench his malice; hee gaue him life and soundnesse of health: Valerius reciteth the very same history (among other noteworthy matters) in his Booke of miracles: but he affirmeth the mans name that was healed by this wound, to bee Iason Phereus.

Pliny writeth of another man, named Phalerus, who had an incurable disease, in regard of a fluxe of blood, continually flowing out at his mouth, caused by breaking a veine within his body. And finding himselfe in desperate condition of any curing, he entred suddenly into an Army, without any Armes for his defence, that being there slaine among the enemies, his hope and helpe might both finish together. It came to passe, that receiving a dangerous wound vpon the breast, there issued forth such an abundance of blood from that hurt, that the fluxe (hauing formerly his vent at the mouth only) ceased, and Chyrurgions afterward, with the aduice of skillfull Physicians, consolidating the broken veine, hee remained soundly healed of all harmes.

I finde it also recorded of Quintus Fabius, that he hauing had a Feauer quartane for many yeares together, giuing battaile one day to the Allobroges, now named Sauoyans, the extreme heate in desire which he had then to fight; quite expelled the Feauer, and it neuer toucht him afterward.

I my selfe can testifie, that I both saw, and well knew the man, who had receiued a wound in his thigh, whereof he became stark lame, and voyde of all hope of any remedy, happening afterward into an vnexpected quarrell, hee receiued an other wound vpon the same thigh, and in the place where the former chaunced. The Chirurgions in dressing this latter harme, did very well perceiue that the nerues which had bene cut before, beganne to stretch and restore themselves in such sort, that being cured of this second hurt, his thigh was soundly recouered, and hee went as vpight as euer hee did, and without the least limping. So did it happen to Telephus, one of the sonnes to Hercules, and King of Myssa, who being wounded in his owne Countrey by Achilles, could not any way be cured, till eight yeres after, he was wounded agayne by the same Achilles, and in the selfe same part of his body, before Troy, then besieged, and the rust of the same Speare that formerly had hurt him, proued to be his onely help.

CHAP. XXII.

Who was the first that planted the Vine: And who beganne to put vnder into wine. To what, and in what manner the Romaines did prohibite Wine: With many other notable things tending to the same purpose.

F all the fruites which the earth yeeldeth (I mean those whereof liquor is made) there is none (in my iudgement) more profitable then good wine; provided, that it be temperately taken. For this cause was it that Anacharsis sayd, The vine produceth three Grapes: The first of Pleasure: The second of Drunkenesse: And the third of Teares and Sadnesse. So that hee which passeth the first Cuppe, that is to say, a little, and moderately receiued, proceedeth on to shame and danger.

Prophane Authours, that neuer had any vnderstanding of the sacred Scriptures, doe name vs diuerse inueners of wine. Diodorus Siculus, in his fourth booke attributeth the inuention of wine, and first planting of the Vine, to Diomysius the sonne of Iupiter, named Nacchus; and Zib-pater, so styled, for the liberty of wine. For this inuention a Temple was erected to him, vnderneath the Capitoll at Rome: where they celebrated his Feastes, which were called Diomysians, or Bacchanalians, very dishonest, and full of great lubricity. That the inuention came from these Diomysians, Virgil giueth assurance, at the entrance into his second booke of Georgicks. Howbeit, Martianus Capellus saith, that Diomysius only instructed the Greeks, in the manner of making wine. Others say, that Icarus father to Erigone, first taught the industry of making wine to the Athenians: and becoming afterwards drunke thereby, the people slew him. In Italy, they say, that Sauus did first plant the Vine there, and brought the young suckers and plants from the life of Candide thither. And Plutarch writeth, that Drusus Helvius brought Vines first into France. But the truth of historie is, that the first inuenter of wine, was Noah, and the first that made himselfe drunke therewith: whereof are Authours (besides that which is recorded in the ninth chapter of Genesis) Lactantius, Firminus, and Iosephus. Noah, at his coming forth of the Arke, planted the Vine with his owne proper hand, and drunke the iuyce of the raisin, whereby he became drunken: and discouering his nakednesse in sleeping, it happened to him by his sonnes, according as we read in the same chapter of Genesis.

Afterwards, men attayning to know the fauour of wine, did drinke it, at the first, wholly pure of it selfe, and without the commixtion of any water: for as Pliny auoucheth, one named Sauus was the first that did put water into wine, to temperate and qualifie it. By the meanes of which aduice, great good and healthfulness ensued to the world: because, wine being so made moderate, procured verie good and excellent effects. In like manner Plato, alleadged by Macrobius, in his second booke, sayth: Wine moderately taken, strengtheneth the vnderstanding of a man, augmenteth his force and vigour, maketh the heart cheerefull and deliberate, and taketh away irkesome thoughts, and all offen-

fine perturbations. Plinie sayth, The use of Wine, receiving is temperately, multiplieth our forces, encreaseth blond and colour in the face: The nerves are fortified by wine, fight strengthened, the stomacke made vigorous, and appetite awaked: It promoueth urine, impeacheth vomiting, expelleth melancholie, maketh the heart sprightly, and serueth for many other good things. Alcibiades the Physition, wrote a booke by it selfe, wholly concerning the vertues of wine. And saint Paul writing to Timothy? counselleth him to drinke a little wine tempered, to strengthen his stomacke.

Physitions doe make vfe of wine in many medicines, because wine restoreth all the humours, re-enforceth blood where it fayleth, gladdeth a melancholy disposition, dissipeth and dryeth vp flegme, humecteth and helpeth to purge chollier. Plato, introducing Socrates, sayth thus in commending wine, Like as moderate rains doe encrease our hearbs, and tempests and inundations of waters doe rent them up and destroy them: Even so, wine temperately taken, cheareth the spirites, and fortifieth the vertues of the body, whereas comararive, over-much, and immoderately received, destroyeth all. Not so much as the very odour and smell of wine, but it is highly commended (beyond all other odours) by our naturall Philosophers: because it is very comfortatiue, giueth great vigour to the spirites, and is exceeding liuely and piercing. But yet wee must consider withall, that the chiefe vertue of wine is euermore vnderstood, when it is qualified and made temperate.

The ancient Romans did wholly take away the vfe of wine from women and children: as Valerius sayth, speaking of the customes and lawes of the Romans. So that, as Plinie affirmeth, at such time as Romulus reigned in Rome, a husband slew his wife, because shee had drunke wine; and in regard that the murder followed vpon this occasion, Romulus pardoned it. The vice of drinking wine, was held to be so odious in women, that Fabius Pictor reporteth, because a Romane woman had deceiued the Clarke of a celler, onely to drinke wine which was kept therein; her parents caused her to be starued to death. And hereupon grew the custome of fathers and mothers kissing their children on the mouthes; onely to perceiue thereby, whether they had drunke wine or no. We finde it in good record, that N. Domitius being Iudge of Rome, hee depriued a woman of her Dowry, because shee had drunke more wine, then was allowed her for her health. Salomon in his Proverbs sayth, It is not for Kings to drinke wine, or Princes strong drinke, lest he drinke and forget the Decree, and change the iudgement of all the children of affliction. And yet we reade, that the Kings of Egypt were permitted to drinke wine, so it were moderately, and in a certayne measure.

Vpon a time, Romulus being then King of Rome, and invited to a bountifull banquet, he would drinke but very little wine, saying, To morrow I am to determine a matter of great importance. Auicenn sayth, In giuing children wine to drinke, it is an addition of fire to fire. Aristotle exprefly forbade the giuing of wine to children, and likewise to the Nurseries that gaue them sucke. Plato by the laws which he made in his Booke, for the common-wealth, although he seemes in the first booke, to admit a tollerage of wines, yet in the second he sayth, A man ought to drinke a little, and well qualified. This allowance stretch not to any one, till he had attained to 18. yeares of age, and so to continue till hee were forty: but it must be alwayes doone in the presence of olde men, to the end that he might be reprooued, when in the least manner hee exceeded. From forty yeares vpward, hee permitted that a little more then hee had formerly demanded, should be giuen him; to make the colde and melancholy disposition (of that age) the more temperate; and yet it must be doone in a certayne measure too. It was his charge also, that seruants should drinke no wine, neyther Iudges, Magistrates, or any that held any publique iurisdiction: and as for yong men that studied, he aduised them, not to drinke any. Auicenn alloweth Platoes law, in this poynt, as a rule for Physicke: And thereto likewise Galen consenteth. Alexander Aphrodisiens sayth in his Problems, Hee which drinketh nothing but water onely, hath his sight and other senses more liuely, then he that drinketh wine.

Now, as concerning in what fashion and manner, wine should be tempered and qualified; there are many rules, and diuersities sities of opinions. Hesiodus the Greek Poet saith, That in one quart of wine there should be three quarts of water mingled. Athenens sayth, that the ancient Greekes vfe to put fure partes of water into two partes of wine, and most times three partes of water, into one of wine, which is the rule of Hesiodus. Heere also is to be observed, that the Greekes did not put water into their wine, but wine into water, and Theophrastus assureth vs, that by this way, both the one and the other are much the better mingled. Morauer, ancient men did not onely moderate wine in this manner, but albeit it was thus tempered, they would drinke very little thereof. Eubulus the Greece Poet doth asseme, introducing Bacchus, to speake thus vnto the Sages: I will neuer make more then three gifies of wine: The first, for health: The second, for taste: And the third, for sleep; the rest I auoweth of disorder and drunkenness. Apuleius Panastus, who wrote of meates, deliuereth the like Iudgement, attributing this manner to three seuerall daughters. The first, to the Graces: The second, to Venus: And the third, to shame and danger. Julius Caesar was very temperate in drinking wine: as Suetonius witnesseth by the testimonie of Cato, who was vter enemy to Cesar. Demosthenes, the excellent Oratour, was the like. And Apollonius Thyanens of whom so many famous things are written, did neuer drinke any Wine, or feede vpon flesh.

In our Christian Religion, temperance (in drinking) is much commended. Saint James the lesler, did neuer drinke wine, or strong drinke, nor did euer cate any flesh; imitating Saint Iohn the Baptist. Wee finde the like affirmed of Saint Stephen, King of Portugall. Iosephus in his Antiquities commending the holiness of the Essens, (who helde one of the three Sects amongst the Iewes, whereof the other two were Pharises and Saducees) sayth: That the Essens did neuer drinke wine. In an Epistle Saint Hierome reprooued Priests, that addicted themselves to drinke wine, telling them, That Saint Paul the Apostle did forbid it, and that in the ancient Law, such as serued in the Temple, did not drinke wine, or any other drinke that might procure drunkenness.

Such as are teamed good drinkers, vfe to say, that good wine ought to haue foure properties, to answer foure senses or vnderstandings of the body: To the taste, by fauour: To the smell, by a perfect odour: To the sight, by a neat and cleare colour: And to the care, by a good report of the Countrey where it was made. Of this good wine men vfe to make vineger, which hath many good properties and inconueniences likewise: wherein I will be silent, because they are matters too vulgar and common.

CHAP. XXIII.

Of many damages and dangers, which ensue by the immoderate drinking of wine. And how it hath bene held as a healthfull thing (by some Physitions) to be drunke sometimes.

Although the liquor called Wine, be apt and whole some for diuers infirmities: yet notwithstanding, so many harmes and annoyances do arise, from the excessive immoderate taking thereof, that the euills doe surpass bound all the goods ensuing thereby. So that it appeareth, that it were better not to know it, but rather to content our felues with water, which God hath giuen vs for our drinke; because hee thought nothing meet for vs, and all other creatures doe well content themselves therewith. Heere also may be added, that wine hath bene the onely occasion, by which many haue become distracted in their senses; some haue lost their liues, and others not meanly endangered the saluation of their soules.

Now, although the harmes ensuing to men (by Wine) are too apparently knowne: yet notwithstanding, they are so far from shunning & auoyding them, that they daily seeke after new occasions, and strange deuised appetites for drinking. And in our best French language, these new appetites are titled by some;

Foure seuerall properties necessarily required to be in good wine.

All creatures but man onely doe well content themselves with the drinking of water.

A pur or prouocation to a cup of wine; by others, A thooing horne, to draw on a quart or two of good wine, so that a slice of a Gambone of Bacon, is held (in this case) for a precious relique, and few hours in the day or night doth passe ouer them, but the cups kilt with sound deuotion in drinking; sometimes taking siue or fixe cups more then are necessary. Pliny saith, there are some men, who will drinke before they be thirstly, and wine onely (among all other drinks) hath this property, to cause it selfe to be drunke, before a man haue any need of it. He saith moreover, that some do drinke in such sort as they iustly deserue; for it giues them (immediately) the due punishment to such sinne: for the vapour mounting vp into the braine, bereaueth them of all vnderstanding, so that they remaine as men senselesse. And hauing plaid it off lustily (as they vse to teame it) for some quantity of time; it plaith with them as the Cat doth with the Mouſe, either kills them outright, or (at least) engendereth so many harmes and infirmities, as are much worse then death it selfe; as Gouts, Palfies in the head, hands and feete, imbrodering the eyes with a scarlet coulour, burning vp the Liuer, and fiering the face, beside diuers other such vndecent and scarce-gracefull qualities, no way fit to be vsed among men indeed.

Cato said, Drunkennesse is a voluntary folly. And Pliny saith, it confoundeth the memory, and procureth dreadfull dreames. Seneca, writing to Lucullus, saith: Wine maketh the legges and armes impotent, and causeth men to become luxurious. Dionysius Areopagita, alleading Plato to haue spoken the words, saith: Drunkennesse is a lively and merry Minitrill, and yet it makes our legges to sile vnder vs, giuing (as wee vse to say in France) a ripp to our heeles, and laying vs along on the ground. Saint Paul writing unto the Ephesians, aduised them to thunne wine, because therein is luxury. And Solomon in his Proverbs, among the imperfections of wine, saith: It is a deceiver, and whoseuer drinketh excessively thereof, cannot conceale a secret faithfully. Heereupon then arose the ancient Proverbe; That wine walketh without any shoes; that is to say, It treadeth feerely, softly, and without any noyse, because no one should perceiue the power thereof, nor how it discouereth our secret and vicious qualities. To this purpose the Poet Aeschylus saide: A Glasse or Mirrour maketh knowne the gestures of the body, and wine serueth as a Glasse to the soule & heart of a man. Plato likewise said: Wine principally laith open the manner and conditions of eueryman. We haue example thereof in Noah and Lot, for Noah being drunk with wine, discouered his parts of shame, whereby he became mocked and scorned. And against Lot, Sodom could haue no power; but wine ouercame him, & made him to lye with his owne Daughters: these are the benefits ensuing by wine.

Among the Lawes which Solon (one of the seuen graue Sages of Greece) gaue to the Athenians; it was especially ordayned, that the Prince, when hee became drunke, should be slaine. Pittacus, another of those wise men, ordayned, that a drunken man committing any delict or great offence, should bee doubly punished: once for the fafte it selfe, and next for drunkennesse, which caused him to do it.

Aristotle in his Problems, yeeldeth areason, why such men as are ouer-much addicted to wine, are greatly disabled in the begetting of children: and likewise, why some drunkards are very pleasant in their drinke; and others terrible, some sad and weeping, others iocund and dancing.

Neuerthelesse, some Physitions (among who are Auicene and Rasis) haue helde opinion, that it is a wholsome thing to be drunke sometimes: but the reasons which they giue in this case, doth not content me any way, neither doe I allow of their opinion. And yet I must needs confesse, that very great personages haue bene subiect to wine; whereas on the contrary, if they had stood cleare and free from it, their glory and renowne had bin farre greater.

Alexander the Great, was as greatly taxed with this vice, so that (as diuers good Historians do affirme) being overcome with this tury; he slew one of his most intimate friends; and comming (afterward) to acknowledgement of his fault, he would haue slaine himselfe. Beside, it is further alledged, that the cheefest cause of his murders and slaughters, was onely this poyson to all goodnesse.

The Emperour Tiberius was defectiue in many things; but in regard hee was a great drinker, it was the sole cause of all his other imperfections: and whereas his name was Tiberius, as a nick-name, they would often call him Biberius, and his ende was miserable.

Dionysius the younger, a Tyrant of Sicily was so extremely affected to wine; that it did eate his eyes, and made him to become starke blinde. Cleomedes, King of the Spartans, would needs pursue and imitate the Scythians, in excessiue drinking of wine: but in the end, he became a foole, quite insensate, and without iudgement. It is saide, that the Philosopher Archebius died in notorious drunkennesse.

The Poet Anacron was a very great drinker, and as he was drinking, he strangled or choked himselfe, with the stone of a Grape or Raisin, which entred into his throat vnauidedly.

Flauius the Bishop, an Historian of worthy credite, writeth, that the Emperour Bonifolius was so addicted to wine, that Aurelianus said of him: Hee was not borne to lye, but to drinke. And heerein hee had an admirable quality, for notwithstanding the immeasurable quantity of wine, which he dranke daily, yet hee was neuer drunke. I guesse that this ensued, by his continuall auoydance of vrine, which went from him as fast, as hee tooke in his wine. Neuerthelesse, his ende was answerable to his deservings, for being vanquished by the Emperour Probus, he was hanged or strangled. It is recorded, that King Antiochus, who was conquered by the Romanes, vsed to drinke so much wine, that he slept the most part of his time. In regard whereof, he gaue the cheefest authority of his kingdomes government, to two of his choysest fauourites, and because himselfe was addicted to banquets, and the amorous embracings of a young Gentlewoman; when he came to fight against the Romanes, his Army became broken, and vtterly vanquished. Athenius writeth, that Aeschylus the Greeke Poet, would diuers times be drunk, whereupon Sophocles said vnto him. Aeschylus, those things which thou diuinest or writest, are done by chance, or as aduenture: and not by any knowledge remaining in thee, or that thou dost rightly vnderstand them.

CHAP. XXIII.

Certaine aduices and enstruitions, against such forward affection to Wine. And some reasons deliuered, why two things doe appere to bee three, to such as bee drunke.

Some haue said (how certainly I know not) that there are diuers receipts, whereby Wine, in how great a quantity soeuer it be taken and drunke, shall not procure those ykesome effects, which are related in the former Chapter.

Pliny and Solinus do both of them affirme, that there is a blacke Stone, hauing Vermillion colouored weynes in it, and named Dionisse, which hath such a property, as if it bee layde in water, it yeeldeth the perfect fauour and relisht of wine; and whoseuer drinketh of that water, euen so much as himselfe pleaseth, shall neuer be drunke therewith. Physitions say, that if a man will preuent drunkennesse; he must first eate Honye, or some other sweete things: And hee that is drunke, must be vrged to vomite, and then giue him a morzell of bread steeped in Honye, which will immediately recouer him, because Honye hindereth all vapours from ascending vpp into the Head.

admirable physick, to preferre him from being drunke, albeit he daily drank more wine then any other one man of his time: for he could out-drinke all commers, yet neuer be drunke, or bereft of his iudgement. But in the ende it was knowne, that (visually) before hee entred drinking, he would cate flic or fawer bitter almonds, whose power and naturall property was such, as it impeached the wine from alienating his spirits. And experience thereof was afterward made, for when they abridged him from the meanes of eating bitter Almonds, and he vsing to drinke as formerly he did he became as soon drunk as any other man. That these Almonds haue this peculiar property, Pliny affirmeth it, adding further; that eating a Rad-dish roote before hard drinking, auoideth drunkenesse. He saith also, that Cole-wortes eaten before hand, keepeth a man from being distempred with wine: and being eaten after drunkenesse, they remove instantly the distemperature, as Saffron also hath the selfe-same power. There are many other remedies for this imperfection, wherein I will be silent; speaking onely of one, recited by Pliny. He saith, that taking a quantity of wine, mingled with the egges of a Chough, and being drunke two or three mornings together, he that drinketh it, will hate wine in such sort, as he will neuer after drinke thereof. Heere to he addeth, that a Swallow being taken and burned to ashes, then beaten into powder and mingled with a little Myrrhe in the wine; whofoever recey-ueth a draught of this potion, shall neuer be drunke, for this was experimented by Horus, King of Affrya.

Aristotle, in the third part of his Problems, and Aucenne, in his sixt Booke of Beasts, do yeld a reason, why in drunkenesse, when a man looketh vpon any one thing, it appeares to him as if it were two, and abeit they doe both produce diuers reasons, yet will I alledge but one from each of them. The first shall be Aristotles, who saith, that thorow exceffue heat of vapours in the wine, ascending vp into the braine; the little nerues, called Optic nerui, which go on directly to the eyes, do worke and mooue with such power, that the visall vertue, and the spirits of sight (altering in their motion) do cause what-foever drunken men gaze on, to shewe very strongly and quicke; because the Organe of sight moueth it selfe in that manner, and maketh the common sense to receiue the Images of things, in a multiplyed quality to the eye. For such kinde of motion, maketh single things to seeme double, and because this motion is so sudden and insensible, it causeth two things to seeme as one to the sight. As any man may easily make tryall of, by laying his finger vpon his eye-lid, and then removing it thence, it will appeare to him, that it is the thing remoueth it selfe, which he beholdeth. Aucenne deliuereth another reason, saying: The vapours of wine, which ascend up into the head of him that is drunke, are moist, and because the little nerues and muscles which reach to the eyes, doe engrosse or swell themselves by this humidity, so much more the one (then the other) doe thereby mount themselves, the one higher, and the other lower. From hence ensueth, that the visible rayes do not equally diuide themselves forth-right from both the eyes, neither by a direct or right line: which is the cause, that the Images of things visible, doe extend to eithr eye by themselves. In this respect only, things simple and single, appeare to be double, the common sense receyuing & apprehending two Images for one: and for the maintenance of this opinion, Aucenne yeldeth the selfe-same example, as Aristotle did.

required to be well apprehended. Neuerthelesse, I am the more willing to speake somewhat of the argument, onely for the delight and contentment of such mindes, as are enclined to the Science whereof it discourseth. Wherefore concerning our present purpose, it is needfull to presuppose, the first and cheefe Elements of such a Science: which because they are common, shall require the lesse labor to proue them. The first is that whereof wee are now treating, the greatnesse of the earth, carrying with it both Land and Sea: because God did dispose them in such manner, when he said; Let the dry Land appeare, for they both being vniued together, made one body perfectly round. So likewise it is to bee vnderstood in all those actions which are giuen to the earth, the Sea is also therein comprized: For, when a man sayth, the earth hath so many degrees in roundnesse, or it containeth so many degrees from one place to another; the sea is therein as well vnderstood as the land. So in like manner are considered the Ecclypses, heights and breadths, to hold one and the same certitude: and yet notwithstanding, Mountaines, and Valleys are not comprehended in this roundure, nor Woodes or Forrests likewise, which the earth containeth in it selfe; because such things are not woorthie of any account, with the greatnesse of this wonderful bodie.

This rotundity of Land and Water, is seated in the midde of the circuite of Heauen, in such manner, as the point & center of that round body, composed of Sea and Land, is likewise the center and number of the whole world, as well of heauen, as of the Elements.ouer and beside this definition, there is another, true and absolute, to wit, that the land and water (in regard of the starry heauen, which we call the Firmament) are so litle; that all these two Elements serue thereto but for a center, and is euen but as a small point, in respect of his circumference. So that in whatsoeuer part thereof a man best liketh to helpe himselfe, by meanes of a Quadrant or an Astrolabe; his labour forthet to the like effect, as if hee made the same for the center of the earth. For in whatsoeuer place of the earth we are (provided that it be not in any deepe or hollow bottom) we shall discouer the moity of heauen; which proceedeth by reason of the incomprehensible distance, that is from hence beneath vp to the Firmament, with his incompareable greatnesse. That this muft needs be true, it is most euident, that the verie least Starre which we discern in heauen, is much more greater then the whole earth; and yet neuerthelesse, it appeareth to vs but as a small point, in regard of the heauens large spaciousnesse; by the least of which things, a man may make proue in sufficient demonstration, but it sufficeth that experience hath apparently shewne the same.

Protony approacheth it, in the 10. chapter of his first booke of Geography, Alphraganus, in his fourth Difference, Alcomedes, in his first Booke; Geber, in his second Booke; and Iohn de Sacrobosco, on the like do all other that haue written on the Sphære.

This then being thus presupposed, let vs imagine in our mindes, that the vwater and Land do make one round circle, and that heauen is another, but much more great, as indeede it is; and that these two circles haue no other, but one common center within them. Which being so imagined, let vs lay two lines of equall greatnesse, which may extend themselves (in common) to the circumferences of al the two circles, according as Euclides entrueth, cutting and diuiding the two Circles by equall portions, each portion being iustly equalled, in regard of each one of them: that is to say, that if those two lines passe on right in such manner, they will make eight parts of a great circle, and so shall make as much of the lesser, I vnderstand and meane each eight part, in respect of each ones greatnesse.

Our elders in former times, in their manner of measuring the world, gaue aduice to diuide the heauen into three hundred and threescore equal partes, which we do now cal degrees, & by consequent, the roundnesse of the earth into as manie parts, by imaginations of lines, passing from the center, and making the diuision in such manner, that the like quantitie which each one of the degrees hath, in respect of the whole heauen; the verie like shall be that of each one of the degrees for the earth, having regard to the roundure and circuite thereof. And as these portions or degrees, if you please so to terme them, them, are equal among themselves, so that some one may appear to containe the scope of miles; the like may be easily gathered, by multiplying what distance is contained in all the rest. To know then the nature of a degree, they made this obseruation. The Pole is a fixed point in heauen, whereon the whole heauen maketh his mouing, yet it remaineth firme & stable. Therefore with an Astrolabe, or any other instrument proper thereto, being in some apt vncovered place, they would take the height which the Pole contained about the Horizon, within the limite of the selfesame sight, and noting the place which appeared conuenable to the eleuation or height of the foresaide Pole: they went directly on thereto, without wandering to the Meridian, vntill such time (as with the selfesame instrument) they found it in one degree more higher, then in the first place, and thereby they knew, that they had gone one degree of the earth fro that place whence they first parted, iust to that ground where they were arrived, considering, that they had paced by the respect of heauen, in regarde of the fore-named rules of both the circles. Then they would measure that which this degree contained, either by Stades, or thousands of paces; and this being thus knowne by them, they would make their account after this manner. If one degree contained so many miles, the whole roundnes of the earth did containe as many: considering, that therein was to be obserued three hundred and threecore degrees, such and as great as the same were. This was the forme and manner by them obserued, and it may wel bee continued to these times, for measuring of the whole earth, as being the most certaine and infallible.

And yet neuertheless we are to know, what greatnesse each degree of the earth containeth in it selfe, and so (by consequent) how much it tendeth to in the roundity, measuring it according vnto the whole greatnesse, answerable to the experience of both ancient and modern men, skillfull, and well studied therein. The most common opinion of all other, is; that each degree or portion of three hundred and threecore, containeth fise hundred Stades of ground, and every Stade is valewed to fix score and fise paces by our Geometricians, and according to they

Geometrical paces, each pace containing as much as two of our common paces. So that the degree containes sixty two thousand and an halfe, which amount to fixtie two thousand Geometrical paces. Ptolemy auoucheth the same; as the like doeth Martianus Capellus, and the most part of the wisest ancient Cosmographers: beside, this is the opinion in common, of the greater part of our moderne men.

Orontius Phineus holdeth the same iudgment, and sayeth, that this may easily bee experimented by traauailing from Paris to Tholouse, Glareanus, & Anthonie de Lebriz, being both of them learned men, and diligent searchers into these matters: they do both affirme, that they haue made the like experience, holding the same for most certaine. Albeir Erastosthenes, and some other Gracians hold opinion, that all degrees had seauen hundred Stades: wheerein (it may seeme) they were abused, by measuring their places ouerthorow. I say then, that each of their degrees, consisting of three hundred and sixty, far off from fise hundred Stades: the whol three hundred and sixty, wil containe together, twenty two thousand, and fise hundred thousand paces, which do make an hundred and eighty thousand Stades. By the which account, the round compas of the whole earth, comprehending therein the whole machine of water, being reduced to a thousand paces, will containe twentie two millions, and fise hundred thousand paces. And if you would know how many French leagues or miles the whole Earth containeth, we must then allow vnto each League, the length of two Italian miles. Then, if we diuide twenty two thousand, fise hundred paces in twaine, we shal find that the circuite of the earth, containeth eleuen thousand, two hundred and fiftie Leagues of France. And if we diuide the by foure; all the enuironing of the Earth, will containe fise thousand, sixe hundred, and twentie fise miles of Germanie; for four Italian miles, do make but one Germanie mile. Thus haue we discoursed on the earths dimension, according vnto the most common opinion receiued among men.

CHAP. XXVI.

Of the reason, why Snow (being covered with straw) doth preserve it selfe in his entire coldnesse, and warme water in his heate: considering, that two contrary effects are wrought by one and the selfesame thing: with some other secrets beside.

The works of Nature yeild great benefite
by their knowledge.

Men of spirit, such as affect the contemplation of Natures works, nothing can so lightly present it self, or appeare to bee of so slender esteeme; but some one notable matter or other may be found therein, to yeild contentment to their mindes, after they haue attained to the knowledge thereof. No doubt but there are many men, of whom if it were demanded, vpon what occasion, Snow (being covered with straw) conserueth it selfe (for long time) in his true coldnesse, and without melting, they hardly knew how to make anie answer. Whereunto Alexander Aphrodisiense, that excellent Peripatetic, maketh this reply. Straw hath no manifest or known quality at all, for it is neither hot nor colde; therefore diuers haue reputed and termed it, to be a thing without any quality. For this cause, being a matter so singularly temperate and delicate, euen as reaching to such a degree, that it may well be saide to be neither hot nor colde; it easily conuerteth it selfe into the quality of anie such thing, as is thereto annexed. So that conuering or laying Snow therein, which is colde, the straw apprehendeth the colde quality thereof, and by that means is holpen and assisted, in the true coldnesse of Snow: euen as a thing of one qualitie aydeth another, without yielding any heate thereto, because it is not in it selfe. Therefore, snow being accompanied with his owne coldnesse, & defended against heat, which straw preferueth against the least entrance; it is thus conserued in his entyre condition for long time, euen as if it were not covered with straw at all.

A contrary effect wrought
by the same means to hot water, keeping it in his entire heat.

By the selfesame reason, a contrarie effect happeneth in warme or hotte water; defending the ayre that it cannot coole it, for it being likewise couered with Strawe, the strawe immediately entertaineth the quality of the warme water; and being so sodainly heated, it helpeth & conserueth the water in his warmth, and keepeth the ayre off, that else would coole it. The same reason guides vs to understand other doubts and difficulties, which some curious questionists may impose vpon vs, like vnto those before alledged. I am sure wee are not to learn, that ouer and beside our inward naturall heate, that which occasi-oneth our warmnesse in Summer time, is the ayre onely, which (in that season) is much more hot then in any other time of the yeare; so that the warmer the ayre is, so much the more are we sensible of heat. If it be so then, how commeth it to passe, that we feele more freshnesse and coole-nesse, and lesse heate, when wee take the ayre in Sommer, and in mouing and walking to receiue it; considering, that (according to Aristotles Motion, or mouing, causeth our heate to be the greater? For the ayre, by reason of this agitation, must needs cause the more warmnesse both in it selfe and vs, then if wee rested and sate in quiet.

The reason enlieth thus: VVee haue then more warmth in our bodies, then there is in the ayre; as well in regard of our owne naturall heat, as also that which the ayre worketh in vs. For the ayre coming with a fresh and coole gale (I speake this because it is more temperate then we ate) it maketh vs some-what the more temperate: but being still and neere vs, it warmeth it selfe in our heate. Euen in the like manner as we haue spoken of straw; for so it conserueth (yea augmenteth) our heate in vs; albeit, when it is stirred, and freshly moued, in comming more temperately vpon vs, then we our selues are; that temperature and difference which wee then feele of lesse heate, doth in the like manner qualifie and moderate ours in vs. This is the answer of the fore-named Alexander, but especially of Aristotle; vnto this question.

Neuertheless, it is to bee noted, that if we find an ayre more hot then that wherein we dwell; agitation or stirring in such an ayre will not proue so good as our owne, because wee shall there feele farre greater heate, as in diuers places often-times we do. An argument in this case,

The persecution of the Cardinals
with Arnold against the Arch-bishop.

They were no sooner arrived in Germany, but they summoned the Arch-Bishop to come before them, wher his hearing was admitted in such sort, that sentence was given against him, whereby he was deprived of his See and dignities, and Arnold advanced into his place, who had sold his Master, even as Indas did our blessed Saviour. In pronouncing the iudgement, the Arch-Bishop Henry then present, delivered these wordes. God knoweth, that I am most uniuersally condemned: nevertheless, I care not for making any appeale to the further confuſion of men: because I am assured, that lyes shall bee better beleued among you, then truth can be in mee. Therefore I receive this sentence, as fomes iust punishment for my finnes, and yet doe appeale from your indirecte doome, to the eternal iust iudge Iesus Christ: before whom I adourn you there to appeare.

These wordes were no sooner heard by the Iudges, but they fell into extremity of laughter, saying, That if he pleased to go on thither before, they would follow him at their leysure. This sentence was given in the yeare one thousand, five hundred, fifty six, which the deprived Arch-bishop endured with admirable patience: & being retired into his Monastery, he there remained the rest of his life, yet without acceptance of the habite. To conclude, God would not permit this wickednes to passe unpunished, to the end, that innocence might the better bee knowne: but about a yeare and an halfe after, this Henry dyed in his Monastery in great holiness, and doubtlesse attained the glorie long time desired.

Newes of his death being brought to Rome, the two Cardinals being very merrily met together, one of them, said: The Arch-Bishoppe Henry is gone, and must not we in halt follow him? Indeed (quoth the other) lo wee made him promise; & let him tarry (wherefoeuer he is) till wee come to him. Not many dayes after, one of them, being sodainly smitten by one of his seruants vpon the shoulder, fell downe so greuously afflicted with paine, that his bowels and entrailes issued out at his fundament, and instantly died. The other falling into phrensie and madnesse, did eate off his owne hand, and dyed very strangely. Now as concerning false Arnold, hee exercised such cruelties and seditions among the people, that he became so hated and despised of them all, as being one day besiedged in a Monastery; hee was there slayne, and afterward left lying naked in the common ditch of the Citie; whereall the people, both men, women, and children, performed all cruelties vpon his body, that possibly could be deuised by them.

CHAP. XXVIII.

Of the cruelty which Albounie, King of Lombardie, used to his Queene Paradine: And by what meanes she reuenged her selfe on him at length.

AMong those warlike people, which yssued out of Germany, and the Northerne partes, to descend into Italy; the Longobards are named, who for the space of two hundred yeares & more, seized all those Lands, which (till this day) is called Lombardie, and vntill such time as Charlemaine expelled them thence, according as in the History is amply related, written by Paulus Diaconus, in the particular Booke which he made for that purpose. He saith, that when they left Hungary (where they had for sometime dwelt) to passe into Italy, they had one named Albounie their King: a man of great spirit, and verie valiant in actions of warre. For he conquered in battayle Cusmod, King of the Girpides, and afterwards, causing his head to bee smitten off, made a drinking Cuppe thereof, wherein hee vsed to drinke, and in triumph of his conquest and victorie. At which time, he detained (as his prisoner) a verie beautiful daughter to the fore-named King, called Rosamond, whom he made his wife, and then afterwards hee went to subdue Italy, carrying his Queene along with him, in the yeare, eight hundred, sixty two.

When he had conquered many towne and Cities, he came (at length) to the City of Pausia: where (since that time) the succeeding Kinges vied to keepe their seate and continuall residing, as the very principall City of their Kingdome. Hauing reig-reigned three yeares and three moneths, and being then at Vrona; he appoynted a solemne feast, where hee drunke to his Queene in the Cuppe made of her fathers head, and forced her to pledge him: whereat shee conceiued such grieffe and displeasure, that the intire loue which shee had formerly borne him, was conuerted into deadly hatred, with an absolute resolute and conclusion to kill him, in iust reuenge of her fathers death, & cruelty extended to her. And to assist her in this determination, she conferred with a gentleman named Hermigilde: who presently tolde her, that to the execution of such an important busines, she should require the ayde of a valiant knight in the Court, called Paradine. Which instantly shee did, but he would not yeeld thereto, because hee tooke it to be too horrid a treason. Finding her hope frustrated, and fearing lest his intent would be discovered, yet desiring nothing more in the world, then to compasse the height and pitch of her enterprize: shee set aside all care of honour and honesty, & being aduertised by Hermigilde, that Paradine earnestly affected one of her attending Ladies, shee deuised thereby to effect her purpose. Being acquainted with the secreet resort where Paradine & his louer alwaies met together; shee found some other employment for the Lady, & made vse of her place for the time, Paradine keeping her there company a long time, imagining no other, but that it was the mistresse of his affections.

The Queene, who had spent all this while in soft whispers and dalliance, not vying any one word whereby shee might be discovered; perceiving opportunity to apply to fit her, spake thus vnto him. Knowest thou Paradine, who it is that keepeth thee company? Full well (quoth he) with my Mistresse, and then named her. Thou iycst (saith traytour), replied the Queene, I am Rosamond thy Soueraignes wife, whom thou hast dared to abuse in this manner, and dye thou must by the iust wrath of Albounie, except thou saue thy life by killing him: aduise thee therefore, whether his life or thine owne is dearest to thee. When Paradine considered his dangerous estate, without any meanes of helpe or escape; hee resolved to kill the King: and for his better further-rance therein, both hee, the Queene, and Hermigilde tooke counsell together, plotting the proiect in this manner.

The King vsed to sleepe in the heate of the day, and all else auoyded the chamber, the Queene onely excepted, and hee being a king of courage and high resolute, euerslepe like a Souldier, with his Sword girded about him: which at this intended time of treason, the Queene had tyed so fast in the scabbard, as hee could by no meanes helpe himselfe therewith. Paradine and Hermigilde waiting the houre, which was vpon the Queenes issuing forth: they entred, and for all their soitt treading, the King heard them, and started from his bed. VVhen he beheld two men armed with weapons, and at such a time of no suspition: fury not feare made him take no knowledge of them, but sought to defend himselfe with his weapon. VVhich failing him, by the meanes of so false a Queene, and they with their weapons euery where wounding him: hee caught vp a stoole, and therewith made his defence so long as hee could, till in the end they deprived him of life, yet neither noise heard, or any suspition of murder.

The king being thus dead, and all well carryed with a smooth countenance; Hermigilde possessed himselfe of the Palace, intending to make the Queene his wife, as immediately hee did. But notwithstanding all their close packing; the Lombardes (not long after) came to the knowledge of their Kings death, and in what manner hee was murdered, which they purposed to reuenge with all possible speed. Wherein they were prevented, for Rosamond and her complices hauing packed vp most of her Jewells & treasure Royall, fled away thence, carrying with them Aluifinda Daughter to King Albounie, by his first wife. And for their security, they went to Ranenna, where then gouerned a Lieutenant of the Empire, named Longinus, who kept that place for Tiberius, Sonne to the Emperour Constantine of Constantinople, by whom they were curiously entertained.

Not long after, Longinus becomming enamored of Rosamond, & desirous to enioy her in marriage, whereto hee found her very tractable, counselled her to procure the death of Hermigilde, & then hee would marry her. Shee that had lost all loue and

But when hee found it afterward to afflicke his body, so as he plainly perceiued himselfe to be paysoned; drawing forth his sword in extremity of rage, he compelled Rosamond to drinke vp all the rest that remayned in the Cup, so that at one instant time they both were iustly requited for the death of Albounie. Tydings hereof being brought to the Lieutenant Longinus, he caused the young Lady Almifinda to be seized on, and sent her (with all her jewels and treasure) to the Emperour Tiberius, at Constantinople, with Paradise also as a prisoner: where hauing his eyes pulled forth, he liued a while, and then died most miserably.

CHAP. XXIX.

Of a pleasant, witty, and honest deceit, which a famous and vertuous Queene vsed to her owne husband; whereby Iames, King of Arragon was begotten, with other remembrances both of his birth and death.

IVVell remember, that in reading the Chronicle of the Kings of Arragon; I finde, that Don Peter, Count of Barcelona, who was the seventh King of Arragon, had Madam Mary in marriage, daughter to the Earle of Mount Resulin. Nephew to the Emperour of Constantinople, the being a very beautiful and vertuous Lady. All which notwithstanding, the King was much addicted vnto other women, and vsed such slender testimony of lowe towards his Queene, that hee refused to keep her company, as (in the duty of an husband) he stood obliged to doe. This strange behaviour in the King, did much afflicke and greeue the Queene, because they had no childe to succeed in the Kingdome, the greatest misery (of all other) that can happen to a well seled Estate. Hereupon, by aduice of one of the Kings Pages of his Chamber, who (it may be) had formerly done seruice in the like affaires; shee compassed the meanes (vnder title of some one of the Kings cheefest fauourites) to bee brought that night to lodge with the King. Such familiar entercourses hauing passed betwene them, as in such wanton seasons are commonly required, the King perceiuing the day-light neere approaching, in regard both of his owne honours safety and hers, made meanes to her for her speedy departure, but she taking hold of so good an occasion, spake thus vnto him.

My gracious Lord and husband, I am none such as (perhaps) you take mee to be, but be well assured, that this night you haue slept with your true Queene and VVife. Vse what violence you shall please to mee, for I purpose not to leaue your bed, vntill some man, well deserving faith and credite, may be witness of my this nights keeping you company. To the ende, that if the fauour of heauen hath bin so gracious to me, that fruite (long desired) may ensue by this aduventure, the world shall take true notice, that it is your owne. The King perceiuing this honest deceit of his Queene, appeared to bee well pleased therewith, and called two Gentlemen of his Chamber, to testifie the truth, according to her desire, and as (indeed) stood best with his honour. It so pleased God, that at sit and convenient time, the Queene hauing at that instant time conceived with childe; at such due season as the custome of women alloweth them for traualle, shee was delivered of a goodly Sonne, euen on the first day of February, in the yeare one thousand, one hundred, ninety sixe. Soone after it was borne, the Mother caused it to bee carried to the Church, and (which is a thing deserving memory) as they which carried the childe entred into the Church, the Priests began to sing, Te Deum laudamus, Wee praise thee O God. Passing from thence vnto another Church, as they were entring likewise thereinto, the Priests began to sing the

With this conclusion, that the name of the Torch which first sayled, or became extinguished; the selfe same name should bee giuen to the childe, which happened to be that of S. Iames. Hereupon he was named Iames, because it was the name, which the men of Arragon gaue to that Apostle. Hee proued to be an excellent Prince, and of admirable gouernement, both in peace and warre, for hee made a cruell inuasion vpon the Moors, being euen more very liberal to his Souldiers. Among other most notable matters, hee leuied a great Army, which he conducted into the Isle of Maioica, that then was in the Moors possession, where hee fought many stout batailles. But after he had a long while besieged the City, he won it in the ende, and likewise other neighbouring Islands beside. Then comming into hiskingdome of the Moors, especially to the City of Carthage, hee proued still the Conqueror, and neuer sayled in any of his attempts.

CHAP. XXXIII.

Of an ancient and memorable Custome, obserued by the Inhabitants of the Province of Carinthia, at the Coronation of their Prince: and how cruell their punishment is to Theeues.

POpe Pius the second of that name, who was a man of great learning, & a diligent inquisitor for the truth of Histories, as wee haue in many places formerly alledged, saith in his description of the world; that the Province of Carinthia, is encloded within the territory, and vnder the gouernment of Austria. Hee likewise relateth a custome, which the Inhabitants of that Province haue anciently obserued, at the election and Coronation of their Princes; appearing some what strange, yet honest and very commendable. VVhich custome is also confirmed by A. Sabellius, in his tenth Decade; and by Sebastian Munster, in his composed Cosmography, which is after this manner.

In this Province of Carinthia, there is a very great and spacious plaine of olden ruined buildings, which seeme to bee the foundation of some former ancient City.

In which place also there is a great stone, and when obeylance is to be giuen at the new creation of a Prince; there is a day appointed, and a country labourer, or meane husbandman (allowed to this prehemine in regard of his lineage) hath order to leate himselfe vpon that same stone. On his right hand standeth a poore Cow, that hath lately calued, which hee holdeth fastened by a corde, on his left hand standeth a very leane and wretched Mare, yed in like manner, and round about him is no meane crowd of labourers and country Boores. In this place, and at this Stone, the Prince that is to be enstalled, must make his apparance, attended with a great number of men on horse-backe, ryding in very formal order, with twelve Banners borne before him: among which there is one more large and slightly then all the rest, carried by an Earle, thereto admitted by especiall priuiledge.

The Arch-Duke, Prince or great Lord howeuer ye meane to tearme him, clothed in a Shepheards habite, cometh to the Stone wheron the poore man sitteth, & as he perceiueh him to approach somewhat neere, hee demandeth with a loud voyce, what he is, that cometh towards him with such glory and felicity? Answer is instantly made him, that it is the man, who cometh to bee created Prince of the Country. Then as it were with a voyce like thunder, the labourer cryeth out. Is hee a iust Iudge? Will hee wel maintaine iustice? Will hee preferue the defence and safety of this Country? Is hee a man franke, and free-borne? Is hee valiant, vertuous, and worthy of honour and reuerence? Is hee a Christian? Is hee a Defender of the faith of Iesus Christ? And all the company maketh answer, that he is such a man, and will so continue. Then hee beginneth againe, and maketh another demand. By what right or reason cometh he to dispossesse me of this place, which belongeth only to me? To which question, the Earle that beareth the cheefest Standard, replieth thus. If thou wilt quit and forsake this place, three score Ducates of gold shall bee frankly giuen thee, & this Cow, as also this Mare shall both be thine owne, beside the rich Robe, which our King did last of all put off, shall also be thine: moreover, thou and thy family shall bee free, from paying any manner of tribute. After these words, the Prince approacheth neere to the Stone, & the poore man giueth him a gentle blow on the cheek, commanding him (in any case) to be a good Iusticer: & so descending from the Stone, he leadeh along with him the Cow and Mare, and departeth.

Then the Prince dismounting from his horse, ascendeth vp, and sitteth vpon the stone, where drawing forth his Sword, and turning to each side of the stone, still flourishing the weapon round about him; hee maketh a solemne promise before all the people, uttering the words as loud as he can speake, that he will be a iust Iudge, and a good Prince. This done, one bringeth him (in a Shepheards bonnet) a small quantity of water to drinke: and so descending from the stone, hee re-mounteth on horsebacke, and rydeth on to a Church with all his company, there to heare Mas. Which being finished, hee changeth his former plaine and rurall garments, to very Royall and Princely habites: and after a pompeous Dinner with his whole train, he returneth againe into the open field, where hee heareth all the Officers of Iustice speake vnto him, to enstruēt him in the lawes of the Country: and these are the vsuall ceremonies, obserued at the creation of euery Prince.

There is another custome in vse among these people, for the punishment of thefts and robberies; which I hold to be vnjust, and ouer-cruell, especially to bee vfed among Christians. For hauing but some note or apprehension only, that such a man standeth in repute to be a thief, they forthwith send him to execution, without any other proceeding against him. Then three dayes after his death, they examine the witnesses with all care and diligence; when if it shall appeare by solemne inquisition, that hee proueth to be guilty of the crimes alledged; they suffer him to hang vpon the Gibbet, vntill his limbes fall peece-meale from him. But if he be found to be innocent, they take him thence, and giue him honourable obsequies and funeral, with many prayers and almes-deeds, for the saluation of his soule.

With this feuerity do they chastise theeves and robbers, neuertheless, I read of some other Nations, that greatly haue supported and countenanced them therein. As the Egyptians, of whom Aulus Gellius writeth in his Attick nights. And the Lacedaemonians likewise, who permitted their children to bee theeves, and learne climbing in at windowes, and wandering abroad in the night season, that they might be the more bolde and hardy for warre. CHAP. XXXIII.

What part of the Zodiacke the Sunne and Moone, and likewise the other Planets were, as their first creating. Also of the beginning of yeares, and the course of times.

HE learned Philosophers say, that men are naturally curious & couetous of knowledge. Moreover, such is the zeale of their affection in this case, and the bent of humane vnderstanding so full of strange questionings, as they cannot content themselves to know such things as they may with some ease comprehend only; but ouer and beside, they are scrupulous and searching (through bold presumption) to know such causes as are very hard, and almost impossible. Nor hath this painefull desire bene altogether fruitlesse and vaine, though many times it sayled, and came farre short of expectation: because by contemplation and continuall study, they haue found out such matters, as seemed before vterly impossible and supernaturall, or that they should any way be attained vnto by the capacity of men. As namely, the motions of the Heauens, the course of the Planets and other Starres, with their severall influences and power, and the like things beside: among which is comprized my present intended argument, and what in this Chapter I purposed to discourse on; to wit, how to know the beginning of times & yeares, and on what day the world began, or to speake better; when, or in what season God created the world; when began the year and times; and where was the Sun, or where God placed it at first, when hee began his course; & likewise the Moone, with the other Starres and Planets.

Aristotle did little care for these questions, and insinuate other Philosophers beside, who thorow defect of the light of faith, did verily beleene, that the world was eternall, without any beginning or ending. But such as haue declared themselves not to be ignorant in these things, but verily beleued the beginning of times, came to stand diuided betweene two opinions. There are some among them, who say, that in the instant when the world was created, the Sunne was found to be in the first point of Aries, or the Ramme, which is in the Equinoctiall of Summer, the time coming then to the eleventh day of March. Others say, that the world began, the Sunne then being in the first point of Libra, or the Balances, which is the other Equinoctiall of Winter, commonly happening in these our dayes, on the thirteenth or fourteenth day of September. Of this opinion were diuers Egyptians, Arabs, and Greekes likewise; according as Lincolnius reporteth, in a Treatise of the world, which he wrote to Pope Clement; & Plinius in his historical Mirrour.

Such as haue followed this opinion, alledge a reason for it, which (in my judgment) is very weak, and of no force. For they say, that then the principall fruites of the earth were fully ripe, and in the very best of their floure; because it was most requisite, that (at the beginning) the earth should present it selfe in the height of perfection. To this purpose, they produce authority out of Deuteronomy, where it is said; That God made all things perfect and compleate. There are some others, who affirme, that the entrance of times, and of yeares, was on the very greatest day of all other; which was then, when the Sunne entered into the signe of Cancer, as now it is the eleventh or twelfth day of Iune. Julius Firmicus, an ancient Author, and of great authority in Astrologie, in the beginning of his third Booke, which he wrote of the worlds creation, saith: That when the world began, the Sunne was in the fifth degree of the signe Leo; which is the signe wherein hee hath most dominion, because it is called the house of the Sunne: the like he saith, in discouering the other Planets, by their order and degrees.

But that which relisteth of most reason in all these opinions, and appeareth most conformable to truth, is; that when both time and the heauens began to be moued; the Sun was in the first point of Aries, which is (with vs) in March, and at which time is the entrance of Summer. This is affirmed (beside all other reasons that we can alledge) by the greater part of Historians, as well Christians as Heathens; among whom are S. Hierome, S. Ambrose, S. Basil, and others, who doe all maintaine, that the beginning of the world, and likewise of the year, was in the Equinoctiall of our Summer. And although there may appear some difference among them, because some will haue the worlds beginning to be in March, and others in April: it may well be endured, for they all agree together, that it was in the Equinoctiall, which now is in March. Notwithstanding, as wee haue formerly affirmed, the Equinoctiall is not alwaies firme or constant for Iesus Christ suffered his passion on the five and twentieth day of March, which was then the Equinoctiall, and now it is the eleuenth day of the same Moneth, whereby may well be presumed, that heretofore it was in April.

For this cause, some would haue April to be the first Moneth, and others March, yet notwithstanding, they all say, that when the Sun enters into the first point or degree of Aries, then is the Equinoctiall. This opinion is grounded on the Scripture, especially on the twelfth Chapter of Exodus, where it is said: The Moneth Nisan (which is March with vs) is the entrance to your year. Vincentius in the beginning of his historical Mirrour, saith: The Hebrewes began their year in March, because in the like Moneth was the Equinoctiall, when as the world began. This opinion was likewise held by some of the Gentiles; as Elpacin in his Astrological

Treatise, where he saith: The Chaldeans being very great Astrologers, beleued likewise, that on the first day when the world was made, the Sunne entered into the first point or degree of Aries; and this is also confidently maintained, by the most part of Astrologers, both ancient and moderne. Therefore when the Sunne came in his course thither, or to that Signe; then was the beginning of the year, and thence ensued the principall or beginning day. For it is a matter most manifest, that the first day wherein the world began to be made, was also made the first day of the year, considering, that till then, there was neither time nor year. And therefore the signe of Aries is reckoned (about all the rest) to be the first in order among the twelve signes.

Now, as when we come to iudge of the reuolution of yeares, and things to happen therein, as of necessity we must equal the figures, by the beginning of the world, euen so it is as easie to proue, that God placed the Sunne in the first degree of this signe, at the beginning and creation of the world. And this may be coniectured without any great labor, by our profe made in the sixt Chapter of the seuenth Booke, in our first Volume, where discoufing on the time and day, when as our blessed Lord and Saviour suffered; it is affirmed, that the Sunne was in the selfe-same at the creation, as it was when the great Sunne of righteousness made the regeneration of the world, suffering death and passion in humane flesh, and that happened (as is formerly saide) in the Equinoctiall of Summer, which is an argument and presupposition, that euen so hee placed it, when as he created it.

Moreover, it appeareth very credible, that it was so made, because such as know any thing in Astrologie, and in the Sphere, do well perceiue, that the Sunne entering into the degree of this signe, and making his reuolution by the space of a whole day: there is not any part of the world, which he leaueth vnlouk on with his bright splendour. And this he doth not in any other place of the Zodiaque, because in what place else soeuer hee is; there are some parts of the earth where he is not seene that day; but being in this first degree, as we haue saide, there is no place where he is vnseene, as hee walketh along along in his diurnal course, or dayes iourney. And it standeth with good reason and conueniency, that the first day of the Sunnes setting forth on progrece, hee should begin in such a place, where hee may best visite the whole world with his beames. And that it should be in the signe Aries, rather then in that of Libra, appeareth plainly by our former relation, that on the day of our Lords passion, the Sunne was in the selfe-same place, therefore there is some particular power in this signe.

Holding this opinion then for the most certaine, I say, that the reason alledged, by such as would haue the beginning of the world, to be in the Equinoctiall of September, is very weak. For it is not sufficient to say, that all the fruites were ripe and mellow; in regard it is no vniuersall rule: for when the fruites are ripe ned towards the Northerne latitude, they are not so in the South, but wholly quite contrary. And therefore I craue no helpe of their reason, who say, that the Equinoctiall of March (already proued) is the beginning of the Spring-time, & of flowers ouer all the earth, all things being then in procreation; for if with vs it be the beginning of Spring-time, it is then winter in the Southerne parts. Let our reasons then suffice, & the authority of such worthy men, to clear all other doubt or scruple; although the Romane year, now in vse, seemeth to begin the first day of Ianuary: for this matter came so to passe, onely through the superstitious deuotion, which the Gentiles had to their God Iannus, coueting to haue their year beginne with his name, as the Christians began theirs with the Natiuity of Iesus Christ, albeit the year doth not then begin.

The Romanes (in like manner) began their year in March, according as Marcius Varro writeth, and Macrobius in his first Booke, and in his Fasts, and many more beside. Also God shewed his immense goodnesse, in placing our first Parents Adam and Eue, in the Northerne parts of the earth, when he banished them out of the terrestrial Paradise; & that the first season which they saw in this world, was the Spring-time, finding the earth to be Greene & flowry, with the ayre milde, sweete and temperate, which was done for the consolation of their misery and nakednesse, and so they could not seeke found it, if it had not bene Spring-time.

This matter being sufficiently proued, wee must know that there are other Planets, and especially the Moone, as being one of the principall, whom some do maintaine, to be set by God in conjunction with the Sunne, on the first day of her creation. Others say, that she was in opposition, and at the full. Saint Augustine reporteth these two opinions, in his booke vpon Genesis, the fifth Chapter, saying further, that such as maintaine her to be in opposition, and at the full; do alledge for their reason; that it was very inuenient, that at her beginning, God should create her any way defectuous. Others vidge the contrary, and say it is more credible; that she began her first day in conjunction, encreasing in her age answerable to our account. But to quiet this controuersie, I say (in mine opinion) that God at such time as he created her, made her at full, and in opposition of the Sun. And it seemeth, that this iudgement is the most receiued, as of S. Augustine, in the place before alledged, and Rabanus on the twelfth Chapter of Exodus, saith the very same. This appeareth conformable to holy Scripture, where it is saide: God made two great lights, the greater light to gouerne the day, and the lesser light to illuminate the night. Now in the very same instant as the Sunne began his light, hee gaue splendour to the moity of the world, because in that moity or halfe part, hee made day. But the other moity could haue no light of the Sunne, by reason of the earths shadow; therefore it seemeth consonant to reason, that in the other moity of the earth, where it was night, the Moone should extend her office of shining. For like as they were both created at one instant; so should they both fulfill their offices in one and the same instant, and the one to gouerne the day, as the other the night, according to the words of the Text, verified apparently, that the world was wholly lightened at one & the same time.

Contrariwise, if the Moone had bene in conjunction, the light common and vniuersall could not haue come till fifteene dayes after; and beside, three or foure dayes must needs haue passed, before she could lend any light to the earth, and that mult be but very little too, euen as when we see her to be but four or five daies old.

Therefore it was very conuenable, that these two famous lights shold illuminate the earth at one instant. I say moreover, that the Moone then being in opposition with the Sunne, shee must needs haue her being on the other side of the signe Libra, for in her so being, she performd the same day the effects as the Sunne did, illuminating all the world, by her measurable pace of that dayes iourney; which else she could not haue done, if she had bin in any other place of the Zodiacke. Hereby it appeareth, that this opinion is the most likely; although Iulius Firmicus will needs say, that the Moone (at the time of her creation) had her first seating in the fiftenth degree of the signe Cancer, where shee affected most to be; & of this opinion is Macrobius in his first Booke of Scipios dreame.

Macrobius in
lib. 1. de Somn. Scip.

As for the other Planets, it is very difficult to certifie them, and lesse profitable to know them: in which respect, I am willing to bestow the lesse paines on them. Neuertheless, Iulius Firmicus, in his second Booke before alledged, is so bold as to name the places where each of them is seated, saying: Saturne should bee in the signe Capricorne; Iupiter in Sagittarius; Mars in Scorpio; Venus in Libra; & Mars in Virgo; which are the signes whereto they haue most power, and being signes likewise appointed to these Planets. Elpacus himselfe maintayneth as much, according as Ioannes Agricola declareth in his Summay, entitled Agricola; with Macrobius in his fore-named Booke of Somno Scipionis; and thereunto consenteth Iulius Firmicus, naming expressly the same signes; yet there are others, who haue thought, that in the recited instant, all the Planets were found to be in conjunction with the Sunne. Gualtierus the Monke, in his Booke of the Ages of the world, saith, that the ancient Indians held firmly this opinion. As for my selfe, I am of the minde, that God did then set the Planets in such distant places, one from another, especially from the Sunne; that on such a chosen day, each one of them might illuminate the earth with his beames. VVhich could not be, they being in conjunction with the Sunne, because his presence, within any certaine space or proportion, so hindereth the greatest light of their light, that

CHAP. XXXV.

That men may learne examples by Birds, Flies, Wormes, and other Creatures; to leade the course of a vertuous life.

WE haue already declared in our first Volume, how Beasts & Birds haue entrusted men in a great part of the properties appertaining to Physicke, by purging and preserving themselves from harmes: now I am briefly to entreate, how their example may bee profitable to vs, both in body and soule. And vndoubtedly, whosoever will consider & contemplate, on the nature & properties abiding in beasts; shall not only thence deriue good enstruitions for life and safety of our humane bodies; but rules and examples beside, of good, commendable, and vertuous manners. VVhy do not men strite to purchase peace with their neighbours; seeing what concord and amity is among Beasts of all kindes, and how they keepe company, vnite themselves together in each kinde, and stand defensive one for another? VVhy shame they not to bee slothfull and negligent, percelling & obscuring the care and sollicitude of the Ant, and after what manner she maketh her prouision in Summer for VVinter? VVhat vassals and subiects are they, that will not serue and honor their good Princes, noting with what loue and obedience poore little Bees serue and honour their King, and that which they doe for him beside? In which respect, such Common-weales as haue no Prince, may not enjoy all things in common; may not they learne an example of liuing in peace and concord, by imitation of the poore Ants, who are so great in multitude, and yet preferre an order of peace & iustice among themselves? And why do not great Lords and Princes consider, what manifestation and clemency all of them are obliged vnto; when

In the 7. of the Chap. 33.

when they but behold the King of Bees, who doth no offence, neyther worketh any displeasure to the very meanest and filiest of his Subiects?

Our great Seigniors and high-minded men, may learne humility of the Camell, who falleth on his knees, to accept a heauy and ouer-chargeable burden. True and loyall married couples, may take example by the good custome among some Birds: especially Pigeons and Turtle-Doues, noting both in the Male and Female, that nothing but death can impeach their continuall companying, or hinder eyther from their first choyce. I finde written moreover, concerning Turtle-Doues, that the one dying, the other remaineth in the condition of a widow, & finisheth the remainder of her life in widowhood. Saint Ambrose writeth, that widowed women may learne chastity of the Turtle-Doue. As touching continency, all beasts (well neere) do lesse vs therein: for after the Female hath conceiued, (she neuer seeketh, or hath any appetite to the Male, till her full time be determined. They are likewise examples of temperance in all vices; because they cate no more then sufficient to maintaine life, neyther sleepe they any more then necessity requireth.

To keepe our selues well and discreetly governed, the Peacoke may be our direction. For defence and maintenance of our houses, as also to liue liberally among our people; what better enstruiter can we haue then the Cock? For he will part with the food out of his owne Beake, to giue it to his Hens, and when need requirerh, he will expose himselfe to all perils in their defence. The great obligation, wherein children standeth bound to their Parents, and how they ought to serue and assit them, the Storke plainly witnesseth; by nourishing their aged Parents in their owne nests, as they fedde and maintayned them in their youth. Why should not men blush and be ashamed, to commit the inuincible courage of the Lyon? Faithfullnesse, friendship, and acknowledgement of receiued benefites, wee are notably taught by the meere behauiour of Dogs; that neuer forget the Masters they haue serued, but continually loue them, neuer ceasing to bee thankfull for the poorest bread they cate. If a man would benefit himselfe by the vse of another mans goods, yet without any harme or injury done him; let him so carry himself in that case, as doth the little laboring Bee, who draweth hony out of the fairest flowers, and yet no wrong at all done to them.

VVhat meanes and order we should daily obserue, for healthfull conseruation of our liues, we are not to learne it of any one beast onely, but of many, that know what food doth soonest offend them, as also in with-drawing from one place to another, according to the mutation of times. Moreover, they will liue in such soyles, as are answerable to their complexions and natures; excellen men herein as well as in all other things beside. VVhy should not men be absolutely learned, and ignorance in any thing quick removed from them, being endued with hearing and vnderstanding: considering that an Elephant learneth whatsoever is shewne and taught him; a Dog attaineth to many familiar qualities; and Birds can speake, being thereto entrusted? He that heareth the Nightingales sweet Songs, and some other melodious Birds; how can he but desire to sing musically? VVhy couer not men to be excellent builders, beholding the Swallows skillfull enstruition; what arte theee declareth for her owne dwelling, and with what diuersity of matter it is composed? VVhat better Geometry, then that of the Spider? What better Astrologie, then that of the Ant, & likewise of a Fish (according to Galen) called Pranoscopus, that hauing but one eye, yet looks continually vp to heauen? Haue men reason and iudgement, and yet are meere ignorant in these Artes?

How many other industrious and excellent perfections are in brute Beasts, which men either haue, or else may learne of them? Passages vnder ground, making of Caves in the earth, and knowledge how to dwell in them; came they not first from the Mole and Fox? There are certaine little VVormes, in Latine called Veres, that entrusted the meanes and manner to spin and make Silke. Next, the Spider taught how to spin thred for cloth, & so to make Nets, whereby to catch Birds. Men learned of Beasts to swim in the water, for there is no one of them but can do it;

it; yet men cannot attaine thereto, but by practise and learning. What Physicall rules they haue taught men, and knowledge in the changes of weather, hath else where bene handled; and yet notwithstanding we make such prouision of them, for supply of hunger and other necessities, as I know not how wee could liue without their helpe. Our garments are made of theirs, and their flesh is our best Foode: both being brought home to vs from far remote countreys, and whatsoever is needfull for vs, or else we send abroad to seeke after them. They labour, and make the earth playable for our vse; whence we get our bread, and the best fruites of sustentation, so that they are the principall maintenance of our liues. And although they are sore laboured, pursued, and euill entreated by the spleenes of men: yet are they still obedient, both knowing, following, and euermore dooing them seruice.

Come wee now to examples concerning the soule, as a matter of higher Argument, and much greater importance. Whence can a man deriue more worthie examples, both for vertues and good manners meete to bee in men, then from beasts? All those Vertues which naturall Philosophers hath perswaded vnto vs, are grounded on the similitudes and parables of Beasts: Oratours serued their turnes with them; and all that haue spoken or written elegantly.

God and his Saints haue oftentimes in sacred Scripture, instructed and perswaded vs, by the properties & conditions of beasts, for the perfection of our liues: And the rules of vertue and ciuil manners do tell vs, that we should be wise like Serpents, and simple as Doves; milde, like Lambes, and strong and constant as Lyons. In like sort, by the example of brute beasts, and void of reason, we are taught to become men reasonable, and spirituall affected. We finde many Offices & estates in the Church, applyed and figured by beasts, and according vnto their properties. By Oxen (according to S. Augustine, writing on the second Chapter of S. Iohn) such men are signified, as doe publish and preach the holy Scriptures: for they till and plough vnto the knotted furrowes of our soules, sowing therein the seedes of Gods most glorious word.

Saint Paule, and Solomon in his Proverbs doeth say; Thou shalt not muzzle the mouth of the Oxe that laboureth, Rom. 9. verse 7. Prouerb. 12. chap. 14. The holy Doctors and Preachers of the Church, that with Doctrine and good Lawes doe gouerne and defend it, are termed Doves. Saint Gregorie speaks it on the words of Iob: Quorum non dignaber patres ponere cum canibus gregis mei. The same Saint Gregorie, inuith men vnto a contemplatiue kinde of life, by the imitation of Goates, that alwayes climbe vp to high places, spending there their time in contemplation as it were: the wordes in Leuiticus seem his motiue thereto, Leuitic. chap. 14. verse 12. Out of the Herd let the Goate be offered.

Moreouer hee sayth, that Preachers should imitate the Cocke; as grounded on the words of Iob, who sayde; Who hath giuen vnderstanding to the Cock? Adding withall, that (like vnto the Cocke) they proclaime (in the dimme darkenesse of this life) the glorious light that is to come, and awakes vs with their shrill voyces, out of sleepe finnes, saying with S. Paule, The night is past, and day approacheth. And againe, It is time for vs to arise from sleepe, abroad yete iust, and sinne not. Phil. 1. 12.

The Church her selfe, pure, holy, and immaculate, is compared to a Dove, as Solomon declareth in his Canticles, saying: Beholde, thou art faire my Loue, thine eyes are like the Doves. And againe in another place: O my Loue, O my Dove. We see likewise, that of the foure Euangelists three are figured by three beasts. If I would continue longer on this argument, I could finde matter enough to discourse on. But aboute all other, that of our Saviour and Redeemer Iesus Christ, is the most notable, who would bee figured by a Beast, as Saint Iohn speaketh in his Apocalypse, chap. 7. verse 14. The Lyon of the Tribe of Iudah hath bene victorious. And David sayeth in his Psalmes, Roar like a Lyon: and so in many other places, which were too long to rehearse. Beside in S. Mathew, he tearmeth himselfe a Hen, saying; O Ierusalem, Ierusalem how often would I haue gathered thee & thy children together, as the Hen gathereth hir Chickens vnder her wings, and ye would not.

Seeing then, that Christ compareth his workes to the properties of Beastes; men may doe well to receiue instruction from them, in leading a good and holie life. And contrarywise, what shame and confusion is it to vs, to see and know, that all kinde of Beasts do follow their nature perfectly, and men (onely made reasonable) vse their owne so badly, abusing that super-excellent gift very vilely. For, he that ought most to honor God, doth most of all offend him, and farre beyonde all other creatures, dayly perverting and adulterating his workes. So that there are some beasts, of whome men may learne much better examples, then from some kind of men among whom they liue. For they haue more apprehension of iustice, and offend farre lesse, then men that knowe what is their dutie, and yet do it not. And therefore, God deliuereth it by the mouth of the Prophet Esay: The Oxe knoweth his Master, and the Ass his Cribbe; but Israel knoweth him not, neither will his people vnderstand him.

CHAP. XXXVI.

Of neglect in Martiall Discipline: and of an Army of Christians, that lost all their liues thorow drunkennesse, and want of following such courses, as are to be obserued in Military assayes.

WE haue already declared, how Bayan Chinsan, Lieutenant to the Tartarian Emperor Cublay, and director of his Military forces, tooke 12 Cities and Townes (by assault) at his first annuall, for conquering the great Province of Maugy, before all the rest would yeeld themselves tributary. One of them was vterly ruined to the very foundation and worse vfed then any other known to be, during the Empire of the said Cublay, which was about fixe and thirtie yeares. This City being called Cinginguy, was the second in wealth, greatnesse, and multitude of inhabitants, in all the rich Kingdom of Maugy, and the reason why it was wholly ruined, followeth thus.

Bayan Chinsan, pursuing his Conquests, was much whitened by a strong Castle, builded vpon a small mountaine, very potent by naturall situation, and artificiall construction. For therein continued a powerfull Garrison, that prevaileth with great advantages on his Army, passing along the foote of that Mountaine; and this was the reason that he would proceed on no further, till hee had deriued some better correspondencie from the people of this Garrison. And yet he durst promise to himselfe, that (within some small distance of time) he should preuaile against them, as afterwarde it proued true indeed.

In the meane while, and at the selfsame instant, the explorators or scouts were come backe againe, which he had sent to surueigh the estate of Cinginguy, who made knowne vnto him, that the people of the City appeared, to knowe nothing of his coming, neyther stood vpon any guard, or preparation to expect a besieging. This was the cause (to the end he might the better preuent them) that hee forthwith dispatched a squadron of thirty thousand men, armed at the lightest, and very good foldiers, all of them being christians (which came among the Tartarian Idolaters in open liberty, as the Iews haue done from all times of antiquity, and daily yete do) to possesse themselves of the Cite, and hinder the entrance of any succour, either by way of power or victuals, assuring them likewise, that he would follow them with all convenient speede that might be.

This warlike band of Christians, made such speedy diligence, that (within three dayes) they arrived before the City, and lodged themselves on the Ditches side, before any in the City took notice thereof. They made the escalado in so many severall places, and disposed their Archers so conveniently, as no one durst peep out at any of the battlements, or else be scene vpon the walls. At length, the besieged (imagining the army that had thus engirt the, was of far greater strength then it was indeed) being overcome with feare, rendered themselves to the discretion & mercy of the assaillants, to the end, they might finde the more humanity at their handes. The gates being fer open, the Christians entred, taking vp their lodgings in severall all houses. And these indiscreete conquerors, without any other care of military discipline, finding the City well furnished with victuals of all kinds, & whatsoever was needfull for the life of man, but (about all) plenty of rich wines; fell to making themselves good cheere, and drinking hard, after the German manner, till they fell asleepe with the pots in their hands.

Heereupon the Inhabitants finding themselves deceived, in yielding to so final a number of people, that had no better understanding in actions of warre, neither knew how to vse the fortune so fauorably befall them; began to consult heereon with themselves, and how to worke their deliuerance with as much speed, as they were ouer-hasty in losing their liberty. The Christians continuing in this drunken behauiour, without any feare at all of the Inhabitants, that lodged the Soldiers in their houses, though not halfe so many as they were able to receiue: in one night it was fully concluded, that euery host should kill his guest, and so it was accordingly performed. Afterward, they threw their bodies into the great Riuer, which runneth through the midst of the City, saying: These are the renegades and faith-breakers, men of Christian Religion, of whom the Emperour Cublay made no great account, but suffered them to carry crosses in their Ensigns, to shame them the more in their least ill demeanour.

Bayan Chinlan hauing surprized the foresaid castle, commanded the Captains to be hanged, and the castle quite ruined; but pardoned all the Soldiours, journeying afterward on to Cingunguy; but within lesse then two dayes journey, hee heard how all his men were slaine, therefore hee brought a strong siege before the City. The Inhabitants were not a little amazed, beholding so powerfull an Army to beset them, and conducted by a man so highly renowned: and therefore desired to haue a Parlee before any farther proceeding, which accordingly was granted. The summe of the Oration propounded by the Deputies, was thus. That they could not deny a manifest truth, but that they had slaine a number of runnagates, matterlesse men, seeming to haue no faith or honesty, neither shewing any open apparance of their power; but suddenly surprized their City. Moreover, that they were all Christians, more addicted vnto wine and gourmandizing, then any respect of valour or manhood: in which regard, his losse was little or none at all, by the deserued ouerthrow of such carelesse people, and they humbly desired pardon, if in this case they had transgressed.

Bayan returned his answer brauely and fuccinctly, saying. His men were warriors, that had no other direction in this businesse, but command from his mouth onely, and he had beene well informed, that they tooke the City by faire order of warre; without offending any one in their goods, or violence offered to wiues or mayes, or disarming any Inhabitant, but suffering them to continue in their wanted liberty. And in being Christians, they did not therefore deserue death, because he could as well tolerate them, as his Master the Emperour, who not onely suffered them to liue in all his Countries, without the least iniury done vnto them; but hauing conquered kingdomes, wholly Christian, he neuer innouated any matter touching their Religion. Moreover, the greater part of Officers in his Court, and the very worthiest of his warriors, were all Christians, being men more faithful, and of better conuerfation, then any other Religion whatsoever.

As for their neglect in martiall discipline, he did not allow it in them, but confessed, that they deserued death therein, which (doublelesse) himselfe would haue insisted on them; condemning them for beeing so forward, in executing any authority belonging onely to him. For which boldnesse (with an absolute deniall of pardon or fauour) he vowed to be reuenged on the men of Cingunguy; because (against all fidelity) they had slaine his men, and declared monstrous ingratitude, and thence hee pretended to deriue his reason.

Hauing thus spoken, hee would see them no more, but in this rough manner dismissed them. About an houre after, he caused his Rammes and other Engines of battery, to be mounted, for destruction of the walles and houses, and within few dayes after, tooke the City, without any great resistance, putting all the men to the sword, that were about 14 yeares of age. Women and maidens went whither themselves pleased; but for their children, they were sold at the Out-cry, to such as would giue the most money for them: for there were certaine merchants of Beazala, which followed the army that did traffike onely in such kinde of merchandise, and so do yet to this day. Afterward, vittails beginning to faile, & the warlike enemy, hauing emptied the citie of all the wealth, he commanded it to be set on fire, and that the Army should not boudge thence, until it were intirely consumed.

Wine and gourmandizing more speeded their manhood.

This City was seated on a goodly river, large and nauigable, whereby, the commerce which it made with other countries, returned infinite profit and wealth. In it was made the richest & fairest works wrought with the needle, both in cloth of golde and silver, as no other City in the world beside had the like. There were also made sumptuous vessels (for all vses) both of golde and silver, by most admirable cunning, and in great plenty: besides costly clothes of fine Cotten, gold, silver and silk. In briefe, it was the second or third City (as then) in all those parts: which was thus destroyed, thorow the drunkenness of Nestorian Christians, and by the perfidy of the Inhabitants, euen as Troyan Itham by luxury & whoredome, since when it was neuer rebuilded, or inhabited. The ruines thereof may be seene to this day, whereat still many haue stonde amazed, it being situated in so potent a territory: but it was thought to proceed from the iust displeasure of God, and for the bloody massacre of so many Christians.

We may now come homeward, and nearer to our selues, and speake of the like faults, as were among these Tartarian Christians, thorow lacke of knowledge, how to make vse of victorie: As not long since was scene in France, in the first battaile giuen neere to Dreux, betweene the French Protestants and the Catholics, in the yeare of our Lord God, 1562. vnder Charles the ninth. The Prince of Conte, being chief of those Protestants, ouerthrew with his horsemen (wherein he was strongest) a great part of the royall Catholique Armie, whereof Anne de Montmorancy, Constable, was commanded, putting the 20000 to flight, and the sayde Constable taken prisoner. Heereupon the Protestants becomming insolent, and vterly vnmindfull of Militarie Discipline: left their ranks, brake their order, gaue the chase, pursuing after certayne runaways, and before they had fully conquered all their enemies; they beganne to gape after pillage with the Swart-rutiers and Launce-knights. During this disorder, Monfieur de Gussy, a most wife and valiant Capitaine, hauing yet left him a band of braue men, beganne to set vpon those negligent fellows with his troups, and running on the Protestants (who imagined they had the whole victorie, which they knew not how to holde) got the better of them, and tooke their Leader the Prince of Conte, becoming sole master of the field. Thus, not knowing how to vse Militarie Discipline, by breaking their ranks, following the chase, and scrapping for pillage, when they had gotten the better of their enemies safe and soundly, yet not hauing wholly overcome them: did they not declare themselves very vnadvised, becoming guilty and well worthie of death? I am perswaded, that all good warriors are of that opinion. And so it happened, for thus the Protestant Armie was vterly foyled, which was (wellneare) equal in great Capitaines and good men to the Royall. But such losse doth almost daily happen, where Military discipline is not obserued.

They that (at so cheape a rate) tooke the City of Cingunguy, should haue disarmed the Citizens, seized the strongest places into their owne power, planted Courts of guard in all the most frequented parts of the City, imprisoned the chiefe persons, expelled out of the City, a greater part of the youthfull and most forward men, if they would not kill them, without vsing such courtesie after conquest. In so doing, they had kept Martiall discipline on foote, and auoyded the losse of their owne liues, besides the reproach, to their great infamie. But ouer and aboue all the rest, they should (as much as in them lay) haue abstained from wine: For there is not anie thing, that sooner bereaue a

The greatnes and riches of Charles duke of Burgoyne, with the leuerall lands that he was Lord of.

I am sure few people are ignorant, in what Beds of state, the noble Kings of France vsed to take their rest, and vnder what rich Pauillions; yet the iniquity of our times hath bene such, that a Kings lodging hath bene more vile then a lax. I speake of King Charles the eight of that name, who returning home to his kingdom, hauing bene in Italy, where hee conquered the kingdom of Naples, and the great Dukedomes of Calabria and Apulia, and wonne two famous battailes in those countries: vpon a Palme Sunday Eue, being the seuenth of Aprill, one thousand foure hundred ninety eight, leading his Queene by the hand, Anne of Bretaigne, to see certaine Gentlemen play at the Tennis, in a Ditch belonging to the Castle of Amboise, entred into an olde, broken, vncouered Gallery, where he gaue his head a great blow against the vpper part of the doore, albeit himselfe was but of lowe stature. Taking hold vpon some staves for his recovery, neere vnto a noysome place, where euery one that would (by custome) vsed to let passe their vrine, and other vncleannesse of the body; he was contented to endure it, and stood there merrily discoursing with the Queene, and other noble persons there present, iudging who deserued best of them that played. Suddenly hee was overcome with a rheume or catarre, which taking from him all his strength and motion in euery part of his body, he was depriv'd likewise of his speech. This was perceiued by all there-about him, and how he lay vpon the ground, in such a foule, stinking, and vnseemely place; yet no one had the care, or subiect-like affection, to beare him thence to his royall bed, which was not aboue twenty paces off.

Hee languished in this manner, for the space of nine houres, and dyed there in that noysome place. Is it not a matter deseruing admiration, that so worthy a King should dye in so vile a place, being in his owne house, among his Officers, and many of the Nobility? Hee that was King of the sweete smelling Floure-de-Luce, to expire and ende his dayes, not among hearbs or flowers of pleasing sauour: but in a place full of filth, then which, the whole world could yeelde no worfe?

And to shew yee, that great Princes are as subiect to dye in battailes, as the simplest Souldiours: James, King of Scottes, may serue as an example, for hee was slayne in the field, with twoo Bishoppes, a great part of his Nobility, and many men of warre, that happened in the yeare of our Lord, one thousand five hundred and thirteene. And the yeare following, John d'Albret king of Nauarre, lost his Kingdom, which was seized by Ferdinand King of Spaine, because hee stood accused by Pope Iulius, for assisting King Lewes the twelfth, in warre against him; and aboue all, in the bataille of Rauenna, which vntill this present his Successours neuer enjoyed.

James the fourth, King of Scots, slain in bataille.

John d'Albret King of Naurre lost his kingdom.

And Lewes sforza, Duke of that rich and goodly Countrey of Millaine, was led prisoner into Fraunce, lying before the French to Nauarra, a City of his Dukedome; hee was confined to imprisonment, within the great Tower of Bourge, where (in great want and pouertie) hee finished his dayes.

Lewes Sforza, Duke of Millaine, continued in prison, where he dyed.

What shall wee say of King Frances, first of that name, the Father of Learning, whose wisdom and magnanimitie, could not warrant him against the Ambuscadoes of Fortune, no more then any of them before remembered? Hee fell into the hands of Charles the fifth, Emperour, enuious of his greatnesse, and had bene his competitor in the Empire, opposing himselfe against many of his designs. Hee dayned him prisoner aboue a yeare; during which time, hee had a most yrkesome disease, which compelled him (for enioying of his liberty, to yeeld to many hard and grienous conditions. As, to renounce and disclayme a multitude of rights, which hee pretended to many Dukedomes, Earledomes, and Kingdomes. Beside, he gaue so great a quantity of money, as well for his expences, as discharge of martiall affaires, and his ransom withall, that his kingdom (for euer after) felt the smart thereof.

howsoever high and great degree they haue carried in the world. For in the year 1410. Pope Iohn was put in prison, flying from the Councell of Constance, and was giuen in guard to Lewis, Count Palatine, depofed from his Office, and one called Martine, fife of that name, feated in his place, being likewise very inhumanly entreated, for the space of three yeares. Afterwards, by the humanity of the sayde Martine, he was fet at liberty, and created Cardinall: whereby euery man may perceiue, how farre this Iohn was falne from his former degree.

In the year 1466. the byshop of Liege brother to the fore-named Duke of Bourgogne, by his wife, who was of the house of Bourbon: befide his Office, hee was a Prince of the Empire, a Lord both spirituall and temporal, and holding fo great and rich a cuntry, as that of Liege. He was taken prisoner for his subiectes, and a great sort of his friends and officers (among whom were ten Abbots and Protectors, or Canons, al of worthy houses) massacred in his prefence, & himselfe kept prisoner for long time, and in great misery. At length hee got safely away, hauing (by money) won his Guards consent thereto.

At Florence, in the year 1448. the arch-Bishop of the faide place, being clothed in his habiliments of Priest-hood, and faying Masse, was suddenly surprized, and hanged or strangled at a Window, by the hands of the hangman: befide foure Cardinalls massacred by the people, and many other Ecclesiasticall persons beheaded.

And although Popes (as hath bene held) by their great and spirituall authority, might impose silence vpon Christian Princes, from vnder-taking warres, but to keepe themselves in quiet, and likewise to take armes at his command, for the affairs of the Christian world; yet it came fo to passe, that Pope Clement was taken prisoner, and locked vp fuen months space in his castle of S. Angelo, kept by a guard of Spaniards and Germanes, and all of them Heretikes (wel-neere) about him. The City of Rome was greuously pilld, the Temples ransacked and prophaned; all which happened by the Souldiers of Charles the fift, a Catholike Emperour, in the year 1547.

After these men of Ecclesiasticall profession, it shall not differ much from our purpose, to conclude this chapter with the death of three potent Kings, that died all three in one day: to the end, wee may obserue how vnhappy it is for Princes, to thinke that they can well manage their affaires, in meddling amongst the quarrels of other Princes, as pusiant euery way as themselves.

It came to passe, that two Princes contended for the kingdom of Fez and Marracco, situated in Barbarie of Africa: the one of them being named Muley Mahumet, Nephew to the other that demanded these Realmes, called Abdelmelec. This Mahumet, who enioyed those Kingdomes ten or twelue yeares, was assailed three or foure times by Abdelmelec, hauing gotten assistance of the Turke, and wonne fil the best in foure fought batailles. So that in the end, the inhabitants of Fez and Marracco receyued Abdelmelec: because Mahumet was a Tyrant, had very few friends, contempting euery one, and trusting altogether in his strength and Treasures, after all his losses in those former Batailles.

Sebastian, King of Portugall, made offer to him of his ayde and friendship, but hee refused it, vntill such time as hee had neyther place or person to retire vnto, nor any to follow him. Moreover, he had spent the great heapes of money which hee had gotten together during his reigne, & now withdrew himselfe into the Mountaines, which are fixe Leagues off from the City of Marracco. There hee liued about feauen or eight months, like a theefe or robber, with some few companies of needie persons, which yet againe were cut off by the troopes of Abdelmelec; and Mahumet constrained to wander in the most vnaccessable places of the Mountaines, where he endured a million of miseries, for the space of a whole year, liuing in continual feare and distrust, onely thorough his conceyued opinion, that hee should bee taken, or betrayed in his secret walkes.

In breefe, necessity compelled him to repent his former denials, and to require the friendly succour offered him, by that braue King of Portugall, Sebastian: vnto whom he sent an expresse Messenger, and (afterward) two of his Captaines. In the meane while, he found the means to defend ceed from the Mountaines, by wayes of little or no resort, and fought for his safety in * Tanger, a Towne which the Portugals held in Africa: where hee was well entertained by the Gouverneur, who knew some part of Sebastians minde towards them, and therefore furnished the two Captaines with well armed horsemen, for the dispatch of their Embasie in Portugall.

King Sebastian was very ioyfull to see these Ambassadors, because he was naturally addit to Armes, and the disposition of his person (ioyned with his height of courage) incessantly spurred him on to this businesse. And in this respect, hee did but awaite some apt ouerture, for making his passage into Africa, forming his pretext, vpon an earnest desire (as hee would alwayes say) which hee had to aduance Christian Religion, and to extirpate that of the Mahumetists. Wherevpon he suddenly promised (without any better consideration of the businesse) to succour Muley Mahumet, and to re-seate him in his kingdomes againe: hee made promise (I say) to such a one, as himselfe had before sought vnto, for this effect, by so large a passage ouer the Seas, and two feuerall times had bene misprized by him. The Pope, the King of Spain, and many other great personages, could not dissuade him from this enterprize, but still he persisted in treading the path vnto his owne death, death that followed him so hard at the heeles. So did hee set on into Africa, with thirteene hundred sayle, as well of great as small Vesselles in that Fleet, the very fayrest and goodliest that had bene seene in those times. His Army was composed of Lance-knight, Spaniards, Italians, Portugals, and some small number of Africane Moores, which took part with the Portugals, and thirty fixe Pieces of Ordnance for the field, well fitted and furnished. In all, there was not aboute sixteene thousand men of warre; setting aside the Soldiours boyes, Waggoners, Strumpets, Castadours, and other such like people very vnprofitable for the field.

Abdelmelec (wee may well perswade our selves) slept not all this while carelessly, for hee brought threecore thousand men to the field, as well Pykes as Harquebuziers, and twenty fixe Peeeces of Orde-

nance for the field, well appointed & gouerned by most expert men. Abdelmelec was very sorry, that hee should haue any conquest against Christians, in regard hee bare them much affection; not because he feared the Portugals, but as fore-seeing, that Barbary would proue the graue to the King of Portugall, who (indeede) was too weake to encounter with him, that went so farre beyond him in power. And in due consideration of the case, hee would oftentimes thus say to himselfe. King Sebastian should bee more respectiue, then so vnaduisedly to runne vpon his owne ruine: for he would take two kingdomes from me, which in right and iustice are appertaine to me, and giue them vnto a Negro, wherein Christ endome can no way bee eased or accommodated, neyther is it a thing which God (being iust) will permit.

The report and rumors spread abroad, of *Abdelmelec*s valiant carriage, was the cause that euery one came to offer him seruice and obeyfance, and from euery Prouince they brought him goodly presents and gifts of incalimable value. Many Christian Kings tooke pleasure in his friendship, and embraced him as their kinde well-willer, esteeming themselves happy in his acquaintance. So that from diuers places, great store of Christians traualled into his countries, where they receiued gracious entertainment, and hee shewed them much better countenance, then to any other men that resorted thither, helping them liberally in their necessities. On the contrary part, Muley Mahumet oppressed the Christians all the time of his reigne, or else permitted, that all grecfes and molestations should bee done vnto them: wherefore King Sebastian (in this respect) did greatly forget himselfe.

Now to deteine the Reader no longer in suspence, the two Armies disposed themselves for the encounter, and mette in a field, which contained aboute two miles in spaciousnesse, so euene and plaine, that there was not any tree, grasse, brambles, or stones, to offer the least hinderance. The Army of Sebastian, had the Riuer of Arache behinde it, and that of Abdelmelec, the Riuer of Alcaffar. Muley Mahumet, for whom this Tragedy was to bee acted, contrary to his oath and promise, did not bring with him any ayde for Sebastian; hauing having formerly made him beleue, that more then halfe the Army of Abdelmelec, would come and ioyne with him: which came not so to passe, for both the Armies meeting together, each side fought valiantly for it selfe, and the Christians sustained the worke. Muley Mahumet was one of the first that fled, shaping his course towards the river of Arache, where thinking to passe the foord, & it being choked with mud and slime, and his horse sticking fast therein, he gaue him the spur so furiously, that losing his stirrups, and not knowing how to helpe himselfe by swimming, hee fell into the water, and so was both drowned and suffocated in the myre. As for K. Sebastian, after that all his men were slaine, or (at least) put to flight; he was assailed on all sides (having but 7 or 8 knights with him) among whom also he was slaine, & lay on the ground among his owne people, that fought for their liues as much as men could do.

Now concerning Abdelmelec, some 8 or 10 dayes before the battaile, he fell into a greuous sicknesse, by eating a messe of milke in a neere adioyning Village, which so curdled on his stomacke, as hee could not compasse any auoydance of it. Neuerthelesse, on the day of battaile, hee would needs mount on horse-backe, and presse into the thickest of the fight, where finding himselfe more weake then euer, he was conuayed into his Litter, wherein he died immediately. But his death was very closely concealed, vntill the battaile was finished, and won on his side.

Thus we may see, that (in one day) three Kings died by three seuerall meanes: for Muley Mahumet was drowned; Sebastian finished his life in fight; & Abdelmelec dyed by sicknesse. Their bodies also received diversity of handling or vltage: for the body of Mahumet was flayed, & the skinn stuffed with haire, was carried thorow all the Cities in the kingdomes of Fes & Marocco, in signe of open infamy. The body of the king of Portugall, Sebastian, was buried in the Town of Alcassarguier, without any Priest for the funerall obsequies, or any sheete to couer his body; but stark naked, according as it was found, when acknowledgement was taken of it among the other dead bodies: yet one of the groomes of his chamber, despoiling himselfe thereof, gaue him a poore paire of linnen breeches, & a most wretched doublet, which was no way disliked by the Mahometanes. The fore-said groome flayed himselfe miraculously, for of the whole Christian Army, either Soldiers or other, there did not escape 2000. Abdelmelec was carried away dead in his Litter, royally apparelled, and more then twenty miles off from that place, hee was buried in a costly Sepulcher, among his Predecessors, and there was granted rents and reuenues, to diuers Priests of the Mahometane Religion, to pray to God (after their manner) for his soule.

Their successors also were as strange and diuers; for to Muley Mahumet, succeeded his mortall enemy, Hamed. To Abdelmelec, not his owne children, albeit he had diuers; but his bastard Brother, the said Hamed, for the father would haue it so. To king Sebastian, Philip King of Spain, who was (a farre off) a kinsman to him, yet then the nearest that could be found, because the other was neuer married. Here we may apparently perceiue, how fortune playeth with miserable life, or vnsuccessfull ending in the very greatest, or of highest advancement in this world, as well as those of much meane condition, & that thorow some secret iudgement of God, who can & will dispose of all things, according to his owne good will and pleasure. These matters happened in Africa, in the kingdomes of Marocco and Fes, on Monday, being the fourth day in the Month of August, and in the year 1578.

I could here alledge many other examples of Christian Kings and Princes, whose endes haue bin scarcely honorable or happy, and that within thirty year of this instant: but because I know, that these times do afford some passionate spirits, who take no delight in such sad relations, and others are of a fierer temper, but as void of pity, as the other are too forward in compassion, not carrying any meane betweene such two extremities; I will forebore to proceede any further in this argument, & enter into some other more apt discourse.

CHAP. XXXVIII.

That Princes are commonly such in their affections, manners, & pietie, as they perceyue their Kings, Princes, and Rulers to bee.

Here neede no doubt to be made, but that it was verie true which Theodorick, King of the Gothes (writing to the Romaine Senate) alledged: That the course of Nature should sooner faile, then people bee any other then their Princes. This is not only to be understood of their vertues and vices; but likewise of the gesture of their bodies, yea euen so farre as to their wearing garments. This may easily be prooued; for Alexander the Great but bending his Neck a little towards his right shoulder, al his yong Princes, and other cheefe followers in his Court, did bend theirs also in the very same manner.

Alphonfus King of Arragon and Sicilie, hauing a wry necke, all such as followed and affected him, enforced to wry their neckes like his; as being perswaded, that it was most commendable in them, because their King and Maister carried his necke so: as wee finde it recorded in the Booke of the Courtier, and in the life of Pyrrhus.

King Frances, the first of that name, vndersong continually to weare his haire verie long, and (as it was said) looking out at a Window, he receiued a wounde on the head; by meanes whereof hee was enforced to cut his lockes, and weare them a great deale shorter then formerly hee had done. Many of his Courtiers, especially such as wore their haire as he was wont to do, caused their long lockes to be cut likewise, and ware them in the same manner as he did. Heereupon afterwarde, diuers Noble and high descended French-men, left off from longer wearing false Lockes and Periwigs, or Gregorians, which they reputed as a signe of Nobility and comeliness, for holding some place of eminence in the Commonwealth, & thence-forward esteemed it as a ridiculous fashion.

Charles the fift, Emperour, wore his beard long, but cut round below in shape of a pouch or purse. In imitation of him, the Noblemen of Spaine, Italy, Flanders, Germany, and Bourgonne, with some other that were his subiects, hadde their beards after the selfesame fashion, which they teamed to bee an Imperiall Beard. King Charles the ninth, King of Fraunce, being at Metz, where the Count of Manfeld, and Marquesse of Baden came to see him, because he should shew them a gracious countenance, he tooke off the Marquesses Bonnet from his head, and put on (instead thereof) his owne, which he commonly vied to weare, that was a German cap, great, thicke, thrummy, and flat, in forme of a Cheefe. In regard whereof, all the attendants in his Court (which was a great company at that time) would needs weare Bonnets after the same fashion. And it grew to such an extremity in affection, that such Cappes and Bonnets, as were usually sold in Metz for "thirty Sols", within three dayes after, could not bee bought vnder three French Crowns; and yet (at so deare a rate) they were not to be had, albeit the Bonnet-makers laboured night and day in making them, the crowd and presse for them was so great, without any other profite or commoditie ensuing by them, but only that they would be in the Kings fashion.

King Henrie the third, by reason hee had some Vicers in the fore-part of his head, was subiect to a continuall paine & greefe: therefore he wore thicke gummy haire, bound vp behinde (like womens) to couer that defect. The Noblemen and Gentlemen of his Court, had their hayre gummed and bound vp in like manner, although no paine thereto prouoked them: whereupon some were verily perswaded, that men would fall likewise to weare womens garments, they were so forward in the fashion of their haire. If I would insert all the courtes and behaviour of the people, in imitating their Princes fond fashions and habits, I must needs be too troublesome to the Reader: therefore I will now discourse on their vertues and vices, with as much breuitie as I can.

and from Greece more then any other country (as did many great and excellent Philosophers, amongst whom were Plato, Democritus, and others) was for no other end; but in regard of a King of that Countrey, named Ptolomy Philadelphus, the onely loue of Learning, and seeker after such men as were learned. And in imitation of him, the Egyptians his subiects addicted themselves so studiously, to ground their vnderstanding in the most laudable Sciences, and that for such long continuance of time, as a man was reputed to haue scene nothing, if he had not trauayled into Egypt. Whereupon, it is sayde, that Plato (admiring their wonderfull erudition) cryed out by way of exclamation: The Greekes are no better then Children in knowledge, beeing compared with the Egyptians. Heere we may obserue, what honour this good King Philadelphus won to his subiects, because by his imitation they made themselves vertuous, and giuen to all commendable qualities.

The like happened vnder the reigne of Manfor, Emperour of Affrica, and all the Spaines, who gouerned in the yeare of our Lord, one thousand, one hundred, & foue. This King was such a loue of learning, that he caused all Bookes written in Greeke, cyther concerning Philosophie, Physicke, or Historie, to be translated into the Arabian tongue. He founded many Colledges, wherto he gaue very great rents, for the maintenance of poore Students, and professors of learning, whereof a great many are at this day to be seen, in the Citties of Fez and Marocco in Affrica, in Trenissen, Tunis, Argiere, Hippoma, and else-where, although he was a Mahometane in Religion, yet many other of his successeurs, that afterwards followed him, and the people themselves (to this day) in those Affricane countries, doe relish of the good conditions, maners, and vertues abiding in that King, adding themselves to Learning. Nor appeared this in men onely, but likewise in Women, according as Leo Africanus testifieth, saying; The Women of Lybia, in these our dayes, are very Learned and Studious, and aboue all things else, they are sooner busied in good Bookes: then medling with cloathes, Garments, or other Vtensels belonging to household. And I dare boldly maintaine (with many other Learned men, well read in Histories) that but for this King Manfor, and his Arabian successeurs: Physicke had neuer beene halfe so fertile in remedies, as we finde it now to bee in these our dayes.
